Greene began with cated moral disquisition Mamilia (1583), a long series of highly-coloured fantastic novels, 'love-pamphlets,' as he called them, and he was immediately imitated by Lodge, by Dickenson, by Lodewick Lloyd, and by many others of less notoriety These books had a peculiarity which is of the greatest importance they were written for women frequent to dedicate a novel of this class ' To the Gentlewomen of England,' Lyly went so far as to say that his books would 'rather lie shut in a lady's casket than open in a scholar's study' This gave a peculiarly civilising effect to what was best in these romances, most of which, although they were objected to by the severe on account of their appeal to frivolity and their long-drawn pictures of lovers' emotion, were in no sense licentious or even coarse.

This curious fashion, however, although introduced by a book so original, so wise, and in many ways so attractive as Euphues, and although for a little while so triumphant, was doomed to rapid and complete failure The romantic novel in Elizabethan England culminated in the Rosalynde of Lodge (1590), and we may admit the space of twelve years as comprising its rise and its decay. From the first it was exotic, not one of the novels (with the curious exception of Nash's realistic picaresque romance of Jack IVilton, 1594, from which an extract is given below) touched the incidents of actual life The landscape was a scene out of some vague, flowery Arcadia, the personages were heroic beyond mortal comprehension, the language used was almost invariably that artificial, mincing dialect suggested, as is now believed, by the study of the world famous Relog de Principes, or 'Dial of Princes,' by the Spanish bishop, Antonio de Guevara (translated from a French version by Lord Berners, see page 104, and again by Sir Thomas North in 1557) This dialect took the name of Euphuism, though it existed before the days of Euphues, and indeed hangs like a faint scent of musk over most early Elizabethan prose Discredited and ridiculed, Euphuism was not only long in dying, but lived to impress indelibly the style of the greatest English writers of the next age, and Shakespeare himself

The novel was a rapidly deciduous growth thrown off to prepare the minds and tongues of Englishmen for an infinitely more important and more national literary manifestation. The exotic, artificial romance was not nearly strong enough meat for the appetites of men, or of women either, awakened to the gust of life at the close of the glorious Tudor epoch. In the extreme fermentation of public and private existence, the violence and intensity of passion experienced in real life easily and finally rendered insipid the flowery, languid stories of the Euphuists When life moved so quickly, and presented people with such startling reverses of fortune, when foreign politics, and home churchcraft, and the bewilderment of infatuated love, and the intrepidity of murder, and a thousand other forms of passionate, ill regulated vitality, were surring the fantasy of the populace, so that life itself was more exciting than a thousand romances, it was impossible to be interested for any length of time in long, blossomy conversations between the melancholy shepherd Menaphon and the fair nymph Samela of Cyprus And out of this impatience grew the great literary invention of the Elizabethan age, the stage-play

We have already passed in review, in earlier divisions of this volume, the Tudor miracles and moralities which illustrated the theatrical spirit for men who had not been touched by the new In these interesting but primitive compositions plot had been entirely wanting, and everything approaching to evolution of character These plays had been humorous, sensible, and lively, they had depended upon allegory for their interest, and they had been independent of all exotic influence first years of Elizabeth certain faint efforts had been made at creating a native comedy and a native tragedy, and these will be chronicled in their place. But the mediæval play had to die before the Renaissance play could be created According to an early legend, the boy Shakespeare went from his home to Coventry to watch a performance of the old pageant of Corpus Christi It was the new world contemplating the old world, and between these two there was really no essential bond. The attempts made, therefore, to modernise the surface of the mediæval play, and give it a humanist veneer, are of purely antiquarian

The first Renaissance English play belongs to a period earlier than that with which this division deals. Nor was Ralph Roister Doister a farce on English lines at all, but founded almost servilely on a classical model There were several successors to Udall's clever adaptation of the manner of Plautus, but none of them led any further in the development of In tragedy the same process was repeated, under a worse model, the so-called The interest taken in this bombastic Seneca. Latin tragedy in the early years of Elizabeth. was very remarkable, and culminated in the production of Garbudue of Sackville and Norton, first performed in 1562. The irrational character of these dramatic experiments, and the fact that they led nowhere, and were incapable of development and extension, struck contemporary minds after a quarter of a century of bewildered subjection to Seneca. The most advanced critic to day could scarcely define the faults of an early Elizabethan dramatist better than Whetstone did (in 1578) when he declared him to be 'most vain, indiscreet, and out of order, he first grounds his work on impossibilities, then in three hours runs he through the world, marries, gets children, makes children men, men to conquer kingdoms, murder monsters, and bringeth gods from herven, and fetcheth devils from hell'

What delayed the wholesome revival of the modern drama in England was the persistence with which the university wits, such as Sidney, Harvey, and Gosson, determined that this incoherence could only be abated by a stricter adherence to classical rules of composition Their great mistake was to regard the drama as a purely intellectual or literary thing, without taking into consideration the material requirements of an audience in a theatre But, while the scholars were wrangling in their closets as to the proper way in which the precepts of Aristotle should be carried out, the common people, who had never heard of Aristotle or of the unities, but who desired to be amused and alarmed in commodious play houses, on their own lines, with intelligible chronicle plays and farces, were really preparing the foundations of a national drama. Hence, in discussing the movement of our dramatic literature, it is im possible to escape from a subject not properly dealt with in this volume, namely, the history of the stage, or to decline to acknowledge the importance of the date 1576, as that of the year in which the great building of advanced suburban theatres began

We are here, however, confronted by the extremely curious fact that it seems impossible for us to discover what happened in the English theatrical world between this date and 1587. In spite of endless research and conjecture, these ten years, the conduct of which would be of extraordinary interest to us, obstinately refuse to deliver up their dramatic secrets. It is certain that several of the court plays of I vly, curious anomalies in stage craft, which faintly prophesied of the poetic comedy of the next age, were performed, and it is also certain that one play of real merit, in its fragmentary way, The Arraignment of Paris, by George Peele, was played in 1584 by the Children of the Chapel Royal before Queen Elizabeth. Robert Greene, afterwards so famous, in these years 'lest the University [of Cambridge] and away to London, where [he] became an author of plays' But these early dramas of Greene have, without exception, perished or vanished Perhaps the play of Sir Clyomon and Sir Clamydes, a strange medley of mediæval and Hellenic romance, belongs to this same dim period of transition Putting together these and what other scraps of evidence we possess, we come to the conclusion that in these years, from 1576 to 1587, there was a tendency to the employment of Euphuism on the stage, to an avoidance of serious passion, that there was preferred the use of rhyming metres, blank verse still lacking the sonority desirable for the public stage, that no attention was seriously given to characterisation or construction, the two qualities upon which drama really depends, and that for all these reasons there was a suspended animation, the English drama being unable to start, although absolutely ready to do so, until some man or men should arise strong enough to sweep these obstacles out of her path

It seems quite certain that neither Peele nor Lyly, though each had a graceful talent, was man enough to do this, and what Greene was doing when he was not penning love-pamphlets is so absolutely unknown to us that conjecture But the revolutionary qualities wanted were unquestionably met with in two men of extraordinary fertility of invention and resolute originality-Kyd and Marlowe Of these Marlowe had doubtless the greater genius, the tradition of the seventeenth century, combined with very recent discoveries, leads us to suspect that Kyd was the more innovating spirit. fault of allegorical pastorals like Endymion and The Arraignment of Paris was that they were too gentle, they merely brushed the surface of life. These were social entertainments, in which political and courtly complications were touched with so timid a hand that if the official world turned upon the poet he might say that he did not mean anything at all, and that the resemblance was accidental. But such plays ill-matched the deep excitement, the audacious keenness, of the maturing Elizabethan age, and therefore we see, in 1587, two dramatists, supported unquestionably by their strong personal friendship, rise like Harmodius and Aristogeiton to free English drama by an unexpected death-blow from the tyranny of a paralysing conventionality

The blow was struck by Varlowe in Dr Faustus and by Kyd in The Spanish Tragedy But to comprehend the nature of the revolution worked by these two men we must realise what their personal relations were with their time It wanted but a little that these twin planets of our dramatic dawn were burned at the stake for their atheistical and infamous opinions, they were in actual danger of a death as violent as any which they drew One of them actually died by the hand of a murderer, and both were, in their brief, fiery, and tempestuous lives, the prototypes of the melodramatic villains of their own tragedies Neither Kyd nor Marlowe shrank from the contemplation (we must not say the committal) in real life of those 'carnal, bloody, and unnatural acts' which they loved to describe If the character of Faustus fascinated them, it was because they saw in him what they wished to be-a turbulent innovator, self supported in a paroxysm of intellectual arrogance and revolt These new authors, in addition to the startling frankness with which they voiced the pride of the age, each possessed one dramatic quality of the highest and most pregnant value had discovered the secret of the evolution of a plot, Marlowe invented the sonorous fullness of an effective stage blank verse. These two things had but to be united, and tragedy was on the right road The same year, 1587 (it is probable), saw the first working out of the story of Hamlet in a popular Senecan form, due, almost certainly, to Kyd We incur little danger of mistake, indeed, if we take that date as the practical start-year of drama in its finished form in England. It is worthy of note that, while tragedy is thus taking hold of the English mind in deep romantic intensity, it is fiding from the stage of France, where it seemed to be so passionately welcomed Before Marlowe and Kyd are vocal, Jodelle and Garnier (with whom Kyd had much in common) have quitted the stage, and have left no direct descendants.

If we turn to narrative and lyrical poetry, we do not find the same abrupt transitions as meet us in the history of drama, but we observe a rapid upward development. Oddly enough, the period is limited, at its beginning and its close, by a publication of Spenser-The Shepherd's Calendar in 1579, and the first three books of The Faerie Quien in 1590 As will in due course be shown, Spenser himself almost wholly disappears from our view during those years, but the progress of poetry, set in action by the startling novelties of The Shepherd's Calendar, Sidney's friendship with Spenser, and his presidency of the 'Areopagus,' a sort of club which set out to revolutionise poetry in a wholly undesirable way, dates from a year or so earlier than this, and Sidney, in defiance of his own rules, begins to write the canzonets and pastoral odes of the Arcadia, and, what is much more to the point, to introduce the sonnet and celebrate the alembicated loves of Astrophel and Stella But these poems are not seen by the general public, and a profound sensation is made by Thomas Watson, whose Hicatompathia, or Passionate Cinturie of Love, is published in 1582. Watson has, perhaps, not left behind him a single poem, a single line, which lives in English literature, yet his historical position is a very prominent one He marks the disappearance of the last traces of mediævalism, and the completion of the triumph of southern influences Watson is a Petrarchist of the late order, of the class of Bembo and Molza, and of his sonnets may be said what Dr Garnett has excellently remarked of those of the last mentioned Italian, that they are 'as inexpressive as harmonious-1 perpetual silvery chime which soothes the ear, but conveys nothing to the mind'

It was, in all probability, a very propitious thing for English poetry that the Italian verse of the Cinque Cento declined so suddenly and lost its prestige so completely The Petrarchists, after the brilliant success of their innumerable warblings, ceased to sing, or ceased to find listeners, in the middle of the century, the latest and perhaps the best of them, Bernardo Tasso and Luigi Tansillo, died in 1568-69 There was, therefore, no contemporary Italian, of their own exact class, before whom Sidney and Watson were tempted to bow down most they could do was to become the English Tansillo and Molza of a later age In spite of the weakness of their cause, their success was considerable It must not be overlooked that a strong chord of Petrarchism continued to run through the complicated music of the great Elizabethan period and was not drowned until it melted into the grotesque melody of the disciples of Donne Drayton, Daniel, Barnfield, even Shakespeare himself, are full of Petrarchism, and it is only proper to remember that all this was started and given direction to by Sidney and Watson, but by Watson most of all

By the side of the Petrarchan there flourished the pastoral manner, borrowed from Italy and the Peninsula. One of the books of the Cinque Cento which most deeply influenced the literature of the world, and not least of England, was the Arcadia of Sannazaro (1504), a pastoral romance, written in careful, but not Euphuistic, prose, plentifully besprinkled with bucolic verse This work positively fascinated the youth of Europe, and was imitated, to satiety and ridi The Portuguese, in cule, in every language particular, greatly delighted in it, and it was i poet of Portugal, Jorge de Montemayor, whose Castilian pastoral of the Diana (1558) wakened in the youthful Sidney the ambition to compete in English pastoral with the poets of Southern Europe. Sidney had imitated Montemayor and Sannazaro before these poets were widely known in England, a version of the Diana (1598), by Bartholomew Young, acquired great popularity Pastoral was started in England in two species—the Virgilian and Chaucerian, mingled in a kind of national eclogue, by Spenser, the purely artificial and Sannazaran by Sidney-and this also had its vogue throughout the next half century, as exemplified in the direct scholars of Spenser, such as Phineas Fletcher and Browne, and in the more voluptuous dramatists from Beaumont to Shirley

One prominent section of literature remains to be spoken of, and that is prose we find much less to be said of a definite kind. The great years from 1570 to 1590 were years of national concentration on the difficult and supremely fascinating art of verse, and very secondary and desultory attention was given to Of late what is perhaps an pedestrian prose exaggerated attention has been given to the useful and picturesque but prolix translations of the carly Elizabethan age Sir Thomas North, Philemon Holland, Savile, and the rest have their place in the development of prose, but they were awk tard writers, rocking fever ishly between a vulgar riciness and an inappropriate pomposity of language. In Lyly, for the first time we meet with an English writer of measured and occasionally elegant prose. although even Lyly is painfully prolix and mannered In Hooker, for the first time, we discover really competent and practical prose. capable of conducting an argument with sanity, lucidity, and dignity, but Hooker published Much of the practical nothing until 1594 prose of the early Elizabethan is energetic, and it is possible from a dozen writers to select brief passages of extreme magnificence, but it is difficult to perceive that they wrote upon any system, or that it had ever crossed their minds that prose should be given, and could descrive, no less sustained technical attention than verse itsclf After 1500 there came a burst of geographical and adventurous prose, much of which makes exceedingly good reading to-day Nothing is more delightful than to plunge into those miscellanics in which Hakluyt and afterwards Purchas preserved the 'memorable evploits of late years by our English nation achieved, from the greedy and devouring jaws of oblivion' Most of all, the progress of biblical and liturgical prose deserves our careful attention, the Bishops' Bible of Parker (1568) being the companion of men who gradually became dissatisfied with its imperfections, and demanded from the Conference of 1604 a revision of the English Scriptures, which led, in 1611, to the publication of a Bible the most faultless and the most melodiously picturesque to be found in any European ver-For the success of this crowning trophy of Jacobcan genius praise must not be withheld from Lancelot Andrewes, the editor or chairman of James I's learned committee of ecclesinstics

We have now indicated a few of the influences and the surroundings which moulded English imaginative thoughts in the days which preceded the magnificent burst of genius in the midst of which the voice of Shakespeare When the creators were at work, was raised simultaneously building the vast palaces of Elizabethan poetry, it became difficult to recollect the very names of their predecessors has therefore seemed well that we should linger a little on the movement of those gentle forces which led up to the great explosion of genius, in order to prepare readers for the phenomena which will be presented to them in due chronological course From 1591 to 1616that is to say, during the quarter of a century peculiarly identified with the activity of Shake speare-English literature was raised to an extraordinary height of splendour and originality, and this must now be studied in the detailed life of its individual exponents

One general order of ideas may, however, be Without giving way to the tendency suggested to see historical events immediately reflected in literary productions, we may yet perceive to advantage the many ways in which Elizabethan literature proceeded on lines continuous with thoseworked along by the great Tudor statesmen First of all, it is impossible not to be struck by the contributions to the sentiments of national independence offered by one great author after There was this difference between, another let us say, the polished epics of Italy and The Faerie Queen, that the one represented a vain aspiration and the other a living entity. When Spenser drew a picture of that newly-invented paragon of chivalry, the English gentleman, he painted something at once more attractive and more romantic than Orlando or Rinaldo had proved on the realistic canvas of Boiardo while he seemed, with his allegory and his fabulous geography, to be farther from existence than the southerners, he was actually moving much nearer to it, because he presented the veritable sentiment of the English champions who surrounded the virgin Gloriana on her throne

The literature of this magnificent period, in its pride of mich and audacity of purpose, seems to support the prerogative of the English Crown It is the literature of a nation that has just awakened to a sense of its strength, its isolation, its almost insupportable inward perti-With the sudden development of political independence, there came an apprehension of the necessity of intellectual and spiritual cultivation Every accomplishment helped to make England great, and while the Italian laboured at high astronomy or was martyred in the cause of ethical speculation without a spark of national enthusiasm, the Elizabethan turned his little copy of verses or practised an air on the theorbo with the belief that England would be so far the richer for The courtier, the speculator, the his chergy soldier, the poet, the adventurer on perilous sers, the patient and responsible public servant, were found united in a single personage in these 'spacious' times The careers of men like Raleigh and Sidney appeal to us all, but those of Fulke Greville, of John Davies, of Sackville may teach us still more of this devo tion to the day's service, be it what it may, of I

this noble determination to do well whatever England may call a man to do, be it successively the task of a poet, a diplomatist, a member of Parliament, a lawyer, a financier, or a soldier

It would be absurd, however, to pretend that Elizabethan literature was sustained at these Spenser and Shakespeare crystal heights exemplify the chivalrous aspect at its best, we shall discover little chivalry in Marston and Ioseph Hall Yet even in the grossest and most turbid of the Elizabethans we find abundance of that energy and intensity which are the signs of life and youth, and their faults are those out of which a great nation grows into serenity and strength If the playwrights were coarse and rough, they were at least rough with the crudity of a full bodied vintage, a wine that suffers in its youth for the stoutness and vigour This is quite another thing from of its quality the malady of morals which falls on a feeble and decaying people, and which is like the flatness of a thin, indifferent vintage kept too long In the general fusion of forces which took place in the reign of Elizabeth, a certain confused violence could not fail to be a symptom, in literature as well as in politics and Church matters I ife suddenly began to be many-sided and copious, and elements of turbidity were inevitable in so tumultuous a torrent of thought

The reader of the following pages will be able to appreciate what were the main imaginative forms taken by this redundancy and ebullience of national sentiment. If he passes suddenly from 1591 to 1616, which we take as the close of our third period, he will be surprised at the change he encounters At the first date the world was opening before the inexperienced poet, at the second, all experiments have been tried, all heights reached in the summer of English poetry, and the funtest breath of autumnal sadness is felt in the air Wc left Raleigh dreaming of Guiana, we find Ben Jonson and Donne blushing to remember their marriage odes on Somerset's hideous wedding The man of the moment is Bacon, the Spanish Marringe fills the air Shakespeare is dving. and Beaumont, Fletcher's dramatic art has already become a formula, the school of Spenser has sunk into silence Everywhere there is a sense of the meridian being passed, in literature, as in politics, the high rapture cannot be sustained, and the independence of a people is no sooner broadly established than it begins to cultivate the weaknesses of other settled nations

In nine years more, at the death of James I in 1625, what we permitted ourselves to suspect has become matter of patent observation Liverywhere the symptoms of decay and decline Bacon is degraded, and dying, are obvious. and no one takes his place. Ben Jonson is paralysed, and 'sick and sid,' and his 'sons in Apollo 'have not a tithe of his genius is dead, and his work descends to Massinger Of the glorious romantic poets which had made London the capital of Parnassus, the weary Heywood is still hanging about the stage, Middleton is closing appropriately in Anything for a Queet Life, and with Ford and Shirley a little momentary revival, a martin's summer, is preparing England for a long period of darkness. In all this we trace nothing more nor less than the collapse of energy which answers in the history of the imagination of a people to nervous exhaustion in an individual England was tired of her rapture, her transcendent effort, and she was ready to sink into the repose of a convention

We may, perhaps, discover a further reason for the mulady which begins to afflict her from the reign of James I onwards to the end of the Commonwealth One palpable cause of the neglect of letters has been always pointed out in the confusion of political issues, and the concentration of popular attention on vast constitutional problems But this easy solution of the difficulty is not to be accepted without a protest In the first place, the decline of literature was proceeding at full speed while the political world was still quiet, and when none but the most far-sighted patriots anticipated a grand On the other hand, it is by no upheavil means certain that an eager interest in high matters of State is necessarily unfavourable to the production of literature The ecclesiastical storms which led to the appointment of Elizabeth's High Commission swept through every household in England, but their violence and bluster did not brush a grain of jewel-dust off the wings of The Faerie Queen, or delay by an hour the evolution of the genius of Shakespeare Nor is it at all certain that the disturbed condition of English politics half a century later had any ill effect on the imagination of Milton We have to beware of attributing to politics too direct an influence on the waxing and waning of poetical literature

When we close the brilliant and unparalleled

period the examination of which we are now about to commence, what we do find is that England did not escape that curious blight or malady of the mind which fell on every other part of Europe, and marked, in so doing, the close of the Renaissance. This was the preoccupation with a forced ingenuity of fancy which is known by so many names, and which affected so many literatures in different but contemporary ways, as in Donne with us, Marino with the Italians, Gongora with the Spamards In this a morbid horror of the obvious leads the writer into forms of thought and speech which are inelegant and non-natural, and in which the proportion between what is essential and what is trifling is lost quite exact to say that this change consisted in a decay of taste, because ugly and monstrous things had been written, with an almost innocent nonchalance, by the poets of the great period, while those of the decline were often prettier and more graceful in trifles than their masters had been But there was a decay of the sense of relative values, and this we see exemplified in the works of a man of such amazing genius and force as Donne, who says the most penetrating and the most silly thing at the same moment, not (as it would appear) distinguishing what is silly from what is penetrating, and having no criterion by which to judge his creations

So that, without paradox, we may say that what this period of our literary history did, in its excessive and volcanic strain of production, was to wear out and paralyse those faculties by which it held its own acts in the balance It lost the sense of proportion, the power of parallel measurement, so that it stumbled and fell, as those do who by some affection of the nerves have lost the power of regulating their What was left for further generations, then, to do was to recover the measuring and weighing power by means of a strict and tonic mental discipline And it is thus, and thus alone, that we can comprehend the readiness with which those whose childhood had been spent in the light of Spenser and Shakespeare were willing to subject themselves to the Aristotelian rules and the versification of Waller and Denham It was that the blaze and blare of Elizabethan genius had worn out their capacities of enjoyment, and they had to subject themselves to a system of intellectual discipline to recover their mental tone

EDMUND GOSSE,

Thomas Sackville.—In the reign of Elizabeth the first great name in poetry is that of Thomas Sackville, Lord Buckhurst (1536-1608), from 1604 Earl of Dorset, and from 1599 Lord High-Treasurer of England, he has already come before us in the character of a dramatic writer (page 157) Probably towards the end of the reign of Queen Mary, and before he actively engaged in public life, Sackville planned the design of the Myrroure for Magistrates, somewhat on the lines of Lydgate's Falls of Princes (itself based on Boccaccio see above at The poet was to descend into the underpage 79) world, as in the plan of Virgil and Dante, and converse with the most famous persons in English history who had suffered sad reverses of fortune, these were each to tell his own story as a mirror and warning to statesmen and rulers wrote the noble Induction or Prologue describing the descent, and powerfully sketching the allegorical personages about the porch of hell, and told the tale of Henry Stafford, Duke of Buckingham, first of the shades to come up to the visitors—the Buckingham who first supported Richard III and then suffered for intriguing against him More than this Sackville did not contribute to the scheme, but what he wrote has alone real poetic value. The plan was continued by George Baldwin and George Terrers, and the whole published in 1559 and Sackville's part, though obviously meant as introduction to the whole, did not appear till 1563, and then near the end of the book. The Induction is a truly remarkable poem, a startling apparition when contrasted with the work of such predecessors Hallam said it 'unites the school of Chaucer and Lydgate to the Faery Queen,' its pictures of gloom and sorrow, its allegorical personifications, rival Spenser's own work. The subject was not new, the stanza was that which Chaucer had made familiar, but the melody of the verse, the power and truth of the drawing, the dignity of the presentation, and the poetic charm were new and rare. Tottel's 'Miscellany' (1557) is the only other work of this time that contains anything comparable to Sackville in poetic value, and in rhythm and melody and metric perfection Sackville far sur passes Wyatt and Surrey Spenser recognised his own debt to his predecessor, and was unquestionably influenced by him

From the Induction to the 'Myrroure for Magistrates'

An hideous hole all vaste, withouten shape,
Of endles depth, overwhelmde with ragged stone,
With ough mouth and griesly jawes doth gape,
And to our sight confounds itselfe in one.
Here entred wee and yeeding forth anone
An horrible lothly lake wee might discerne
As blacke as pitch, that clepted is Averne

A deadly gulfe where nought but rubbish grows, With fowle blacke swelth in thickned lumps that hes, Which up in th' ayre such stinking vapors throws That over there may flie no fowle but dyes, Choaked with the pestilent savors that arise,

Hither wee come whence forth wee still did pace, In dreadfull feare aimd the dreadfull place

And first within the porch and jawes of Hell, Sate deepe Remorse of Conscience, all besprent With teares, and to her selfe oft would shee tell Her wretchednes, and, cursing, never stent fo sob and sighe, but ever thus lament With thoughtfull care, as shee that, all in vaine, Would were and waste continually in payne

Her eyes unsteadfast, rolling here and there, Whirled on each place, as place that vengeaunce brought, So was her minde continually in feare, Fossed and tormented with the tedious thought Of those detested crymes which shee had wrough, With dreadful cheare, and lookes throwne to the skie, Wishing for death, and yet shee could not die

Next sawe wee Dread, all trembling how hee shooke, With foote uncertaine, profered here and there, Benumm'd of speach, and with a ghastly looke Searched every place, all pale and dead for feare, His cap borne up with staring of his heare, Stoyned and amazed at his own shade for dreede, And fearing greater daungers than was neede.

And next within the entry of this lake,
Sate fell Revenge, gnashing her teeth for ire,
Devising means how shee may vengeaunce take,
Never in rest, till she have her desire,
But frets within so far forth with the fire
Of wreaking flames, that now determines she
To dy by death, or venged by death to bee

When fell Revenge, with bloudy foule pretence, Had showed herself, as next in order set, With trembling limbs we softly parted thence, Till in our eyes another sight wee met, When fro my heart a sigh forthwith I fet, Rewing, alas, upon the woefull plight Of Misery, that next appeared in sight fetched

His face was leane, and somedeale pyned away, And eke his hands consumed to the bone, But what his body was, I cannot say, For on his carkas rayment had he none, Save clouts and patches pieced one by one, With staffe in hand, and scrip on shoulder cast, His chief defence agaynst the winters blast

His foode, for most, was wild fruites of the true, Unlesse sometime some crums fell to his share, Which in his wallet long, God wot, kept hee, As on the which full daintely would fare, His drink the running stream, his cup the bare Of his palm closed, his bed, the hard cold ground, To this poore life was Misery ybound

Whose wretched state when wee had well beheld,
With tender ruth on him and on his feres, comrades
In thoughtfull cares forth then our pace wee held,
And by and by another shape apperes
Of greedy Care, still brushing up the breres, briefs
His knuckles knob'd, his flesh deepe dented in,
With tawed hands and hard ytanued skin

The morror e gray no sconer hath Legar
To spreade his light even peping in our eyes,
When hee is up, and to his worke yran,
But let the night, blacke misty mantles rise
And with foule dar, e never so much disguise
If a favre bright day, yet ceaseth hee no while,
But hath his candels to prolong his toyle

By him lay heary Sleepe, the cosin of Death, I lat on the ground, and still as any stone, A very corps, save yielding forth a breath, Small I cape tool hee whom Fortune frowned on, Or whom shee lifted up into the throne Of high renoune, but, as a living death, So dead alive, of life he drew the breath

The bodys rest, the quiet of the heart,
The travailes ease, the still nights feer was he,
And of our life in earth the better part,
Keaver of sight and vet in whom wee see Things oft that tyde and oft that never bee,
Without respect esteming equally
King Crossus pompe and Irus poverty 1

And next in order sad, Old Age wee found His heard all houre his eyes hollow and blind, With drouping chere still poring on the ground, As on the place where nature him assigned Forest, v hen that the Sisters had untwyned His vitall thred, and ended with their knyfe. The fleting course of fast deelyning lyfe.

There heard wee him with broke and hollow plaint Rew vith him selfe his end approching fast, And all for nought his wretched mind torment With sweete remembraunce of his pleasures past, and fresh delives of lusty youth forewast, assted Recounting vine's, how would hee sob and shrick, and to be vong aguin of Jove beseeke.

But an the cruell fates so fixed bee I hat tyme forepast cannot retourne agavne, I his one reque t of Jove vet praved hee— That, in such withred plight, and wretched paine, As eld, accompanied with his lothsome trayne, Had brought on him, all were it woe and griefe, He might a while vet linger forth his life,

And not so soone descend into the pit,
Where Death, when hee the mortall corps hath slayne,
With reckless hand in grave doth cover it
Thereafter never to enjoy agryne
The gladsome light, but, in the ground ylayne,
In depth of darknesse waste and yeare to nought,
As hee had nere into the world been brought

But who had scene him sobling how her stood.
Unto hunselfe, and how her would bemone.
His youth forepast, as though it wrought him good to take of youth, all were his youth foregone,.
He would have mused, and mervayled much whereon this wretched. Age should like desire so fayne.
At I knowed fall we'll lyfe do hibut length his payne.

Crookebackt he was, tooth shaken, and blere eyed Went on three feete, and sometyme crept on foure, With olde lame bones, that rattled by his syde, His scalp all pilled, and hee with eld forlore, His withred fist still knocking at Deaths dore, Fumbling and driveling as hee drawes his breath, For briefe, the shape and messenger of Death.

And fast by him pale Malady was placed,
Sore sicke in bed, her colour all foregone,
Bereft of stomacke, savour, and of taste,
Ae could shee brooke no meate but broths alone,
Her breath corrupt, her kepers every one
Abhorring her, her sickness past recure,
Detesting phisicke and all phisickes cure

But, oh, the dolefull sight that then wee see!
Wee turned our looke, and on the other side
A gnesly shape of Famine mought wee see
With greedy lookes, and gaping mouth, that cryed
And roared for meate, as shee should there have dyed,
Her body thin and bare as any bone,
Whereto was left nought but the case alone.

And that, alas! was gnawne on every where, All full of holes, that I ne mought refraync From tears to see how shee her arms could teare And with her teeth gnash on the bones in vayne, When, all for nought, shee fayne would so sustayne Her starven corps, that rather seemed a shade Than any substaunce of a creature made

Great was her force, whome stone wall could not stay Her tearing mayles snatching at all shee sawe, With gaping jawes, that by no meanes ymay Be satisfied from hunger of her mawe, But eates herselfe as shee that hath no lawe, Gnawing, alas, her carkas all in vayne, Where you may count each sinew, bone, and vayne.

On her while we thus firmly fixt our cyes,
That bled for ruth of such a drery sight,
Lo, suddenly she shrickt in so huge wise
As made Hell gates to shiver with the might,
Wherewith a dart we sawe how it did light
Right on her brest, and therewithall pale Death
Enthrilling it, to reve her of her breath

And by and by a dumb dead corps we sawe, Heavy and colde the shape of Death aright, That daunts all earthly creatures to his lawe, Against whose force in vaine it is to fight, Ne peeres, ne princes, nor no mortall wight, No Townes, ne Realmes, Cityes, ne strongest Tower, But all perforce must yield unto his power

His dart anon out of the corps her tooke,
And in his hand (a dreadfull sight to see)
With great tryumph eftsoones the same hee shooke,
That most of all my feares affrayed mee
His body dight with nought but bones, parde,
The naked shape of man there saw I plaine,
All save the flesh, the sinew, and the veine

Lastly, stood Warre, in glittering armes velad, With visage grym, stern lookes, and blackly hewed In his right hand a naked s vorde he had, That to the hilts was all with bloud embrued, And in his left (that kings and kingdoms rewed)

[.] It is was the began of Ithaca, employed as messenger by Lebus, on satisfies

Famine and for he held, and therewithall, He razed townes, and threw downe towres and all

Cities he sackt, and realmes (that whilome flowerd In honour, glory, and rule, above the rest)
He overwhelmde, and all theire fame devoured,
Consumed, destroyed, wasted, and never ceast,
Till he their wealth, their name, and all oppresst
His face forchewed with wounds, and by his side
There hung his targe, with gashes deepe and wide

Then first came Henry Duke of Buckingham, His cloak of black all pilled, and quite forworne, Wringing his hands, and Fortune oft doth blaine Which of a duke had made him now her skorne With gastly looks, as one in maner lorne, Oft spred his armes, stretcht hands he joynes as fast, With ruful cheer, and vapored eyes upcast

His cloake he rent, his manly brest hee beat, His hayre all torne about the place it lay My heart so molt to see his griefe so great, As felingly methought it dropt away, His eyes they whirld about withouten stay With stormy sighes the place did so complayne, As if his heart at ech had burst in twayne firise he began to tell his dolefull tale, And thrise the sighes did swallow up his voyce? At each of which he shricked so withall, As though the heavens rived with the noyse, Till at the last recovering his voyce, Supping the teares that all his breast berayinde, On cruel Γortune weeping thus he playinde

The Induction runs to eighty stanzas, the Complaint to over a hundred. Our text is substantially that of the edition of 1587. The first of the seventy-four characters in the completed work is King Albanact of Scotland in 1085 B.C., the last is Wolsey. King Locrinus of Britain, son of Brutus, tells his story, King Bladud and Queen Cordila also, and Julius Casar and half a dozen Roman emperors figure in the company of British notables. Sackville West edited the collected works in 1859.

George Gascoigne (1525-77), son of Sir John Gascoigne of Cardington in Bedfordshire, and descendant of the famous Chief-Justice under Henry IV, was an early dramatist (see above at page 238), one of our first saturists, an indefatigrible translator, and a pioneer in many departments of literature He studied at Cambridge, entered Gray's Inn, wrote poems, and sat in Parliament for Bedford (1557-59), but was disinherited by his father for his prodigality He married a widow (to improve his finances), was still perse cuted by creditors, set out for Holland, and served gullantly under the Prince of Orange (1572-75) Surprised by a Spanish force and taken prisoner, he was detained four months, and, on his return to England, settled at Walthamston, where he collected and published his poems He was praised by his own and the succeeding generation of writers, and experienced a share of royal favour, for he accompanied the queen to Kenilworth, and supplied part of the poetic scenic entertainments there and at Woodstock. He translated in prose and verse, from Greek, Latin, and Italian Complaynt of Phylomene, his first poem, was begun The Supposes, translated from I Suppositi of Ariosto, is the first prose comedy in English, Jocasta (1566), practically a translation from Dolce's Giocasta (which was based on the Phanissæ of Euripides), is the second tragedy in English blank verse, The Glasse of Government is an original comedy, The Steele Glas is the earliest blankverse satire, and in the Notes of Instruction on Making of Verse we have the first considerable English essay on the subject. It is pathetic that already Gascoigne thought some of the standard poetic epithets were worn out 'If I should undertake to wryte in prayse of a gentlewoman,' he says, 'I would neither praise hir christal eye nor hir cherrie lippe, etc. For these things are trita et obvia' How often have they done duty since! To such a zealous experimenter English literature obviously owes a deep debt, though much of his work is hopelessly tedious. It may be said for him that he sometimes attains freedom both in rhyme and in blank verse, and that his lyrics show even a certain grace and lightness of touch steete Glas, Gascoigne explains that he finds an oldfashioned mirror of steel greatly more truthful than those of glass (first made at Venice in 1300, but not in England until 1673) Common glass, beryl glass, and crystal he believes to be false

That age is dead, and vanisht long ago,
Which thought that steele both trusty was and true,
And needed not a foyle of contraries,
But shewde al things even as they were indeede
In steade whereof, our curious yeares can finde
The christal glass, which glimseth brave and bright,
And shewes the thing much better than it is,
Beguiled with foyles of sundry subtil sights,
So that they seeme and covet not to be

All the more reason that, having had such a trusty steel mirror bequeathed to him, the satirist should put it to some use! Thus he can show his contemporaries their faults, as in the two following extracts (the second from the Epilogus)—drunken soldiers, filse judges, usurious merchants being also not forgotten

On the Country Gentleman.

The Gentleman which might in countric keepe A plenteous boorde and feed the fatherlesse With pig and goose, with mutton, beefe, and veale (Yea, now and then a capon and a chicke), Will breake up house and dwel in market townes A loiting life, and like an Epicure But who meanwhile defends the common welth? Who rules the flocke when sheperds so are fled? Who stayes the staff which shuld uphold the state? Forsoth, good Sir, the Lawyer leapeth in—Nay, rather leapes both over hedge and ditch, And rules the rost—but few men rule by right.

O knights, O Squires, O Gentle blouds yborne, You were not borne onely for your selves Your countrie clayme, some part of all your paines, there should you live, and therein should you toyle, To hold up right and banish cruel wrong, To help the pore, to bridle backe the riche, To panish vice and vertue to advaunce, To see God service, and Belzebub supprest. You should not trust lieftenaunts in your rome, and let them sway the scepter of your charge, Whiles you meanwhile know scarcely what is don, hor yet can yeld accompt if you were callde.

On the Court Ladies.

Beholde, ny lorde, v hat monsters muster here, With Angels face and harmfule helish harts, With smyling lool es, and deep deceiful thoughts, With tender skinnes and stony cruel mindes, With stealing steppes, yet forward fecte to friude. Pehold, behold, they never stande content, With God, with kinde, with any helpe of arte, I at curle their locks with bodkins and with braids, But dye their heare with sundry subtill sleights, But paint and slicke till fayrest face be foule, But bumbast, bolster, frisle, and perfume They marre with muske the balme which nature made, And dig for death in dellicatest dishes. The yonger sorte come pyping on apace, In whi tles made of fine entiring wood, Fill they have caught the birds for whom they birded The elder sorte go stately stalking on, And on their backs they beare both land and fee, Castles and towres, revenewes and receits, Lordships and minours, fines, yea, fermes and al What should these be? Speak you, my lovely lord They be not men, for v hy, they have no beards They be no boyes which weare such side long gowns, I licy be no Gods, for al their gallant glosse, they be no divels, I trow, that seme so saintish. What he they? Women masking in men's weedes-With dutchkin dublets, and with jerkins jaggde With Spanish spangs and ruffes fet out of France, With high copt hats and feathers flaunt a flaunt-They, to be sure, seem even -vo to men, indeed!

The Arraignment of a Lover

At Beautyes barre as I dyd stande,
When I alse Suspect accused mee,
'George, quod the judge, 'holde up thy hande,
Thou ar arraigned of flatterve,
Fell, therefore, howe vijt thou bee tryed,
Whose judgment here wijt thou abyde?'

'My Lord,' quod I, 'this lady here,
Whom I estecine above the rest,
Doth I nowe my guilte, if any were,
Wherefore hir doome shall please me best verdict
Let hir bee judge and jurour bothe,
To trye mee guiltlesse by myne oathe.'

Quoth Beastle 'No, it fitteth not A prince hir-elfe to judge the cause, Will is our justice, vell you wot, Appointed to discusse our Lawes, If you vill guiltlesse seeme to soc, God and your country quitte you so' Then Crafte the cryer called a quest,
Of whom was Falshoode foremost feere,
A pack of pickethankes were the rest,
Which came false witnesse for to beare,
The jury suche, the Judge unjust,
Sentence was said 'I should be trust'

meser

Jelous the jayler bound mee fast,
To hear the verdict of the byll,
'George,' quod the judge, 'nowe thou are east,
Thou must goe hence to Heavie Hill,
And there be hanged all by the head,
God rest thy soule when thou art dead!'

Downe fell I then upon my knee,
All flatte before Dame Beauties face,
And cried 'Good Ladye, pardon mee!
Which here appeale unto your grace,
You knowe if I have beene untrue,
It was in too much praysing you

'And though this judge doe make suche haste,
To shed with shame my guiltlesse blood,
Yet let your pittle first be plac't
To save the man that meant you gool,
So shall you shewe yourself a Queene,
And I maye bee your servaunt seene'

Quod Beauty 'Well, bicause I guesse
What thou dost meane hencefoerth to flee,
Although thy faultes deserve no lesse
Than Justice here hath judged thee,
Wylt thou be bounde to stynt all strife,
And be true prisoner all thy lyfe?'

'Yea, Madame,' quod I, 'that I shall,
Loe fayth and trueth my suerties!'
'Why, then,' quod she, 'come when I call,
I aske no better warrantise.'
Thus am I Beauties bounden thrill,
At hir command when shee doth call.

There are an edition of Gascoigne by W C Hazlitt (1863-69) reprints by Arber of the Instruction, the I hylomene and the Steele Glas (1863) and a Life by Schelling (Boston 1893)

Thomas Tusser (1524-80) was, in Fuller's words, 'successively a musician, schoolmaster, serving-man, husbandman, grazier, poet, more skilful in all than thriving in any vocation.' Sprung of a good stock near Witham, in Essex, he was trained especially in singing and music, became a chorister at St Paul's and elsewhere, studied at Eton and Cambridge, and lived at court for ten years as retainer and musician to He then tried farming both in Lord Paget. Suffolk and in Norfolk, but without success, about 1559 was a singer in Norwich Cathedral, firmed taxes in Essex, became a servant at Trinity Hall, Cambridge, but died in London, a prisoner for debt, in 1580. His highly didactic poem, a Hundreth Good Pointes of Husbandrie, first published in 1557, is a series of practical directions for farming, expressed in always rude but not always dull and sometimes quite pointed dactylic verse, and many pro-crbs are traced back to himwas also a Hundreth Poyntes of Good Hussirie, and the two were finally expanded (1573) into Five Hundreth Pointes of Good Husbandry united to as many of Good Husbandry, united to as many of Good Husbandry, of which there have been a score of reprints and editions, including one in Scott's edition of the Somers Tracts, and one for the English Dialect Society by Payne and Herrtage in 1878 He has been called the British Varro, Scott praises his minute and comprehensive observation, his quaint and pointed style.

The following verses, not consecutive, will show his shrewdness and common-sense, as well as his uncouth notion of 'poetry'

Of mastines and mungrels, that many we see, a number of thousands, too many there be Watch therefore in Lent, to thy sheepe go and looke, for dogs will have vittels by hooke and by crooke.

Good Ploughman look weekly of custom and right for rostmeat on Sundaies and Thursday at night This dooing and keeping, such custom and guise, they call thee good huswife, they loue thee likewise.

As cat a good mouser is needful in house because of hir commons she killeth the mouse So rauening currs, as a meany do keep, makes maister want meat and his dog to kill sheepe.

In medow or pasture (to grow the more fine) let campers be camping in any of thine Which if ye do suffer, when low is the spring, you gaine to your self a commodious thing

The camping recommended for improving pasture is football playing, and 'camping fields' are still known where the word camping or kemping is no longer used for the game. Tusser sometimes varies his usual verse with a rhythm of shorter lines, which partly anticipates Shenstone and Cowper, as in these lines in praise of having fields enclosed or fenced

The countrie inclosed I praise, the tother delighteth not me, For nothing the wealth it doth raise to such as inferiour be. Now both of these parily I know, here somewhat I mind for to show

There swineherd that keepeth the hog there neatherd with cur and his horne, There shepheard with whistle and dog be fense to the medow and corne, There horse being tied to a balk is ready with theefe for to walke

Over and above these disadvantages, he contends that poor fields enclosed will give better returns than rich soil unenclosed

More plenty of mutton and beefe, corne, butter, and cheese of the best,
More wealth any where (to be brecfe), more people, more handsome and prest, where find ye (go search any cost) than there where enclosure is most?

The following is part of Tusser's meteorology

In winter-

North winds send haile, South winds bring raine, East winds we bewaile, West winds blow amaine, North east is too cold, South east not too warme, North west is too bold, South west doth no harme

In spring-

The North is noier to grass of all suites, The East a destroyer to hearbs and al fruites.

In summer-

The South with his showers refresheth the corne, The West to al flowers may not be forborne.

In autumn-

The West as a father all goodness doth bring, The East, a forbearer, no maner of thing, The South, as vinkind, draweth sicknes too neere, The North as a friend maketh all again cleere

Though winds do rage, as winds were wood,
And cause spring tides to raise great flood,
And lofty ships leaue anker in mud,
Bureruing many of life and of bloud,
A et, true it is, as cow chewes cud,
And trees, at spring, doth yield forth bud,
Except wind stands as neuer it stood,
It is an ill wind turnes none to good

In his Farmers' Year (1899) Mr Rider Haggard follows, but in prose, the example of Tusser, who more than three hundred years earlier tilled the land in the same county of Norfolk, he repeatedly quotes Tusser—less in appreciation of his poetry than in approval of his sentiments and opinions. Tusser knew perfectly what to do with dogs that take to lamb killing, and how to employ branches of trees to eke out hay and straw as fodder. 'Good lamb is worth gold' then as now, but, alas! by reason of the bad times for farmers, Mr Haggard seems to be less confident than his predecessor that

Good farme and well stored, good housing and drie, Good corne and good dairie, good market and nie, nigh Good shepherd, good tilman, good Jack and good Gill, Make husband and huswife their coffers to fit,

though even these aids are necessary to ward off total ruin

Queen Elizabeth deserves a niche in the literary history of the period named from her reign. Born in 1533, she was queen from 1558 to 1603 She was one of the learned ladies of her time, like Lady Jane Grey, Mildred Cooke (afterwards the Countess of Burghley), and Sir Thomas More's daughter Margaret, had many accomplishments, and was well and widely read-a better classic, it would appear, than Lady Jane, and more proficient in modern tongues She translated Boethius as When she was Ascham's pupil well as Sallust. she could already speak Latin easily, Greek moderately well, and French and Italian as perfectly as English. And her mastery of her mother-tongue is borne witness to by every recorded saying or letter of hers, her style reflects her powerful, subtle mind-terrible and insinuating by turns, cold and statel or pla, ful and geni d, unmistakably direct and trenchant or impenetrably oracular, as she willed it to be, but always memorable. Her poems, though, like her beauty, prused in her own time as unsurpassable, are less triumphant, but show at least, as Bishop Creighton puts it, that 'she was infected with the poetical fury of the times'. When in Mary's reign she was practically imprisoned in the gatehouse of Woodstock, she wrote with charcoal on a shutter this not unpoetical and quite characteristic expression of her ill humour

Oh Fortune how thy restless wavering state
Hath wrong'it with care my troubled wit,
Witness the present prison whither fate
Could bear me and the joys I quit
Thou caus'dst the guilty to be loosed
I rom bonds wherein an innocent enclosed,
Causing the guiltless to be strait reserved
And freeing those that death hid well deserved
But by her envy can be nothing wrought
So God send to my foes all they have wrought
Quoth Llizabeth, Prisoner

Bishop Creighton accepts as probably genuine the famous impromptu made when her sister the queen caused her to be plied with questions about her belief in transubstantiation

> Christ was the Word that spake it, He took the bread and brake it, And what his words did make it That I believe and take it.

Her best known poem or exercise in verse is the so called sonnet, selected by Puttenham in Eliza beth's lifetime as a specimen of the 'gorgious,' and by him described as 'a ditty of her Maiesties owne miking, passing sweete and harmonicall' Puttenham expressly says it refers to Elizabeth's alarm at the intrigues of her prisoner Mary Queen of Scots ('the daughter of Debate'), Bishop Creighton thinks it must have been written soon after Norfolk's execution. Here we follow Puttenham's version.

The doubt of future foes exiles my present joy,
And wit me warnes to shun such snares as threaten mine

At page 228 will be found Sir James Melville's 'interview' with the queen, and his notes of her conversation. The following, written in August 1588 after the defeat of the Spanish Armada, is from the Camden Society's volume (1849) of her letters to James VI

Now may appeare, my deare brother, how makee conjoined with might, strivest [sic] to make a shameful end to a vilanous beginning, for, by Gods singular fauor, having ther flete wel beaten in our narow seas, and pressing with all violence to atcheue some watering place, to continue ther pretended invation, the winds have carried them to your costes, wher I dout not the shal receaue smal succor and les welcome, vnles tholords [the Catholic earls] that so traitors like wold belie ther own prince, and promis another king reliefe in your name, be suffred to live at libertye, to dishonor you, peril you, and aduance some other (wiche God forbid you suffer them live to do) Therfor, I send you this gentilman [Sir Robert Sidney, afterwards Larl of Lucester], a rare younge man and a wise, to declare unto you my ful opinion in this greate cause, as one that neuer wyl abuse you to serve my owne turne, nor wyl you do aught that myselfe wold not perfourme, if I wer in your place You may assure yourselfe that, for my part, I dout no whit but that all this tirannical, prowd, and brainsick attempt wil be the beginning, thogh not the end, of the ruine of that king that most unkingly, even in mids of treating peace, begins this wrongful war. He hath procured my greatest glory that ment my sorest wrack, and hath so dimmed the light of his synshine, that who hathe a wyl to obtaine shame let them kipe his forses companye. But for al this, for yourselfe sake, let not the frends of Spain be suffred to yeld them forse, for thogh I feare not in the end the sequele, yet if by leaving them unhelped you may increase the English harts unto you, you shall not do the worst dede for your behalfe, for if aught should be done, your excuse wyl play the bottenx, if you make not sure worke with the likely men to do hit. Looke wel unto hit, I besiche you.

The necessity of this matter makes my skribling the more spidye, hoping that you wyl mesure my good affection with the right balance of my actions, which to you shalbe cuer such as I have professed, not douting of the reciproque of your behalfe, according as my last messengier unto you hathe at large signefied, for the wiche I rendar you a milion of grateful thankes togither, for the last general prohibition to your subjects not to fostar nor ayde our general foe, of which I dout not the observation, if the ringeleaders be safe in your hands, as I noweth God, who ever have you in his blessed kiping, with many happy years of raigne. Your most assured foung sistar and cousin,

LLIZABETH R

To my vere, good brother the Ling of Scotts.

She wrote French with almost equal freedom and vigour. But in spite of her mental gifts and acquirements, it must be added that Elizabeth does not seem to have really cared for literature or interested herself in learned men. She plud no special heed to Shakespeare's plays when they vere performed before her, and took no interest in Spenser or his work. If the Elizabethan writers made her name famous, conferred glory on her reign, and celebrated herself in extravagant terms. it was not because Elizabethan literature owed anything to her. In temper she was rather pre-Elizabethan, or at most Early Elizabethan, than truly Elizabethan. Her last literary criticism was uttered shortly before her death, but throws a light backward on her whole life-one remembers what poetry and Shakespeare were to Tennyson on his death-bed. When Elizabeth was in her last illness, Sir John Harington, her godson, was gratified to note that she 'inquired of some matters which I have written,' he says, and tried to 'feed her humour' by reading to her some of his verses, 'whereat she smuled once and was pleased to say [to the discomfited poet], "When thou dost feel creeping time at thy gate, these fooleries will please thee less ",

John Foxe, the martyrologist, was born at Boston in 1516 He studied at Oxford, where he applied himself with ardour to the study of divinity, and was ultimately drawn to the doctrines of the Reformers, the consequence being that his position in Magdalen became unbearable, and he resigned his fellowship in 1545. He was not expelled, as used to be said. He was tutor in the Lucy house at Charlecote, and then in the family of the Duchess of Richmond at Reigate, in Surrey, where he continued till the persecutions of Mary's reign made him flee for safety to the Continent. Passing through Antwerp, Frankfort, and Strasburg to Bascl, he there supported himself by correcting the press for the printer Oporinus accession of Queen Elizabeth he returned to England, and was kindly received and provided for by the Duke of Norfolk, who had been his pupil at Reigate. Through other powerful friends, he might now have obtained considerable preferment, but, entertaining conscientious scruples as to surplices and some of the ceremonies of the Church, he declined the offers made to him, except that of a prebend at Salisbury, which he accepted with reluctance He pled in vain for mercy for the persecuted Anabaptists He died in 1587

Foxe published numerous controversial treatises and sermons, besides an apocalyptic Latin mysteryplay, called Christus Triumphans (Basel, 1556) But the work that has immortalised his name is his History of the Acts and Monuments of the Christian Martyrs and Matters Ecclesiastical passed in the Church of Christ from the Primitive Beginning to these our Days, as well in other Countries as namely in England and Scotland, popularly known as Foxe's Book of Martyrs, the first part of which was published in Latin at Strasburg in 1554 The first English edition (folio) appeared in 1563. Sanctioned by the bishops, it was ordered by the Anglican Convocation of 1571 to be placed in the hall of every episcopal palace in England, and it went through four editions in Foxe's lifetime, and many more since his death. The book is not a biographical record of those whom Fove regarded as God's martyred saints, it is an enthusiastic apology of the Reformation, a fierce impeachment of the errors of the Roman Church, a compendium of controversial theology Next to the Bible it moulded the temper of English Protestants Fove's statements cannot be accepted as trustworthy evidence, if unsupported from other sources story is doubtless substantially true, although his credulity and obvious prejudice hardly suggest critical capacity in the selection of his authorities. But in those days most strong natures were prejudiced, and bitterly prejudiced, one way or People who can admire Mr Froude's brilliant gifts as a historian, and make allowance for his keen prejudices, should not be too severe on Foxe's partisanship And Foxe was no doubt as thoroughly sincere in his abhorrence of popery and papists as in his joy in the privileges of the newer light. He possessed the gift of graphic narrative, knew thoroughly how to use interesting episodes, and relieved the pathos and the horrors of his story by homely touches and even amusing episodes And his work will survive as a noble monument of English

From the 'Book of Martyrs'

[Under the year 1555 Foxe tells at length 'a Notable History of William Hunter a Young Man, an apprentice of 19 years, pursued to Death by Justice Brown, for the Gospel's Sake, worthy of all Young Men and Parents to be read. William Hunter, apprentice to a silk weaver in London was discharged from his master's em ployment for refusing to attend mals. Having returned to the house of his father at Brentwood he attracted the attention of the spiritual authorities by reading the Scriptures on the desk in Brent wood chapel. The summer Father Atwell, challenged him, and reported the matter to the Vicar he questioned him closely on transubstantiation, and reported to the magistrate Master Brown, who caused the constable to arrest Hunter and brought the heretic before Bonner, the Bishop of London Hunter was re peatedly examined by the Bishop, put in the stocks kept in irons in prison for nine months and having been five times examined, was at length condemned in the consistory at St Paul's when Foxe was present. Hunter was sent for a time to Newgate, and then to Brentwood to prepare for death. The conversations with all his various visitors, including Master Highed a gentleman of Essex, who was one of the next victims are detailed with suspicious precusion by Foxe, who gives the last part of the story thus]

In the meanetime, Williams father and mother came to him, and desired heartily of God that he might continue to the end in that good waie which hee had begun, and his mother sayde to him that she was glad that ever she was so happie to beare such a childe, which could find in his heart to lose his life for Christs names sake. Then William sayde to his mother 'For my little paine which I shall suffer, which is but a short braide, Christ hath promised me, mother,' sayd he, 'a crowne of joy may you not bee glad of that, mother' With that, his mother kneeled downe on her knees, saying 'I pray God strengthen thee, my sonne, to the end yea, I thinke thee as well bestowed as any childe that ever I bare.'

At the which words, Maister Highed tooke her in his arms, saying 'I rejoice' (and so said the others) 'to see you in this mind, and you have a good cause to rejoice.' And his father and mother both saide that they were never of other minde, but praied for him, that as he had begun to confesse Christ before men, he likewise might so continue to the end. Williams father said. I was afraid of nothing, but that myson should have bin hilled in the prison for hunger and cold, the bishop was so hard to him? But William confessed after a month that his father was charged with his boorde [board], that he lacked nothing, but had meate and cloathing enough, yea, even out of the court, both mony, meate, clothes, woode, and coales, and all things necessary.

Thus they continued in their inne, being the Swin in Brentwood, in a parlor, whither resorted many people of the country to see those good men which were there, and many of Williams acquaintance came to him, and reasoned with him, and he with them, exhorting them to come away from the abhomination of popish superstition and idolatry

Thus passing away Saturday, Sunday, and Munday, on Munday, at night, it happed that William had a dreame about two of the clock in the morning, which was this how that he was at the place where the stake was pight where he should be burned, which (as hee thought in his dreame) was at the towns end where the butts stood, which was so indeed, and also hee dreamed that he met with his father as he went to the stake, and also that there was a priest at the stake, which went about to have him recant Γο whom he said (as he thought in his dreame), how that he bade him. Away, false prophet, and how that he exhorted the people to beware of him and such as he was, which things came to passe indeed. It happed that William made a noise to himselfe in his dreame, which caused M. Highed and the others to wake him out of his sleepe, to know When he awaked, he told them his what he lacked dreame in order as is said

Now when it was day, the sheriffe, M. Brocket, called on to set forward to the burning of William Hunter then came the sheriffes son to William Hunter, and embraced him in his right arme, saying 'William, be not afrud of these men which are here present with bowes, bills, and weapons, ready prepared to bring you to the place where you shall be burned.' To whom William answered 'I thank God I am not afraid, for I have east my coumpt what it will cost me, already " Then the sheriffes son could speake no more to him for weeping. Then William Hunter plucked up his coun, and stepped over the parlour grounsell, and went forward cheerefully, the sheriffes servant taking him by one arm. and his brother by another, and thus going in the way, he met with his father, according to his dreame, and he spake to his son, weeping, and saying 'God be with thee, son William, and William said 'God be with you, father, and be of good comfort, for I hope we shall meet againe, when we shall be mery! His father said 'I hope so, William,' and so departed So William went to the place where the stake stood, even according to his dreame, whereas all things were veric unreadic Then William tooks a wet broom fagot, and kneeled down thereon, and read the 51st Psalme, till he came to these word, 'The sacrince of God is a contrite spirit, a con in e and a broken heart, O God, thou wilt not despise."

Then said 'Iaster Tirell of the Beacher, called William Irel 'Thou hest,' eaid he, 'thou readest talle for the words are, "an humble spirit"! But Will am said 'The translation cayth "a contrite heart"!

'Yea,' quoth M Tyrell, 'the translation is false, ye translate books as we list your selves, like heretickes? 'Well,' quoth William, 'there is no great difference in those words.' Then said the sheriffe 'Here is a letter from the queen of thou wilt recant, thou shalt live. if not, thou shalt be burned.' 'No,' quoth William, 'I will not recant, God willing' Then William rose, and went to the stake, and stood upright to it. Then came one Richard I onde a bailiff, and made fast the chain about William Then said Master Brown 'Here is not woode enough to burn a legge of him? Then said William 'Good people, pray for me, and make speed. and dispatch quickly, and pray for mee while yee see me alive, good people, and I will pray for you likewise' 'How!' quoth Master Brown, 'pray for thee? I will pray no more for thee than I will pray for a dogge.' To whom William answered 'Master Brown, now you have that which you sought for, and I pray God it be not laide to your charge in the last daie howbeit, I forgive you.' Then said Master Brown 'I aske no forgivenesse of thee ' 'Well,' said William, 'if God for give you not, I shall require my bloud at your hands. Then said William 'Sonne of God, shine upon mc!' and immediately the sunne in the element shone out of a dark cloude so full in his face that hee was constrained to looke another way, wherat the people mused, because it was so darke a little time afore. Then William took up a fagot of broom, and embraced it in his armes Then this priest which William dreamed of came to his brother Robert with a popish booke to carrie to William, that hec might recant, which booke his brother would not meddle withall Then William, seeing the priest, and perceiving how hee would have showed him the booke, saide 'Away, thou false prophet! Beware of them, good people, and come away from their abho minations, lest that you be partakers of their plagues." Then quoth the priest 'Look how thou burnest here, so shalt thou burne in hell.' William answered 'Thou liest, thou false prophet! Away, thou false prophet! away 13

Then there was a gentleman which said 'I pray God have mercie upon his soul.' The people said 'Amen, Amen' Immediately fire was made. Then William east his psalter right into his brother's hand, who said 'William, thinke on the holy passion of Christ, and be not afraide of death' And William answered 'I am not afraid.' Then hift he up his hands to heaven, and said 'Lord, Lord, Lord, receive my spirit!' And easting downe his head againe into the smothering smoke, he yeelded up his hife for the truth, sealing it with his bloud to the pruse of God

Better known is Foxe's account of 'The Be haviour of Dr Ridley and Master Latimer'

Upon the north side of the towne, in the ditch over against Baily [Balliol] colledge, the place of execution was appointed, and for feare of any tumult that might arise, to let the burning of them, the lord Williams was commanded by the queenes letters, and the housholders of the city, to be there assistant, sufficientlic appointed And when every thing was in a readiness, the prisoners were brought forth by the major and the bayliffes Master Ridley had a faire blacke gowne furred, and faced with foines, such as he was wont to weare beeing bishop, and a tippet of velvet furred likewise about his neck, a velvet night cap upon his head, and a corner cap upon the same, going in a paire of slippers to the stake, and going between the major and an alderman, etc. After him came master Latimer in a poor Bristow freeze frock all worne, with his buttoned cap, and a kerchiefe on his head all readie to the fire, a newe long shrowde hanging over his hose downe to the feet, which at the first sight stirred mens hearts to rue upon them, beholding on the one side the honour they some time had, and on the other, the calamitie whereunto they were fallen.

Master doctour Ridley, as he passed toward Bocardo, looked up where master Cranmer did lie, hoping belike to have seene him at the glass windowe, and to have spoken unto him But then master Cranmer was busie with Frier Soto and his fellowes, disputing together, so that he could not see him through that occasion master Ridley, looking backe, espied master Latimer comming after, unto whom he said, 'Oh, be ye there?' 'Yea,' said master Latimer, 'have after as fast as I can follow? So he following a prettie way off, at length they came both to the stake, the one after the other, where first Dr Ridley entring the place, marvellous earnestly holding up both his hands, looked towards Then shorthe after espying master Latimer, with a wondrous cheereful looke he ran to him, imbraced and kissed him, and, as they that stood neere reported, comforted him saying, 'Be of good heart, brother, for God will either asswage the furie of the flame, or else strengthen us to abide it' With that went he to the stake, kneeled downe by it, kissed it, and most effectuouslie praied, and behind him master Latimer kneeled, as earnestlie calling upon God as he. After they arose, the one talked with the other a little while, till they which were appointed to see the execution, remooved themselves out of the sun What they said I can learn of no man

Then Dr Smith, of whose recantation in king Edwards time ye heard before, beganne his sermon to them upon this text of St Paul in the 13 chap of the first epistle to the Counthians Si corpus meum tradam igni, charitatem autem non habeam, nihil inde utilitatis capio, that is, 'If I yeelde my body to the fire to be burnt, and have not charity, I shall gaine nothing thereby' Wherein he alledged that the goodnesse of the cause, and not the order of death, maketh the holines of the person, which he confirmed by the examples of Judas, and of a woman in Oxford that of late hanged her selfe, for that they, and such like as he recited, might then be adjudged righteous, which desperatelie sundered their lives from their bodies, as hee feared that those men that stood before him would doe. But he cried stil to the people to beware of them, for they were heretikes, and died out of the church And on the other side, he declared their diversities in opinions, as Lutherians, Œcolampadians, Zuinghans, of which sect they were, he said, and that was the worst but the old church of Christ and the catholike faith beleeved far otherwise. At which place they lifted uppe both their hands and cies to heaven, as it were calling God to witnes of the truth the which countenance they made in many other places of his sermon, whereas they thought he spake amisse ended with a verie short exhortation to them to recant, and come home again to the church, and save their lives and soules, which else were condemned was scant in all a quarter of an houre.

Doctor Rulley said to master Latimer, 'Will you begin to answer the sermon, or shall I?' Master Latimer said 'Begin you first, I pray you.' 'I will,' said master Ridley

Then the wicked sermon being ended, Dr Ridley and master Latimer knecled downe uppon their knees towards my lord Williams of Tame, the vice chancellour of Oxford, and divers other commissioners appointed for that purpose, which sate upon a forme thereby whom master Ridley said 'I beseech you, my lord, even for Christs sake, that I may speake but two or three wordes' And whilest my lord bent his head to the major and vice chancellor, to know (as it appeared) whether he might give him leave to speake, the bailiffes and Dr Marshall, vice chancellor, ran hastily unto him, and with their hands stopped his mouth, and said 'Master Ridley, if you will revoke your erroneous opinions, and recant the same, you shall not onely have liberty so to doe, but also the benefite of a subject, that is, have your life' 'Not otherwise?' said maister Ridley 'No,' quoth Dr Marshall 'Therefore if you will not so doe, then there is no remedy but you must suffer for your deserts' 'Well,' quoth master Ridley, 'so long as the breath is in my bodie, I will never deny my Lord Christ, and his knowne truth Gods will be done in me!' And with that he rose up and said with a loud 'Well then, I commit our cause to almightie God, which shall indifferently judge all' To whose saying, maister Latimer added his old posie, 'Well! there is nothing hid but it shall be opened.' And he said, he could answer Smith well enough, if hee might be suffered

Incontinently they were commanded to make them readie, which they with all meeknesse obeyed. Master Ridley tooke his gowne and his tippet, and gave it to his brother in lawe master Sliepside, who all his time of imprisonment, although he might not be suffered to come to him, lay there at his owne charges to provide him necessaries, which from time to time he sent him by the sergeant that kept him. Some other of his apparel that was little worth, hee give away, other the bailiffes He gave away besides divers other small things to gentlemen standing by, and divers of them pitifullie weeping, as to sir Henry Lea he gave a new groat, and to divers of my lord Williams gentlemen some napkins, some nutmegges, and races [roots] of ginger, his diall, and such other things as he had about him, to every one that stood next him. Some plucked the pointes of his Happie was he that might get any ragge of him Master Latimer give nothing, but very quickly suffered his keeper to pull off his hose, and his other aray, which to look unto was very simple and being stripped into his shrowd, hee seemed as comly a person to them that were there present as one should lightly see, and whereas in his clothes hee appeared a withered and crooked sillie olde man, he now stood bolt upright, as comely a father as one might lightly behold

Then master Ridley, standing as yet in his trusse, said to his brother 'It were best for me to go in my trus e still' 'No,' quoth his brother, 'it will put you to more paine and the trusse will do a poore man good' Whereunto master Ridley said 'Be it, in the name of God,' and so unlaced himselfe. Then beeing in his shirt, he stood upon the foresaid stone, and held up his hande and said 'O heavenly lather, I give unto thee most heartie thanks, for that thou hast called mee to be a professour of thee, even unto death. I beseech thee,

Lord God, 'ake merce upon this realme of England, and deliver the time from all her enemies.'

Then the smith tool a chaine of iron, and brought the same about both Dr Ridleyes and maister Latimers middles, and as he was knocking in a staple. Dr Ridley tooks the chains in his hand, and shaked the same, for it did girde in his belly, and looking aside to the smith, said 'Good fellow, knocke it in hard, for the flesh will have his course.' Then his brother did bringe him gunnepowder in a big, and would have ted the same about his necke. Master Ridley asked what it was His brother said, 'Gunnepowder' 'Then,' sayd he, 'I take it to be sent of Cod, therefore I will receive it as sent of him. And have you any,' sayd he, 'for my brother?' meaning master Latimer 'Yea, sir, that I have,' quoth his brother 'Then give it unto him,' sayd hee, 'betime, least ye come too late.' So his brother went, and carried of the same gunne powder unto maister Latimer

In the meanctime Dr Ridley spake unto my lord Williams, and saide 'My lord, I must be a suter unto your lordshippe in the behalfe of divers poore men, and speciallic in the cause of my poor sister. I have made a supplication to the queenes majestie in their behalves be each your lordship for Christs sake, to be a mean to her grace for them. My brother here both the suppli cation, and will resort to your lordshippe to certific you herof. There is nothing in all the world that troubleth my conscience, I praise God, this only excepted Whiles I was in the see of London divers poore men tooke leases of me, and agreed with me for the same. Now I heare say the bishop that now occupieth the same roome will not allow my grants unto them made, but contraric unto all lawe and conscience bath taken from them their livings, and will not suffer them to injoy the same beecch you, my lord, he a meant for them, you shall do a good deed, and God will reward you '

Then they brought a faggotte, kindled with fire, and laid the same downe at Dr Ridleys feete. Fo whome master Latimer spake in this manner 'Bee of good comfort, master Ridley, and play the man. Wee shall this day light such a candle, by God's grace, in England as I trust shall never bee putte out'

And so the fire being given unto them, when Dr Ridler saw the fire flaming up towards him, he cried with a wonderful lowd voice. In manus tuas, Domine, commendo spiritum meum Domine recipe spiritum And after, repeated this latter part often in In hish, 'Lord, Lord, receive my spirit,' master Latimer crying as vehementlic on the other side, 'O Father of her en, receive my soule!" who received the flame as it were imbracing of it. After that he had stroated his face with his hands, and as it were bathed them a little in the fire, he soone died (as it appeared) with serie little And thus much concerning the end of paine or none this olde and blessed servant of God, master Latimer, for whose laborious travules, fruitfull life, and constant death the whole realine hath cause to give great thanks to almightic God

Put master Ridley, by reason of the evill making of the fire unto him, because the wooden faggots were laide about the some Lorsell, and over high built, the fire burned first beneath, being kept downe by the wood, which when he felt fee desired them for Christes sake to let the fire come unto him. Which when his brother in lay heard, but not well under tood, intending to rid him out of his paine (for the which cause hee gave attendance), as one in such sorrow not well advised what hee did, heaped faggets upon him, so that he cleane covered him, which made the fire more vehement beneath, that it burned cleane all his neather parts, before it once touched the upper, and that made him leape up and down under the facgots, and often desire them to let the fire come unto him, saving, 'I cannot burne ' Which indeed appeared well, for, after his legges were consumed by reason of his structing through the pame (whereof hee had no release, but onelic his contentation in God), he showed that side toward us cleane, shirt and all untouched with firme this torment he forgate not to call unto God still, having in his mouth, 'Lord have mercy upon me,' intermedling this cry, 'Let the fire come unto me. I cannot burne ! In which paines he laboured till one of the standers by with his bill pulled off the faggots above, and where he saw the fire flame up, he wrested himself And when the flame touched the unto that side gunpowder, he was seen stirre no more, but burned on the other side, falling downe at master Latimers feete. Which some said happened by reason that the chain loosed, other said that he fel over the chain by reason of the poise of his body, and the weakness of the neather hms.

Some said that before he was like to fall from the stake, hee desired them to hold him to it with their billes However it was, surelie it mooved hundreds to teares, in beholding the horrible sight, for I thinke there was none that had not cleane exiled all humanitic and mercie, which would not have lamented to beholde the furie of the fire so to rage upon their bodies Signes there were of sorrow on evene side. Some tooke it greevouslie to see their deathes, whose lives they held full deare some pittied their persons, that thought their soules had no need His brother mooved many men, seeing his miserable case, seeing (I say) him compelled to such infelicitie, that he thought then to doc him best service when he hastned his end Some cried out of the lucke, to see his indevor (who most dearelie loved him, and sought his release) turne to his greater vexation and increase of paine. But whose considered their preferments in time past, the places of honour that they some time occupied in this common wealth, the favour they were in with their princes, and the opinion of learning they had in the aniversity where they studied, could not chuse but sorrow with teares to see so great dignity, honour, and estimation, so necessary members sometime accounted, so many godly vertues, the study of so manie yeres, such excellent learning, to be put into the fire and consumed in one moment they are, and the reward of this world they have alreadie. What reward remaineth for them in heaven, the day of the Lord's glorie, when hee commeth with his saints, shall shortlie, I trust, declare Perhap the best known edition of Forex Book of Wirtzers is that by Cattley (8 vols 1837-41) but it is far from perfect in the last paragraph quoted, for example Cattley had altered 'lucke to 'fortune. The Lest is that in the Reformation series of the Ecclesiastical Historians of England, edited by Mendham and Pritt (3 vols 1833 et set), with Founends vindication against the attacks of Catholic inics. But many of the Catholic criticisms were justified, and Forex exaggerations and want of historical precision were fully exposed by Dr S. Maitland in a series of jumphlets (183-42). The biography of Fore, attributed to his son Samu I, and published in both Latin and Foglish in the 1641 edition of the Acte, is certainly apoeryphal, although it has formed the Lass of numerous popular in more.

Raphael Holinshed (Holynshed, Hol-LINGSHEAD, &c.), principal writer of the Chronicles which bear his name, is said by Wood to have been educated at one of the universities, and to have become a minister of God's Word. It is certain that he came to London, was a translator in the printing office of the German, Reginald Wolfe, was steward to Thomas Burdet of Bromcote, in Warwickshire, and died about the year 1580 Leland's MSS at his command, and he was assisted by William Harrison (1534-93), who, born in London and educated at both universities, became chaplain to Lord Cobham and Canon of Windsor, and by Richard Stanyhurst (1547-1618), born in Dublin, educated at Oxford, who, destined to be afterwards famous as the translator of Virgil, wrote for Holinshed on Irish affairs under the guidance of the Jesuit martyr, Edmund Campion Prefixed to the historical portion of the work is a description of Britain and its inhabitants, by William Harrison, which gives an interesting picture of the state of the country and manners of the people in the six teenth century This is followed by a history of England to the Norman Conquest, by Holinshed, a history and description of Ireland, by Stanyhurst, additional chronicles of Ireland, translated (from Giraldus Cambrensis and others) or written by Holinshed and Stanyhurst, a description and history of Scotland, mostly translated from Hector Boece and Major, by Holinshed and others, and, lastly, a history of England, by Holinshed, from the Norman Conquest to 1377, when the first edition of the Chronicles was published The book was eagerly welcomed and widely read, but some passages reflecting on debatable topics offended the queen and the ministers, and had to be cancelled. The second edition, when it appeared in 1587, was revised and continued down to 1586 under the editorship of John Hooker or Vowell, chamberlain of Exeter and uncle of 'the Judicious Hooker,' who had for condjutors John Stow, elsewhere mentioned, Abraham Fleming (1552?-1607), a translator from the classics, a poor poet but a competent antiquary, and Francis Thynne, calling himself Boteville (1545?-1608), the Lancaster Herald. In this second edition of 1587, several sheets containing matter offensive to the queen and her ministers were mutilated in all but the first impressions, but the uncastrated text was restored in the excellent edition in six volumes quarto published in London in 1807-8 Shakespeare got the material of almost all his historical plays from the Chronicles, and sometimes copied the very words It was from Holinshed-who followed Boece-that Shakespeare derived the groundwork of Wachth, as well as of King Lear and (in part) of Cymbeline In Lear Shakespeare partly followed in earlier play based on Holinshed the passages of Holmshed paraphrased in Henry VI are themselves paraphrases of Hall And the author (or authors) of Henry VIII might have taken the passages originally due to Cavendish's Life of |

IVolsey either from MS, from the second edition of Holinshed which had followed Cavendish, or from Stow, whose Chronicles contains selections from Cavendish

Sometimes the text of Shakespeare's plays is little more than a blank verse rearrangement of Holinshed's facts and words. Thus in Act I scene 1. of Henry V the Salie law is thus expounded

There is no barre

To make against your Highnesse claim to France But this which they produce from Pharamond 'In terram Saluam multeres ne succedant, 'No woman shall succeed in Salic land,' Which Salike land the French unjustly gloze To be the Realme of France and Pharamond The founder of this Law and Female Barre, Let their own Authors faithfully affirme That the Land Salike is in Germanie Betweene the Flouds of Sali and of Elve, Where Charles the Great, &c.

In Holmshed it is thus put 'Against the surmised and false law Salike, which the Frenchmen allege ever against the kings of England in barre of their just title to the crowne of France. The verie words of that supposed law are these. "In terram salicam mulieres ne succedant," that is to say, "Into the Salike land let not woman succeed? Which the French glossers expound to be the realme of France, and that this law was made by King Pharamond. whereas their owne authors affirme that the land Salike is in Germanie, betweene the rivers of Elbe and Sala, and that where Charles the Great,' &c

So in Act IV scene viii the list of prisoners and slain reported to the king after Agincourt is quite amusingly close to Holinshed's, as will appear from the last few lines

The king, having recited the long list of French slain, says

Here was a Royall fellowship of death!
Where is the number of our English dead?
Edward the Duke of Yorke, the Earle of Suffolke,
Sir Richard Ketlie, Davy Gam, Esquire
None else of name, and of all other men
But five and twentie.

The corresponding sentence in Holinshed is 'Of Englishmen there died at this battell, Edward Duke of Yorke, the Earle of Suffolke, Sir Richard Kikelie, and Davie Gamme, Esquier, and of all other not aboue five and twentie persons' The parallelisms have been worked out at length by Mr Boswell Stone in his Shakespeare's Holinshed (1896)

Holinshed tells at great length the proton pseudos, the fundamental fable about Brutus, the eponymous hero of Britain, which from the days of Geoffrey of Monmouth continued so long to falsify English history Britain, it appears, was peopled within two hundred years after the flood by the children of Japhet, whose son Samothes was the founder of Celtica, including Gallia and Britannia, and was succeeded by five kings of the Celts and Samotheans Then came the grant Albion and his followers, and gave the island a new name. These legends fill a whole book of the history of England, though they are admitted to be somewhat disputed. But there is no doubt about Brute. The second book begins thus

Hitherto have we spoken of the inhabitants of this fle before the comming of Brute, although some will needs have it, that he was the first which inhabited the same with his people descended of the Trojans, some few grants onche excepted whom he utterhe destroied, and left not one of them alive through the whole fle. But as we shall not doubt of Brutes comming hither, so may we as uredly thinke, that he found the fle peopled either with the generation of those which Albion the giant had placed here, or some other kind of people whom he did subdue, and so reigned as well ouer them as ouer those which he brought with him

When Brutus (or Brytus) 'came to the age of 15 yeeres so that he was now able to ride abrode with his father into the forests and chases, he fortuned (either by mishap or by God's providence) to strike his father with an arrow in shooting at a deere, of which wound he also died. And the yoong gentleman, immediathe after he had slaine his father (in maner before alledged) was banished his countrie, and thereupon got him into Green, where traveling the countrie, he lighted by chance upon some of the Trojan offspring, and associating himselfe with them, grew by meanes of the linage (whereof he was descended) in great reputation among them.'

By and by Brutus, who had taken to wisc Innogen, the daughter of King Pandrisus, led his Frojans from Grecia by way of the Straits of Gibraltar, fells in with more Trojans near the Pyrences under their king, Gorineus, united their forces and fight with a king of the Piets in Poitou or Pietland, and, directing their course to this island, finally 'after a few days suling they landed at the liaven now called Totnesse, the year of the vorld 2050, after the destruction of Troy 66' After Brute and Gorineus had destroyed the grints Goginasog and all such is stood against the inviders, Brute give Cornwall to Gorineus, and set to building a capital on the Thames for himself

Here therefore he began to build and lay the foundation of a citie, in the tenth or (as other thinke) in the second yeare after his arrivall, which he named (saith Gal. Mon.) Troinouant, or (as Hum. Lilloyd saith) Fromewith, that is, new Troy, in reinembrance of that noble citie of Froy from whence he and his people were for the greater part de cended

When brutus had builded this ettie, and brought the island fullic under his subjection, he by the adults of his nobles commanded this He (which before hight Albion) to be called Britaine, and the inhabitants Britons after his name, for a perpetuall memorie that he was the first bringer of them into the land. In this meane while all of he had by his wife his second. In this meane while all of he had by his wife his second. Cambris or Camber, and the thirt Albanaetus or Albanaet. Now when the time of his death dreat neers, to the first he betooke the gouernment of that part of the land nowe knowne by the name of England so that the same was long after called Loegna, or Logiers, of the said Loennus. To the second he appointed the countrie of Wales, which of him was first named Cambria, diuided from I oegna by the riner of Scuerne. To his third sonne Albanact he deliuered all the north part of the Ile, afterward called Albania, after the name of the said Albanact which portion of the said Ile heth beyond the Humber north ward. Thus when Brutus had diuided the Ile of Britaine (as before is mentioned) into 3 parts, and had gouerned the same by the space of 15 yeares, he died in the 24 yeare after his arrivall (as Harison noteth) and was buried at Troinouant or I ondon, although the place of his said buriall there be now growne out of memorie.

Then follows the history of Locrine the eldest sonne of Brute, of Albanact his yoongest sonne, and his death of Vadan, Mempricius, Ebranke, Brute Greensheeld, Leill, Ludhurdibras, Baldud, and Leir, the nine rulers of Britaine successively after Brute. Cordelia, Gorboduc, and many less-known potentates are dealt with before Cassibelaune and Julius Cesar are arrived at Vortigern and Hengist do not appear till the tenth book of nearly mere fable. From the Anglo-Saxon settlement on there is much sound history

These eponymous elucubrations about Albion and Brute naturally led the Scottish authors to claim for their kingdom a still more venerable antiquity and noble origin. The history of Scotland, com piled for Holinshed by Harrison from Boece and others, in like manner records the voyages of Gathelus, a Greek, who in Egypt marries Scota, the daughter of Pharaoh who was drowned in the Red Sea, and by way of Portingale comes to Ireland, now called Scotia after Scota It was i prince called Rothsay that first took the Sco s over to the western isles, and when they settled on the mainland of the country after then to be known as Scotland, they called the first district they settled Argathcha or Argyll, from their 'first captein and guide, Gathelus' Thus Scottish history, like English history, was founded on bascless fables This self glorification by alleging descent from the great classical nations began with the Franks, but was much more diligently worked out by the Celtic peoples, the Irish series being mainly quite different in substance from those of Welsh manufacture But the Brutus and other like fibles seem to have long been about the most popular part of British history, and were quite heartily taken over and cherished by the Normans, who interested them selves more in the Welsh fable than in the Anglo Saxon Chronicle In England the myths derived from Gcoffrey of Monmouth began to lose credit a generation or two after Holinshed, but in Scotland, as we have seen (page 212), these constituted the warp and woof of early Scottish history till well on in the eighteenth century (see page 824)

John Stow (1525?-1605), an industrious writer, was born in London about the year 1525. He was the son of a tailor, and was brought up to the same trade, but early showed a turn for antiquarian research. About 1560 he planned to write on English history, and travelled on foot through a great part of England examining the historical manuscripts in cathedrals and collections. He bought up, as far as his resources allowed, old books and manuscripts, of which there were many scattered through the country, in consequence of the suppression of monasteries by Henry VIII When necessity compelled him to fill back on his trade, his studies were suspended till the bounty of Archbishop Parker enabled him again to resume them edited Chaucer and some of the old English chronicles, and in 1561 he published his Summary of English Chronicles (dedicated to the Earl of Leicester), which was afterwards called Annales of England, and re-edited, expanded, and altered At length, in 1598, appeared by other hands his Survay of London, the best known of his writings, which has served as the groundwork of all subsequent histories of the city There was another work he was anxious to publish, a large history of Britain, on which forty years' labour had been bestowed, the MS was extant, but it is not known what became of it. His industrious researches deserved a better fate than befell him In his old age he fell into such poverty as to be driven to solicit charity from the public. Having made application to James I, he received the royal license 'to repair to churches or other places to receive the gratuities and charitable benevolence of well-disposed people' Under the pressure of want and disease, Stow died in 1605 at the age of His works possess few graces of style, but he was on the whole the most accurate and conscientious chronicler of the time, though still too willing to accept the fables on which the early history was based. He often declared that in his histories he had never allowed himself to be swayed either by fear, favour, or malice, but that he had impartially and to the best of his knowledge delivered the truth Bacon and Camden took statements upon his sole credit - Richard Grafton, chronicler, has been already referred to (page 106) as continuator of Hall.

The Anthologies.

Master Slender 'had rather than forty shillings that he had his book of songs and sonnets here,' but it would appear that he had lent it, at Allhallowmass last, to Alice Shortcake, with his book of riddles. Which of several anthologies it was that Cousin Abraham regretted it is impossible to decide, for he was offered the choice of several such collections of 'dainty passages of wit'. The names of most of these miscellanies are far more poetical than their contents, and have led the unwary to suppose that these were garlands and posies of enchanting lyrics. It is desirable to insist upon the fact that, with certain exceptions, they were nothing of the kind. We have already spoken of the earliest and most important anthologies, the 'Miscellany' published by Tottel (1557), in thirty years this went through eight editions, and the latest of them may presumably be the volume which Slender missed This, however, was in no sense an Elizabethan work, although one or two of the contributors survived and continued to write in the reign of Elizabeth The earliest of the genuine Elizabethan anthologies was The Paradise of Dainty Devices, published in 1576, by Richard Edwards, sometime of Her Majesty's Chapel, who wrote a large portion of it himself, Lord Vaux, Lord Oxford, and Jasper Heywood were also contributors. This collection has a charming title, but there its merit ends, it is, as a contemporary called it, 'a packet of bald rhymes' It was strangely popular, however, being incessantly reprinted until at least 1606

An even finer title adorns a still more humdrum volume, A Gorgious Gallery of Gallant Inventions, edited by Thomas Proctor in 1578 This is attributed to 'divers worthy workmen of later days,' but what is not written in the form of 'pretty pamphlets' by Proctor himself seems to be from the hand of a certain Owen Roydon, of whom The spirit of poetry is nothing else is known eminently absent from A Gorgeous Gallery of Gallant Inventions It was followed, in 1584, by A Handful of Pleasant Delights, edited by Clement Robinson This marks a bold advance towards music, the editor took credit for printing every sonnet 'orderly in his proper time,' and the pieces were arranged to be sung No poets of any prominence were among the contributors, however, and the actual merit of most of the ballads in AHandful of Pleasant Delights is extremely small (But see below at page 274.) The fifth anthology, A Bouquet of Dainty Concerts (1588), said to be a collection of 'sweet ditties either to the lute, bandora, virginals or any other instrument,' I have never seen, it is said to exist in a unique exemplar in a private library. It was edited, or written, by Antony Munday Mr Bullen, who has examined this treasure, confesses that 'there is not even a passable lyric to be found' in it

We come in 1593—when, it should be noticed, the lyrical revival was already complete—to The Phæmx Nest Lodge and Breton contributed to this, and it was edited by an unidentified R S, of the Inner Temple. In 1599 William Jaggard brought out 'The Passionate Pilgrim, by W Shakespeare.' This was a purely piratical miscellany, consisting of twenty pieces, the property of Shakespeare, Raleigh, Marlowe, Barnfield, and others, obviously all stolen The history of this strangely tantalising compilation, and its actual connection with Shakespeare, remain obstinately obscure We are told, however, by Heywood that Jaggard was 'altogether unknown' to Shakespeare when he 'presumed to make so bold with his name! The Passionale Pilgrim, as a fraudulent publication, hardly deserves a place among the anthologies. The next on the list seems to be Belvedere, or the Garden of the It ises 1600), which, however, is a nosegay of such traumentary extracts as deserve rather to be called petals than flowers. We come at last to the famous England's Helicon, or the Muses Harmony (1600), a kind of Golden Treasury of the Elizabothen age, summing up the splendours of its lyric promise, and edited by one John Bodenhim. Even more precious is the Poetreal Rhapsod; (1602), edited by Francis Davison, not because it contains more excellent poetry, but because it vas compiled from fresher sources, and adds more to the total harvest of our literature both these collections, and still more in the enlarged reprint of Linglana's Helicon of 1614, there were delightful numbers. Shakespeare himself, and Greene, and Barnfield, and Sidney, and Spenser, and Lodge being among the songsters whose throats are seen quivering with ecstasy on the boughs of these latest anthologies But neither these nor their predecessors (always excepting Fottels 'Miscellany') had much influence on the development of poetry or deserve any pro-Before 1585 the nuncnt place in its history anthologics had been filled with dry and tuneless morality, in which youth was admonished to withdraw his attection from the vain seducements of After 1585 they became collections, and mostly reprints, of poems, in themselves indeed most beautiful, but written without relation to the anthology and unstimulated by its existence Poetical Miscellanies, then, are literary curiosities which have, in the opinion of the present writer. received an amount of attention from critics which they do not intrinsically deserve, and which should be transferred from them to the music books These latter really did influence and even transform the character of lyrical poetry in England the maugurators of the Song were not the didactic I dwardses and Proctors, in spite of the beautiful names which they give to their collections, but musicians such as Byrd, and Dowland, and that rare artist in both lands, the incomparable Thomas Campion. Translators and Translations.

At many different dates English literature has been largely influenced by translations and trans-In early Christian days Biblical renderings and the close contact with Church Latin gave a Hebraic-Latinistic flavour to Anglo-Saxon us a prince of translators, and Boethius and Orosius left their mark on English thought Caxton, his patrons, friends, and successors were zcalous in translating The version of Ciccro's De Sercetule in 1473 is one of the first instances of the trinslation of a great classic, and is thought by some to have been identical i ith that rendering printed by Caxton in 1481 (see page 97) Douglass metrical rendering of the Enerd (1513) w is, all things considered, a notable achievement

But the great age of great translators was the second half of the sixteenth century and the earlier decades of the seventeenth-the age of Hoby and North, of Philemon Holland and Florio, in prose, whose achievements were rivalled, then or later, by Phaer's and by Stanyhurst's Virgil, Golding's Ovid, Chapman's Homer, Harrington's Arrosto, and Fairfax's Tasso in verse. Many hands were now busy rendering the Greek and Latin classics. and giving their contemporaries better or worse versions of French, Italian, and Spanish master-Urquhart, the translator of Rabelais, was a late contemporary of Fairfax's If it cannot be said that the great Tudor translators were as a rule quite accurate or faithful, if they did not make it their business to reproduce the distinctive form and manner of their originals, they yet succeeded admirably in fulfilling one of the canons of perfect translation-they produced noble English versions which to the reader seem wonderfully like spontaneous and original works

Sir Thomas Hoby (1530-1566), translator of The Courtyer of Castiglione, made Englishmen familiar with the Renaissance ideal of a gentleman, but remained himself so faithful to all that was best in English character that Ascham, though constantly suspicious of 'the Englishman Italianate,' unreservedly praised both Hoby and his book. Born at Lcominster, Hoby studied at St John's, Cambridge, travelled in France and Italy, and was ambassador in France The Cortegiano, planned by Castiglione in 1508, was not printed till 1528, and found as much favour in France and Spain, translated, as at home Hoby was at work on his English translation in his youth, but did not print it till 1561 The book was received with universal applause, was repeatedly reprinted, and produced very traccable influences on the next age and its writers Professor Raleigh, who has edited Hoby (1900) for the 'Tudor Translations,' while praising the truly English style and its rhythm, admits that, like so many of the Elizabethan translators, he tried rather to restate in English the substance of the original than to make an accurate translation He made many mistakes through imperfect knowledge, was sometimes even slipshod in his English, and allowed himself rather to limit his vocabulary by the preference (common to him with Cheke and that school) for homely English words, in direct contrast to the pedantic Ciceronianism of the universities, the 'inkhorn terms' that commended themselves to another generation Much more influential, however, was Hoby's contemporary, North

Sir Thomas Not th (1535-1601), often referred to as the first great master of English prose, was the second son of the first Lord North, seems to have been educated it Cambridge, was a student it Lincoln's Inn, but early devoted himself to literature. He was apparently often embarrassed in circumstances, and even 'drowned by poverty,' but maintained some dignity in Cambridgeshire, being knighted about 1591 His first work was The Diall of Princes by Guevara, 'Englysshed oute of the Frenche,' but partly at least direct from Spanish (1557) Lord Berners had as early as 1534 trans-Inted a shorter version by Guevara of the same work (see pages 104, 105) Of late it has been attempted to trace the Euphuism of Lyly to Guevara, and probably Lyly was influenced by the renderings both of Berners and of North, but a substantial residuum of Euphuism is Lyly's own, and cannot be traced to either of Guevara's translators In other respects North's influence on almost all subsequent writers of English The Worall Philosophie of was very marked Done is a witty and pithy rendering of an Italian work His most famous work, The Lives of the Noble Grecianes and Romanes compared together by that grave learned Philosopher and Historiographer Plutarke of Charonia, professedly from the French rendering of Amyot, was in magnificently racy, nervous, idiomatic English-all the more that the translator did not greatly concern himself to follow Amyot closely, still less the He wrote freely, using new-Greek original. comed Latinisms, contemporary colloquialisms, and English slang with equal effectiveness The work, which reads like an original, became one of the most popular books of the time, and was largely Shakespeare's encyclopædia of classical history In Antony and Cleopatra Shakespeare has used North's words and phrases very closely, in Corrolanus there are whole speeches taken almost straight from North

The people moreover being growen very dissolute & licencious, by reason of the victoric of Marithon, and seeking to have all thinges passe by them and their authoritic, beganne nowe to mislike and to be greatly offended that any private man should go before the rest in good fame and reputation. Whereupon they came out of all shires of Attica into the city of Athens, and so banished Aristides with the Ostracismon disguising the envy they bare to his glory with the name of feare of tyranny For this maner of banishment called Ostracismon, or Exostracismon, was no ordinary punishment for any fault or offence committed but to give it an honest cloke, they said it was onely a pulling downe and tying shorte of too much greatnesse and authority, exceeding farre the maner and countenance of a popular state. But to tell you truly, it was none otherwise then a gentle meane to qualifie the peoples envy against some private person which envy bred no malice to him whose greatnesse did offend them, but onely tended to the banishing of him for ten yeares. But afterwards when by practise this Ostracismon banishment was laid upon means men and malifactors, as upon Hyperbolus that was the last man so banished. they never after used it any more at Athens. the way it shall not be amisse to tell you here why and wherefore this Hyperbolus was banished. Alcibiades and Nicias were the chiefest men of Athens at that time, and they both were ever at square together, a common thing amongest great men. They perceiving now by the peoples assembling, that they went about to execute the Ostracismon, were marvelously afrayed it was meant to banishe one of them, wherefore they spake together, and made both their followers frends with each other, and joyned them in one tribe together, insomuch, when the most voyces of the people were gathered to condemne him that should be banished, they founde it was Hyperbolus. The people therewith were much offended, to see the Ostracismon so embased and scorned, that they never after would use it again, and so left it off for ever But briefly to let you under stand what the Ostracismon was, and after what sorte they used it ye are to know that at a certaine day appointed every citizen carried a great shell in his hande, whereupon he wrote the name of him he would have banished, and brought it into a certaine place railed about with woodden barres in the market place when every man had brought in his shell, the magistrates and officers of the city did count and tell the number of them for if there were lesse then 6000 citizens, that had thus brought these shels together, the Ostracismon was not full and perfect. That done, they laid apart every mans name written in these shels and whose name they found written by most citizens, they pro claimed him by sounds of trumpet a banished man for ten yeares, during which time notwithstanding the party did enjoy al his goods. Now every man writing thus his name in a shel, whom they would have banished it is reported there was a plaine man of the countrey (very simple) that could neither write nor readc, who came to Aristides (being the first man he met with) and gave him his shell, praying him to write Aristides name upon it He being abashed withall, did aske the countrey man if Aristides had ever done him any displeasure. No, said the contrie man, he never did me hurt, nor I know him not but it grieves me to heare every man call him a just man. Aristides hearing him say so, gave him no answer, but wrote his own name upon the shell, and delivered it agains to the countric man But as he went his way out of the city, he lift up his hands to herven, and made a prayer contrary to that of Achilles in Homer, besechinge the gods that the Athenians might never have such troubles in hand as they should be compelled to call for Aristides Notwithstanding, within three yeares after, when Verxes king of Persia came with his army through the countries of Thessaly and Bocotia, & entred into the heart of the country of Attica, the Athenians revoking the law of their Ostracismon, called home againe all those they had braished, and specially, because they were affraid Aristides would take part with the barbarous people, and that his example should move many other to do the like, wherin they were greatly deceived in the nature of the man for before that he was called home, he continually travelled up and downe, persuading and incouraging the Grecians to maintaine and defende After that lawe was repealed by proclama their liberty tion, & that Themistocles was chosen the only Lieutenant generall of Athens, he did alwaies faithfully aid and assist him in al things, as well with his trivell, as also with his counsell and thereby wan his enemies great honor, because it stood upon the safety and preservation of his countrie. For when Furibiades, Generall of the army of the Grecians, had determined to forsake the He of Salamina, and that the gallies of the barbarous people were come into the middest of the seas, and nad environed the Iles all about and the mouth of the arme of the strught of Salamina, before any man knew they sere thus inclosed in Anstides departing out of the He of Igina with a marvellous Loldnesse, ventured through the middest of all the barbarous ships and fleete, and be good hap got in the night into Themistocles tent, and cilling him out, spake with him there in this sort Themistocles, if we be 10th wise, it is high time we should now leave off this vame envy and spite we have tong time borne each other, and that we should enter into another sort of envy more honourable and profit able for us both. I meane, which of us two should do his best endeavour to save Grece you, by ruling and commaunding all like Licutenant generall and I, by counselling you the best, and executing your commande ment considering you are the man alone that will roundlest come unto the point that is best which is in my opinion that we should hazard battell by sea within the straight of Salamina, and that as soone as might be possible. But if our frendes and confederates do let this to be put in execution. I do assure you your enemies do helpe it forward. For it is said, that the sea both before and lichard us, & round about us, is covered all over with their shippes, so as they that would not before, shall now be compelled of force and in spight of their hearts to fight and bestirre them like men because they are compassed in all about, and there is no passage left open for them to escape, nor to flie Whereunto Themistocles answered, I am sory, Aristides, that herein your honesty appeareth greater then mine but since it is so, that you have deserved the honor in beginning and procuring such an honourable and commendable strike betweene us, I will henceforth indexour my selfe to excede you in continuing this your desire

Philemon Holland (1552-1637), styled by Fuller 'the translator general of his age,' was born it Chelmsford, became a Fellow of Frinity College, Cambridge, and in 1591 obtained somewhere the degree of MD. He afterwards practised inedicine at Coventry, and in 1628 was headmaster for ten months of the free school there His more notable translations were Livy, Pliny's Natural History, Suctomus, Plutarch's Horals. Ammi inus Marcellinus, Venophon's Cyrepædia, and Camden's Eritannia The translation of Suctonius was carried out when the plague raged it Coventry in 1605-6, in his liter years the old m in suffered from bodily fruities and poverty His translations are futhful on the whole, and in fine Elizabethan English, and though not so stitely as North's English renderings, have their own quaint charm. They mostly appeared in majestic tolios, and this, with their number, led to Pope's well known jesting allusion, 'And here the groining shelves Philemon bends! His son, Henry Holland, a bookseller in London, wrote some historical works, and published, after his father's death, one or two works by Philemon on medical subjects

Hannibal crossing the Alps

So that Anniball took up his lodging for one night, The morrow after, without his cariages & horsemen when as the barbarous people ran betweene them more coldly than before, he joined his forces together, aid passed the streight, not without great dammage and losse. but with more hurt of the sumpter horses than of men. After this, the mountainers (fewer in number, and in robbing wise rather than in warlike sort) ran in heapes, one while upon the vaward, other while upon the rere ward, as any one of them could either get the vantage of ground, or by going one while afore, and by staying another while behind, winne and catch any occasion & The clephants, as they were driven with opportunity great leasure, because through these narrow streights, they were readie ever & anone to run on their noses so what way soever they went, they kept the army safe & sure from the enemies, who being not used unto them, durst not once come neer The ninth day he woon the verie tops of the Alpes, through by lanes and blind crankes after he had wandred many times out of the way, either through the decentfulnesse of their guides, or for that when they durst not trust them, they adventured rashly themselves upon the vallies, and gue-sed the way at adventure, and went by aime. I'wo daies abode he en camped upon the tops thereof, and the soldiors weried with travaile and fight rested that time certaine also of the sumpter horses (which had slipt aside from the rockes) by following the tracks of the armie as it marched, came to the campe. When they were thus overtoiled and wearred with these tedious travailes, the snow that fell (for now the starre Vergilie [i e. the Pleiades] was set and gone downe out of that horizon) increased their feare exceedingly Now when as at the breake of day the ensignes were set forward, and the armie marched slowly, through the thicke and deepe snow, and that there appeared in the countenance of them all, slouthfulnesse and desperation ball advanced before the standerds, and commaunded his soldiours to stay upon a certaine high hill, (from whence they had a goodly prospect and might see a great way all about them) and there shewed unto them Italic and the goodly champion fields about the Po, which he hard under the foot of the Alpine mountains saying, That even then they mounted the wals, not only of Italy, but also of the cittic of Rome, as for all besides (auth hee) will be plaine and easie to be travelled and after one or two battailes at the most, ye shall have at your command, the verie eastle and head citic of all Italy Then began the armie to march forward and as yet the enemies verely themselves adventured nothing at all, but some pettie robberies by stealth, as opportunitie & occasion served. Howbeit they had much more difficult travailing down the hill, than in the climbing & getting up, for that most of the advenues to the Alpes from Italy side, as they be shorter, so they are more upright for all the way in a manner was steepe, narrow, and slippene, so as neither they could hold themselves from sliding, nor if any tripped and stumbled never so little, could they possibly (they staggered so) recover themselves and keep sure footing, but one fell upon another, as well horse as man. After this they came to a much parrower rocke, with crags & rags so steepe downeright, that hardly a nimble soldiour without his armonr and baggage (do what he could to take hold with hands upon the twigs and plants that there about grew forth) was able to creep do vn. This place being before naturally of it selfe steepe & prodant with a downe fall, now was choked & dammed up with a new fill of earth, which left a bank behind it of a wonderful & monstrous height. There the horsmen stood sill as if bey had been come to their vaies end. and when anniball mercelled much what the matter might be that stated them so, as they marched not on word was brought from that the Rock was unrecessible & unpassable. Wherapon, he went himself in person to view the place, a then he saw indeed without all doubt, that although he had fetched a compasse about yet he had gained nought thereby, but conducted he armie to passe through wilds & such places as before had never been beaten & troden. And verely that (of all other) was such as I was impossible to passe through. I or, wher as there lay old snow untouched & not troblen on, and over it o her snow newly fallen, of a smal depth, in this soft a tender snow, a the same not verie deep, their feet as they went easely tooke hold but that snow, bem, once with the gate of so min, people & beasts upon it, fretted and thaved, they were fame to go upon the bare yee underreath, and in the slabbene snow broth, as it religited and includ about their heale. There they had fouls alos and much strugling, for that they could not tread sure upon the slipperie yee, and againe, going as they did (downe hill) their feet sooner fuled them and when they had helped themselves once in getting up, either with hands or knee, , if they chanced to ful aguin, when those their props and states deceived them, there were no twigs nor rootes about, whereon a man might take hold, and rest or stay houselfe, either by hand or And therefore all that the poore garrons and beats could doe was to tumble and wallow enly upon the slipperie and glas ie yee and the molten slabbie snow Otherwhiles also they perished as they went in the deepe snow, whiles it was yet soft and tender for when they were once slidden and fallen, with flinging ou their heeles, and beating with their hoofes more forcibly for to take hold, they brak, the yee through, so as most of them as if they had ben caught fast and fe tered, stucke still in the deepe, hard frozen, & conscaled yee. At last, when as both man & beast were werted and overtoiled, and all to no purpose, they encamped upon the top of an hill, having vith very much ado clensed the place aforchand for that purpose such a deale of snow there was to be diaged, faied, and thrown out. This done, the souldiors were brought to breake that rocks, through which was their onely wase, and against the time that it was to be hewed through, they felled & overthrew many huge trees that grew there about, and made a mightie heape and pile of wood the wind served fitly for the time to kindle a tire, & then they set all a burning. Now when the rock was on fire and red hot, they powred thereon strong sineger for to calcine & dissolve it. When as the rock was thus baked (as it were) with fire, they digged into it, and opened it with pickcaxes, and made the descent gentle and easie, by incanes of moderate windings and turnings so as not onely the horses and other heasts, but even the elephants also might be able to go downe. I oure dates he spent about the levelling of this rock & the beasts were almost pined and lost for hunger. For the hill tops for the most part are bare of grasse, and looke what fog and forage there was, the snow over hilled it. The dales and lower grounds have some little banks lying to the sunne, and rivers withall, necre unto the woods, yea and places more meet and bescenning for men to inhabite. There were the labouring beasts put out to grasse & pasture, and the soldiors that were wearied with making the waies had three duies allowed to rest in. I rom thence they went downe into the plaine countrie, where they found both the place more easie and pleasant, and the natures of the inhabitants more tractable (From the Livy)

John Florio, the translator of Montaigne, was born in London about 1553. His father was a Protestant cale and Italian preacher in London, but unpleasant charges were brought against his moral character, and he lost his post and his John Florio appears as a private tutor in foreign languages at Oxford about 1376, and two years liter published his First Fruites, munly English and Italian dialogues, accompanied by A Perfect Irauction to the Italian and English Tongues In 1581 Florio was admitted a member of Magdalon College, and became a teacher of French and Italian. He enjoyed the patronage successively of the Lirls of Leicester, Southampton, and Pembroke The Second Frances, more Italian and English dialogues, had annexed to it the Garden of Recreation, containing Italian Proverbs (1591) His Italian and English dictionary, entitled A Worlde of Wordes, was published in 1598, and was repeatedly reprinted, extended, and translated Florio was appointed reader in Italian to Queen Anne, and afterwards groom of the privy chamber In 1603 he published in folio his famous translation of Montaigne, of which it is priise enough to say that it is a version worthy of its original, and a noble monument of Elizabethan English. Thanks to him, as was said at the time, 'Montagne now speaks English ' in that version Montagne spoke to Shakespeare In his later translation (1685) Charles Cotton, himself not immaculate, dwells on the numerous and gross errors of his predecessor There are indeed not a few slips in Florio's by no means literal translation, and it may fairly be claimed that Cotton's easy colloquial style comes nearer the diction of the Essays than Florio's quaint and stately but cumbrous and involved English But Florio, it should be remembered, would not seem quaint to Elizabethans, and his Hontaigne still rinks as the great standard English rendering The title was The Essaves on Morall, Politike and Millitarie Discourses of Lord Michaell de Montaigne It is certain from the Tempest that Shakespeare was familiar with the book, and it was long, but quite gratuitously, believed that the pedantic Holofernes in Love's Labour's Lost was a study after Florio No doubt Shakespeare must have known one who was a protégé of his own patrons, but Florio was not the only Italian then in London, and Florio (who died of plague at Fulham in 1625) was no absurd pedant

From the Essay of Lyers.

I see all men generally busied (and that verie im properly) o panish certaine innocent errours in children. which have neither impression nor consequence, and chastice and ver them for rash and fond actions. Onely lying and stubbornnesse somewhat more, are the faults whose birth and progresse I would have severely punished and cut off, for they grow and increase with them and if he tongue have once gotten this ill habit, good Lord! hos hard, nay how impossible it is to make her leave it ! whereby it ensueth, that we see many very honest men in other matters, to bee subject and enthralled to that fault I have a good lad to my tailour, whom I never heard speak a truth, no not when it might stand him in stead of profit. If a lie had no more faces but one, as truth hath, we should be in farre better termes than we are For whatsoever a her should say, we would take it in a contrarie sense. But the opposite of truth bath many, many shapes, and an undefinite field. The Pythagoreans make good to be certaine and finite, and evill to bee in finite and uncertaine. I thousand bywayes misse the marke, one onely hits the same. Surely I can never assure my selfe to come to a good end, to warrant an extreme and evident danger, by a shamelesse and solemne An ancient Father saith, IVe are better in the com panie of a knowne dogge, than in a mans societie ruhose speech is unknowne to us. Of the Force of Imagination.

For'is imaginatio Leneral casum. A strong imagina tion leactith chance, say learned clearks. I am one of those that seele a very great conflict and power of imagination. All men are shockt therewith, and some overthrowne by it. The impression of it pierceth me, and for want of strength to resist her, my endevour is to avoid it. I could live with the only assistance of holy and merry hearted men. The sight of others anguishes doth sensibly drive me into anguish, and my sense hath often usurped the sense of a third man. If one cough continually, he provokes my lungs and throat. more unwilling to visit the sicke dutie doth engage me unto, than those to whom I am little beholding and regard least. I apprehend the evill which I studie, and place it in me. The Profit of One Man is the Dammage of Another

Demades the Athenian condemned a man of the Citie. whose trade was to sell such necessaries as belonged to burials, under colour, hee asked too much profit for them, and that such profit could not come unto him without the death of many people. This judgement seemeth to be ill taken, because no man profiteth but by the losse of others by which reason a man should con demne all manner of gaine. The Merchant thrives not but by the licentiousnesse of youth, the Husbandman by dearth of come, the Architect but by the rune of houses, the Lawyer by suits and controversics betweene men Honour it selfe, and practice of religious Ministers, is drawne from our death and vices. No Physitian delighteth in the health of his owne friend, said the ancient Greeke Comike nor no Souldier is pleased with the peace of his Citie, and so of the rest And which is worse, let every man sound his owne conscience, hee shall finde that our inward desires are for the most part nourished and bred in us by the losse and hurt of others, which when I considered, I began to thinke how Nature doth not gainesay herselfe in this, concerning her generall policie, for Physitians hold that The birth, increase, and augmentation of everything is the alteration and corruption of another

William Painter (1540?-94) studied at Cambridge, was master of Sevenoaks school, but in 1561 became Clerk of Ordnance in the Tower His Palace of Pleasure (1566-67), largely composed of stories from Boccaccio, Bindello, and Margaret of Navarre, became popular, and was the main source whence many dramatists drew their plots, several of Shakespeare's plays owe something to his Italian borrowings. Twenty six of the tales come from Bandello, but were done, not from the Italian, but from one or other of the French versions Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet is based directly on the rhymed translation of Arthur Broke, but may in some points have followed Printer's Rhomeo and Iulictta, published in the second volume (1567) of the Palace of The reader may compare the balcon? scene in Painter with that given on the next page as in Broke did behold and marke the lituation of the house, and one day amongs others hee espyed Iulicita at hir Cham ber Window, bounding vpon a narrow Lane, ryght ouer against which Chamber he had a Gardein, which was the cause that Rhomeo, searing discouery of their loue, began the day time to passe no more before the Gate, but so foone as the Night with his browne Mantell had courred the Earth, hee walked alone vp and downe that little streat. And after he had bene there many times, missing the chiefest cause of his comming, Iuliatta, im pacient of hir cuill, one night repaired to hir window, & perceived throughe the bryghtnesse of the Moone hir Friend Rhomeo under hir Window, no leffe attended for, than hee hymfelfe was waighting Then she secretly with Feares in hir Eyes, & wyth voyce interrupted by fighes, said 'Sigmor Rhomeo, me thinke that you hazarde your person to mutch, and commyt the same into great Daunger, at thys time of the Night to protrude your felf to the Mercy of them which meane you little good. Who yf they had taken would have cut you in picces, and mine honor (which I esteme dearer than my Lyfe,) hindred and fuspected for euer ' 'Madame,' aunswered Rhomeo, 'my Lyse is in the Hand of God, who only can dispose the same howbest yf any Man had foughte menes to bereyue mee of my Lyfe, I should (in the presence of you) have made him knowen what mine ability had ben to defend the same standyng Lyfe is not so deare, and of sutch estimation with me, but that I coulde vouchfafe to facryfice the fame for your fake and althoughe my myshappe had bene so greate, as to bee dyspatched in that Place, yet had I no cause to be sorrye therefore, excepte it had bene by lofynge the meanes, and way how to make you vnderstande the good wyll and duety which I beare you, defyrynge not to conferue the fame for anye commodytye that I hope to have thereby, nor for anye other respecte, but onclye to Loue, Serue, and Honor you so long as breath shal remaine in me.' So soone as he had made an end of his talke, loue and pity began to feaze vpon the heart of Iulietta, & leaning hir head vpon hir hand, having hir face all beforent with teares, she faid vinto Ahomeo 'Syr Rhomeo, I pray you not to renue that grief agayne for the onely Memory of futch inconuc nyence maketh me to counterpoyfe betwene Death and Lyfe, my heart being fo vnited with yours, as you cannot receyue the least Injury in this world, whercin I shall not be so great a Partaker as your felf beseechyng you for conclusion, that if you defire your owne health and mine, to declare vnto me in fewe Wordes what youre determynation is to attaine for if you couet any other fecrete thing at my Handes, more than myne Honoure can well allowe, you are maruelously decenued

At thur Broke, or BROOKE, had the honour of writing that Tragicall Historye of Romeus and Iuliet (1562) from which probably Shakespeare chiefly took the story of his drama. Though professedly translating from the Italian of Bandello, Broke worked from a French translation, and the result was a paraphrase, with additions, amplifications, and alterations, in rather limping verserlymed couplets of twelve and thirteen syllables alternately (The prose version of the tale by Painter may also have been before Shakespeare, but Broke's poem gave Shakespeare not merely the plot but sometimes the words, the Nurse is partly Broke's creation) Part of the balcony scene is quoted. Nothing is known of Broke except that he died by shipwreck while passing to France by way of Newhaven to join the English troops fighting for the Huguenots in 1563.

Impacient of her woe, she hapt to leane one night Within her window, and anon the Moone did shine so bright

That she espyde her loue, her hart reuned, sprang,
And now for 103 she clappes her handes, which erst for woe she wrang

Eke Romeus, when he sawe his long desired sight, His moorning cloke of mone cast of, hath clad him with delight

Yet dare I say, of both that she reioyced more

His care was great, hers twise as great was all the tyme before.

But eche of them alike dyd burne in equall flame,
The welbelouing knight, and eke the welbeloued dame
Now whilst with bitter teares her eyes as fountaynes ronne
With whispering voyce, ybroke with sobs, thus is her tale begonne

Oh Romeus of your lyst too lauas sure you are
That in this place, and at thys tyme to hasard it you dare.
What if your dedly foes, my kynsmen, saw you here?
Lyke Lyons wylde, your tender partes asonder would they teare.

In ruth and in disdayne, I, weary of my life, With cruell hand my moorning hart would perce with bloudy knyfe

For you, myne owne once dead, what 10y should I have heare?

And eke my honor staynde which I then lyfe doe holde more deare

Fayre lady myne, dame Iuliet, my lyfe (quod he) Euen from my byrth committed was to fatall sisters three
They may, in spyte of foes, draw foorth my liuely threed,
And they also, who so sayth nay, a sonder may it shreed
But who to reaue my lyfe, his rage and force would bende,
Perhaps should trye vnto his payne how I it could defende
Ne yet I loue it so, but alwayes, for your sake,
A sacrifice to death I would my wounded corps betake

And how I wishe for lyfe, not for my propre ease
But that in it, you might I loue, you honor, serue and please

Tyll dedly pangs the sprite out of the corps shall send And therupon he sware an othe, and so his tale had ende

Now loue and pitty boyle in Iuliets ruthfull brest,
In windowe on her leaning arme her weary hed doth reste,
Her bosome bathd in teares, to witnes inward payne,
With dreary chere to Romeus, thus aunswerd she agayne, Ah my deere Romeus, keepe in these woordes (quod she),
For lo, the thought of such mischaunce already maketh me
For pitty and for dred welnigh to yelde vp breath
In euen ballance peysed are my life and eke my death
For so my hart is knitte, yea made one selfe with yours
That sure there is no greefe so small, by which your mynde endures.

John Harington, the elder (flor 1540–78), who was a confidential servant of Henry VIII, wrote very pleasing love-verses, some of which were published in the Auza Antiqua (1804). The pact married first a natural daughter of the king, and then Isabella Warkham, one of the Princess Elizabeth's gentlewomen, and with his second wife vas sent to the Tower by Queen Mary, together with Elizabeth, who, on her accession to the throne, rewarded him with many favours. The following verses, from the author's own MS dated 1564 (but written probably ten years before), were composed on Isabella Markham, and Sir John Harington ip 186 391), the translator of Ariosto, was the son of this loving couple Whence comes my love? O hearte, disclose 'I was from cheeks that shame the rose, From lips that spoyle the rubics prayse, From eyes that mock the diamond's blaze. Whence comes my woe? as freely owne, Ah me! 'twa from a heartelyke stone.

The blushyng check speakes mo lest minde, The hpps, befitting wordes moste kynde, The eye does tempte to love s desire, And seems to say its Cupid's fire, Yet all so faire but speake my moane, Syth noughte dothe saye the hearte of stone

Why thus my love, so kynd bespeake
Si eet lyppe, sweet eye, sweet blushvinge cheeke—
Yet not a hearte to save my paine?
O Venus, take thy giftes again,
Make not so faire to cause our moane
Or make a hearte that 's lyke our owne

Richard Edwards (1523'-66) was a Somerset man, who studied at Oxford, and was a member of Lincoln's Inn, but became a gentleman of the Chapel Royal and Master of the Children of the Chapel His drama of Palamon and Ireite has not been preserved, but Damon and Pythias is in Dodslev's collection, and is of little importance. Many of his poems, which were very popular, are in The Paradyse of Dayntye Devises. One was Amantium Irw Amoris Redintegratio Est.

In going to my naked bed, is one that would have slept,
I hear I a wife sing to her childe, that long before had went

She suched sore, and sung full sweet, to bring the babe to rest.

That would not cease, but cried still, in sucking at her brest

She was full weare of her watch, and grieved with her childe,

She rocked it, and rated it, till that on her it smilde,

Then did she say Now have I found this proverb true to prove,

The falling out of faithfull friendes renewing is of love

The tooke I paper, pen, and ink, this proverb for to write,

In register for to remaine of such a worthy wight, As slap proceeded thus in song unto her little brat, Much matter attered the of saight in place whereas she And proved plaine there was no beast, nor creature bearing life,

Could well be knowne to live in love without discorde and strife

Then kissed she her little babe, and sware by God above,

The falling out of faithfull freendes renewing is of love.

I marvaile much, pardie, quoth she, for to beholde the

To see man, woman, boy, and beast, to tosse the world about.

Some kneels, some crouch, some backe, some check, and some can smoothly smile,

And some embrace others in arms, and there thinke many a vile.

Some stand aloofe at cap and knee, some humble, and some stout.

Yet are they never freendes indeed until they once fall

Thus ended she her song, and said, before she did

The falling out of faithfull freendes renewing is of love.

George Turberville (1540?-1610) was of the ancient Dorset house from which Mr Hardy's 'Tess of the D'Urbervilles' was descended, and was secretary to Sir Thomas Randolph, Queen Elizabeth's ambassador in Scotland and (for two years) in Russia. He translated from Latin into English verse (Ovid, &c), and from Italian (Ten Tragicall Tales, also versified), wrote books on Falconrie and hunting, and—his most notable book, in virtue of which he ranks amongst Elizabethan poets—Epitaphes, Lpigrams, Songs and Sonets (2nd ed. 1567, reprinted by Collier 1867). A number of his poems, written in 'Moscovia,' de scribe the manners of the Russians

That Death is not so much to be Feared as Daylie Diseases are

What? ist not follie for to dread and stand of Death in feare, That Mother is of quiet rest, and griefs away doth weare?

That brings release to want of wealth, and poore oppressed Wights?

He comes but once to mortall men, but once for all he smite.

Was never none that twise hath felt of cruell Death the Knife, But other griefes and pining paines doe linger on thro life,

And oftentimes one selfe same Corse with furious fits molest,
When Death by one dispatch of life doth bring the soule to rest.

A Vow to Serve Fulthfully

In greene and growing age, in lustic yeers, In latter dayes when silver bush appears, In good and gladsome hap when Fortune serves In lowing luck when good aventure swerves, By day when Phoebus shewes his princely pride, By night when golden Starres in skies doe glide, In Winter when the groves have lost their greene,
In Sommer when the Longest dayes are seene,
In happie helth when sicklesse limmes have ly'e,
In griefull state, amids my dolors ryfe,
In pleasant peace when Trumpets are away,
In wreakful warre when Mars doth beare the sway,
In perillous goulfe amid the sinking sande,
In safer soyle and in the stable lande,—
When so you laugh, or else with grimmer grace
You beare your faithfull Friend unfriendly fice,
In good report and time of woorser fame,
I will be yours, yea though I loose the game

To a Gentlewoman that alwayes willed him to weare Rosemarie

The greene that you did wish mee weare aye for your loove,
And on my helme a braunch to beare not to remoove
Was ever you to have in minde,
Whom Cupid hath my Feere assignde.

As I in this have done your will, and minde to doo So I request you to fulfill my fansie too A greene and loving heart to have, And this is all that I doe crave.

For if your flowring heart should chaunge his colour greene,
Or you at length a Ladi straunge of ince be seene
Then will my braunch against his use
His colour chaunge for your refuse.

As Winters force can not deface this braunch his hue
So let no chaunge of love disgrace your friendship true
You were mine owne and so be still,
So shall we live and love our fill

Then may I thinke my selfe to bee well recompenst, For wearing of the Tree that is so well defenst Agaynst all weather that doth fall, When waywarde Winter spits his gall

And when wee meete to trie me true, looke on my hed,
And I will crave an oath of you wher Faith be fled

So shall we both assured bee, Both I of you, and you of mee

A few other contemporaries we name here Barnabe Googe (1540-1594), born in Lincoln, studied both at Cambridge and at Oxford, and in 1574 was by Cecil sent to Ireland, where he became provost marshal in Connaught He was well spoken of as a poet for his Eglogs, Epitaphes, and Sonnetes (1563), and translated The Popish Kingdome or Reigne of Antichrist, a satirical Latin poem by Thomas Naogeorgus or Kirchmayer -Thomas Churchyard (1520 3-1604), soldier, poetaster, and miscellaneous writer, produced scores of volumes, pamphlets, and broadsides in prose and verse. He served in the army, 'trailed a pike' in the reigns of Henry VIII, Mary, and Elizabeth, fought in Scotland (he described the siege of Leith in a poem), Ireland, Flanders, and France, and received from Elizabeth-whom he had propitiated by complimentary addresses-a pension of eighteenpence a day, which was not paid regularly Churchyard was the Old Palæmon of Spenser's Colin Clout,

That sang so long untill quite hoarse he grew

His best poem is The Legend of Shore's Wife (1563), but is not great. The Worthiness of Wales is a highly topographical poem (1587, republished by the Spenser Society in 1871) His adventures are described in Churchyarde's Chippes (1575, &c., the part concerning Scotland was reprinted by Chalmers in 1817) Single pieces or selections were printed by Sir Alexander Boswell and others --Thomas Place (c. 1510-60), lawyer, physician, and translator, apparently born at Norwich, is remembered for his translation (1555-60) of the first nine books of the Eneid into fourteen syllable verse (completed later by other hands), it was warmly commended by Puttenham and other contempo raries - Sir Thomas Chaloner (1521-65), a London mercer's son, who was at the court of Charles V as a diplomatist, repeatedly conducted negotiations with the Scots, fought at Pinkie, and was later ambassador to Spain He wrote in prose and crse, both Laun and English, and contributed to the Hyrroure for Magistrales—tribur Golding (1435-1605), the son of an Essex gentleman, is said to have been educated at Cambridge, and was in industrious translator of theological works from Latin and French, especially Calvin, Beza, and Bullinger—He also Englished Cæsar and part of Seneca, but is best known for his rendering in English ballad metre of Ovid's Melamorphoses (1565-67, republished 1904), praised by all contemporary critics, and familiar to Shakespeare

Literary Criticism.

Most early English literary criticism is incidental, as in Ascham's Scholemaster, or, like Gascoigne's Vates of Instruction (see page 247), deals directly with the craft of verse making Gabriel Harvey staggered his friend Spenser with his pedantic arguments against thyme, and in favour of regulating English verse by the rules of classical prosody (see page 332) William Webbe, about whom little is known save that after studying at St John's College, Cambridge, he became tutor in families of distinc tion, in 1586 took the same side, in his Discourse of English Poetrie, 'with the author's judgment touching the reformation of English verse.' He not merely protested against 'the tinkerly verse which we call rhyme,' but provided his enemies with arguments by printing, as example of reformed verse, his own wooden hexameters and sapphics cursorily surveys English poetry to his own time, bives us much interesting information on current views, and in spite of his theory, welcomes the (monymous) author of the Shepheards Calender as the best of all English poets that I have seen or heard' In 1602 Thomas Campion, graceful song writer though he was, was still denouncing 'the childish titil ition of riming,' and being answered by Daniel (see page 339) Gosson's School of Abuse (1579) was not so much literary criticism as a sincere and powerful Puritan impeachment, by a converted playwright, of modern manners, including playgoing and poetry making, and ultimately called forth Sidney's Apology (1595) Meanwhile Puttenham's 1rt of Poisie had appeared

Stephen Gosson (1555-1624), a Kentish man, studied at Oxford, and having been poet, actor (perhaps), dramatist, sittrist, and preacher, died rector of St Botolph's, Bishops ate. His pistorals vere praised, none of his comedies or tragedies have been preserved. Gosson's famous satire, the Senteral of 16 are (1579), was dedicated to Sidney, and moved him, after a time, to write his apology or defence of poetry, as Gosson's short treatise is 'an invective against poets, pipers, players, jesters, and such like caterpill its of a commonwealth.' The first regular theatre in England had been built by burbage three years before (1576), and vas keenly it acked by the clergy. Gosson says

And I cause I have I are matriculated my selfe in the seconds where so many about storish, I will imitate the dead I appt, a linch, comming to the banks of Nylus to quenche their thirste, syp and away, drinke running, lest they be snapte short for a pray to crocodile. I shoulde tel tales out of the schoole and bee ferruled for my failte or hyssed at for a blab yf I layde all the orders open before your eyes. You are no sooner entred, but libertie looseth the reynes, and geves you head, placing you with poetrie in the lowest forme, when his skill is showne to make his scholer as good as ever twangde. Hee preferres you to piping, from pyping to playing, from play to pleasure, from pleasure to slouth, from slouth to sleepe, from sleepe to sinne, from sinne to death, from death to the devill, if you take your learning apace and passe through every forme without revolting

Like other satirical writers, when he inveighs against the degeneracy of his own time he forgets all its claims to credit, and leaves out of account all the glories of the Elizabethan era. Thus

Our wreasting at arms is turned to wallowing in ladies laps, our courage to cowardice, our running to ryot, our bowes into bolles [bowls], and our dartes to dishes. We have robbed Greece of gluttonie, Italy of winton nesse, Spaine of pride, Fraunce of deceite, and Dutch land of quaffing Compare London to Rome and England to Italy, you shall find the theaters of the one, the abuses of the other, to be rife among us Experto crede, I have seene somewhat, and therefore I thinks may say the more

Lodge replied to Gosson almost at once (see an extract at page 318), and there were defences, attacks, and reiterations on both sides Sidney's apology did not appear till 1595

George Puttenham. - In 1589 appeared anonymously The Arte of English Poesie, written, as its author states, for the queen herself, courtiers, and ladies and young gentlewomen 'desirous to become skilful in their owne mother tongue, and for their private recreation to make now and then ditties of pleasure.' The authorship was not ascribed to any one till in 1614 Richard Carew said the book was by Master Puttenham has generally been understood to be George Puttenham (died 1590), but it may have been his brother Richard (c. 1520-1601), both of them nephcus of Sir Thomas Elyot. The author describes himself as a scholar of Oxford, and as having travelled abroad, been at court, and written interludes, poems, and prose works (unknown to any later generation) Slender as are the grounds for fixing the authorship, there is no doubt that the Arte of Poesie is the first systematic criticism of literature as art in English, more comprehensive than the cognate essays of Webbe (1586) and Sidney (1595), and from its publication onwards treated as a standard work. It is a treatise of some length, divided into three books—the first of poets and poesy, the second of proportion, and the third of ornament. There are chapters on language, rhyme in Latin, the poetry of 'wilde and savadge people,' the different kinds of poesy, cadence, metres, style, figures, and an interesting survey of English poetry down to his own time, quoted below. The first book thus opens

A Poet is as much to say as a maker And our English name well conformes with the Greeke word for of ποιείν, to make, they call a maker Poeta Such as (by way of re-emblance and reverently) we may say of God who without any travell to his divine imagination, made all the world of nought, nor also by any paterne or mould as the Platonicks with their Idees do phantastically sup pose. Even so the very Poet makes and contrives out of his owne braine both the verse and matter of his poeme, and not by any foreine copie or example, as doth the translator, who therefore may well be sayd a versifier, but not a Poet. The premises considered, it giveth to the name and profession no small dignitie and prehemi nence above all other artificers, Scientificke or Mechani call. And neverthelesse without any repugnancie at all, a Poet may in some sort be said a follower or imitator, because he can expresse the true and lively of every thing is set before him, and which he taketh in hand to describe and so in that respect is both a maker and a counterfaitor and Poesie an art not only of making, but also of imitation. (From Chap 1)

It appeareth by sundry records of bookes both printed and written, that many of our countreymen have painfully travelled in this part of whose works some appeare to be but bare translations, other some matters of their owne invention and very commendable, whereof some recitall shall be made in this place, to th'intent chiefly that their names should not be defrauded of such honour as seemeth due to them for having by their thankefull studies so much beautified our English tong, as at this day it will be found our nation is in nothing inferiour to the French or Italian for copie of language, subtiltie of device, good method and proportion in any forme of poeme, but that they may compare with the most, and perchance passe a great many of them. And I will not reach above the time of king Edward the third and Richard the second for any that wrote in English meeter because before their times by reason of the late Normane conquest, which had brought into this Realme much alteration both of our langage and lawes, and there withall a certain martiall barbarousnes, whereby the study of all good learning was so much decayd, as long time after no man or very few entended to write in any laudable science so as beyond that time there is litle or nothing worth commendation to be founde written in this arte. And those of the first age were Chaucer and Gover, both of them as I suppose knightes. After whom followed John Lydgate the monke of Bury, and that nameles, who wrote the Satyre called Piers Plowman, next him fol lowed Harding the Chronicler, then in king Henry th' eight times Skelton, (I wot not for what great worthines) surnamed the Poet Laureat In the latter end of the same kings raigne sprong up a new company of courtly makers, of whom Sir Thomas Wyat th'elder and Henry Earle of Surrey were the two chieftaines, who having travailed into Italie, and there tasted the sweete and stately measures and stile of the Italian Poesie as novices newly crept out of the schooles of Dante, Arioste and Petrarch, they greatly pollished our rude and homely maner of vulgar Poesie, from that it had bene before, and for that cause may justly be sayd the first reformers of our English meetre and stile. In the same time or not long after was the Lord Nicholas Vaux, a man of much facilitie in vulgar makings. Afterward in king Edward the sixths time came to be in reputation for the same facultie Thomas Sternehold, who first translated into English certaine Psalms of David, and John Hoywood the Epigrammatist who for the myrth and quicknesse of his conceits more then for any good learning was in him came to be well benefited by the king. But the principall man in this profession at the same time was Maister Edward Ferrys, a man of no lesse mirth and felicitie that way, but of much more skil and magnifi cence in his meeter, and therefore wrate for the most part to the stage, in Tragedie and sometimes in Comedie or Enterlude, wherein he gave the king so much good recreation, as he had thereby many good rewardes Queene Maries time florished above any other Doctour Phaer, one that was well learned and excellently well translated into English verse heroicall certaine bookes of Virgils Encides Since him followed Maister Arthure Golding, who with no lesse commendation turned into English meetre the Metamorphosis of Ovide, and that other Doctour, who made the supplement to those bookes of Virgils Aiteidos, which Maister Phaer lest undone And in her Maiesties time that now is are sprong up an other crew of Courtly makers, Noble men and Gentle men of her Majesties owne servauntes, who have written excellently well as it would appeare if their doings could be found out and made publicke with the rest, of which number is first that noble Gentleman Edward Earle of Oxford. Thomas Lord of Bukhurst, when he was young, Henry Lord Paget, Sir Philip Sidney, Sir Walter Rawleigh, Master Edward Dyar, Maister Fulke Grevelt, Gascon, Britton, Turberville and a great many other learned Gentlemen, whose names I do not omit for envie, but to avoyde tediousnesse, and who have deserved no little commendation. But of them all particularly this is myne opinion, that Chaucer, with Gower, Lidgat and Harding for their antiquitie ought to have the first place, and Chaucer as the most renowmed of them all, for the much learning appeareth to be in him above any of the rest And though many of his bookes be but bare translations out of the Latin and French, yet are they wel handled, as his bookes of Troilus and Cresseid, and the Romant of the Rose, whereof he trans lated but one halfe, the device was John de Mehunes a French Poet, the Canterbury tales were Chaucers owne invention as I suppose, and where he sheweth more the naturall of his pleasant wit then in any other of his workes, his similitudes, comparisons and all other descriptions are such as can not be amended meetre heroicall of Froilus and Cresseid is very grave and stately, keeping the staffe of seven, and the verse of ten, his other verses of the Canterbury tales be but riding ryme, neverthelesse very well becoming the matter of that pleasaunt pilgrimage in which every mans part is playd with much decency Gower saving for his good and grave moralities had nothing in him highly to be commended, for his verse was homely and without good measure, his wordes strained much deale out of the French writers, his ryme wrested, and in his inventions small subtillitie the applications of his moralities are the best in him, and yet hose many times very grosselv bestowed, neither doth the substance of his workes sufficiently aunswere the subtilitie of his titles. Lydgat a translatour onely and no deviser of that which he wrate, but one that wrate in good verse. Harding a Poet Epick or Historicall, handled himselfe well according to the time and maner of his subject. He that wrote the Satyr of Piers Ploughman seemed to have bene a malcontent of that time, and therefore bent himselfe wholy to taxe the disorders of that age, and specially the pr de of the Komane Clergy, of whose fall he scemeth to be a very true Prophet, his verse is but loose meetre, and his termes hard and obscure, so as in them is little pleasure to be taken. Skelton a sharpe Satirist, but with more rayling and scoffery then became a Poet Lawreat, such among the Greekes were called Pantonimi, with us Puffons, altogether applying their wits to Scurrillities and other rediculous matters. Henry Larle of Surrey and hir Thomas II sat, betweene whom I finde very litle difference, I repute them (as before) for the two chief lan ernes of light to all others that have since employed their pennes upon English Poesie, their conceits were lofti, their stiles stately, their conveyance cleanely, their terme proper, their meetre sweete and well proportioned, in all imitating very naturally and studiously their Maister The Lord I aux his commendation Francis Petrarena licth chiefly in the facilitie of his meetre, and the apt nesse of his descriptions such as he taketh upon him to make, namely in sundry of his Songs, wherein he sheweth the cointerfait action very lively and pleasantly Of the later sort I thinke thus That for Tragedie the I ord of Buckhurst, and Maister Eduard Ferrys for such doings as I have some of thoirs do deserve the hyest Th'Earle of Oxford and Maister Edwardes of her Majesties Chappell for Comedy and Enterlude. For Lalopue and pastorall Poesie, Sir Philip Sydney and Muster Challenner, and that other Gentleman who wrate the late Shepheardes Callender For dittie and amourous Oue I finde Sir Walter Ruveleighs vayne most loftic, insolent, and passionate. Maister Edward Djar, for Llegie most sweete, solempiic and of high conceit. Gasem for a good meeter and for a plentifull vayne Thace and Golding for a learned and well corrected verse, specially in translation cleare and very faithfully answering their authours intent. Others have also written with much facillitie, but more commendably perchance if they had not written so much nor so popularly. But last in recitall and first in degree is the Queene our soveraigne Lady, whose learned, delicate, nable Muse easily surmounteth all the rest that have written before her time or since for sense, sweetnesse and subtillitie, be it in Ode, Elegie, Epigram, or any other kinds of poeme Heroick or Lyricke wherein it shall please her Majestie to employ her penne, even by as much oddes as her owne excellent estate and degree exceedeth all the rest of her most humble vassalls.

There are shrewd observations in Puttenham's advice to the poet on diction or choice of words

Before the Conquest of the Normans it was the Angle caxon, and before that the British, which as some will is at this day the Walsh, or as others affirme the Cornish I for my parte thinks neither of both, as they be now spoken and pronounced This part in our maker or Loct must be heedyly booked unto, that it be naturall pure, and the most u hall of all his countrey and for the same purpose rather that which is spoken in the Luigs Court, or in the good townes and Cities within he land, I'm in the marche and frontiers, or in port to toes, where straungers haunt for traffike sake, or jet - Universities where Schollers use much peevish affecta tion of a nd out of the primative languages, or finally, in an ughud h village or corner of a Realme, where is no re or but of poore rusticall or uncivil people

neither shall be follow the speach of a craftes man or carter, or other of the inferiour sort, though he be inhabitant or bred in the best towne and Citie in this Realme, for such persons doe abuse good speaches by strange accents or ill shapen soundes, and false ortographie But he shall follow generally the better brought up sort, such as the Greekes call charientes, men civill and graciously behavoured and bred maker therfore at these days shall not follow Piers Plooman nor Gover nor Lidgate nor yet Chaucer, for their language is now out of use with us neither shall he take the termes of Northern men, such as they use in dayly talke, whether they be noble men or gentlemen, or of their best clarkes all is a matter nor in effect any speach used beyond the river of Trent, though no man can deny but that theirs is the purer English Saxon at this day, yet it is not so Courtly nor so current as our Southerne English is, no more is the far Westerne mans speach ye shall therefore take the usuall speach of the Court, and that of London and the shires lying about London within lx. myles, and not much above I say not this but that in every shyre of Figland there be gentlemen and others that speake but specially write as good Southerne as we of Middlesex or Surrey do, but not the common people of every shire, to whom the gentlemen, and also their learned clarkes do for the most part condescend, but herein we are already ruled by th'English Dictionaries and other bookes written by learned men, and therefore it needeth none other direc tion in that behalfe. (From Book in chap 4)

It will be noticed that he includes amongst poets Hardyng (1378-1465), a mere rhyming chronicler, Edward Ferrys or Ferrers, apparently by mistake for George Ferrers, soldier, courtier, and writer of masques, who died in 1579, Phaer, Golding, and Chaloner are named at pages 265-6 Gascon is Gascoigne, Britton is Breton

Camden.

William Camden (1551-1623), one of the best historians of his age, was born in London, and educated at Christ's Hospital, St Paul's School, and Oxford. In 1575 he became second master of Westminster School, but devoted his leisure hours to the study of the antiquities of Britain-1 subject to which from his earliest years he had been strongly inclined. That he might personally examine ancient remains, he in 1582 travelled through some of the eastern and northern counties of England, and the fruits of his researches appeared in his famous Britannia, written in Latin, and describing itself (in the translation by Philemon Holland, 1610, prepared apparently under Camden's own superintendence) as A Chorographicall Description of the most Flourishing Kingdomes of England, Scotland, Irelana, and the Ilands adioyning, out of the Depth of Antiquitie This was published in 1586, and immediately brought him into high repute as an antiquary and main of learning. Anxious to improve and enlarge it, he again and again journeyed into different parts of the country, examining archives and relics of intiquity, and collecting, with indefatigable industry, whatever information might contribute to render it more complete. The sixth edition, published in 1607, was that which received his finishing touches, and of this an English translation, made with the author's sanction by Dr Philemon Holland, appeared in 1610 Holland's second edition (1637) contained many additions by the translator. From the preface to the translation we extract the following account by Camden of his historical labours

I hope it shall be no discredite to me if I now use againe the same words with a few more than I used twenty foure yeeres since in the first edition of this Abraham Ortelius, the worthy restorer of ancient geographie, arriving heere in England above thirty foure yeares past, dealt earnestly with me that I would illustrate this He of Britaine, or (as he said) that I would restore antiquity to Britaine, and Britaine to his antiquity, which was, as I understood, that I would renew an cientric, enlighten obscuritie, cleare doubts, and recall home ventie by way of recovery, which the negligence of writers, and credulitie of the common sort had in a maner proscribed and utterly banished from among us. A painfull matter, I assure you, and more than difficult, wherein what toyle is to be taken as no man thinketh so no man beleeveth but he that hath made the triall Nevertheless, how much the difficultie discouraged me from it, so much the glory of my country encouraged me to undertake it. So while at one and the same time I was fearefull to undergoe the burden, and yet desirous to doe some service to my country, I found two different affections, Feare and Boldnesse, I knowe not how, conjoined in me. Notwithstanding, by the most gratious direction of the Almighty, taking industrie for my consort, I adventured upon it, and, with all my studie, carc, cogitation, continuale meditation, paine, and travaile, I emploied myselfe thereunto when I had any spare time. I made search after the etymologie of Britaine and the first inhabitants timerously, neither in so doubtfull a matter have I affirmed ought confidently For I am not ignorant that the first originalls of nations are obscure, by reason of their profound antiquitie, as things which are seene very deepe and farre remote, lil e as the courses, the reaches, the confluents, and the out lets of great rivers are well knowne, yet their first fountaines and heads he commonly unknowne. I have succincily runne over the Romans government in Britaine, and the mundation of forragne people thereinto, what they were, and from whence they came. I have traced out the ancient divisions of these kingdoms, I have sum marily specified the states and judiciall Courts of the same. In the severall counties, I have compendiously set downe the limites (and yet not exactly by pearch and pole, to breed questions), what is the nature of the soile, which were places of the greatest antiquitie, who have been the dukes marquesses, earles, viscounts, barons, and some of the most signall and ancient families therein (for who can particulate all?) What I have performed, I leave to men of judgment But time, the most sound and sincere witnesse, will give the truest information, when envie, which persecuteth the living, shall have her mouth stopped. Thus much give mee Jeave to saythat I have in nowise neglected such things as are materiall to search and sift out the Truth attained to some skill of the most ancient British and Lnglish Saxon tongues I have travailed over all England for the most part, I have conferred with most skillfull observers in each country, I have studiously read over our owne countrie writers, old and new, all Greeke and Latine authors which have once made mention of Britaine, I have had conference with learned men in the other parts of Christendome, I have been diligent in the Records of this Realme, I have looked into most Libraries, Registers, and memorials of Churches, Cities, and Corporations, I have pored over many an old Rowle and Evidence, and produced their testimony (as beyond all exception) when the cause required, in their very owne words (although barbarous they be) that the honor of veritie might in no wise be impeached

The Britannia went through many subsequent editions, and proved so useful a repository of antiquarian and topographical knowledge that it was styled 'the common sun, whereat our modern writers have all lighted their little torches' A later translation was by Gibson, Bishop of London (1695), and, with large additions, by Richard Gough (1789 and 1806)

In 1593 Camden became head-master of Westminster School, and, for the use of his pupils, published a Greek Grammar in 1597 same year he left the task work of teaching on his receiving the appointment of Clarencieux Kingof Arms, an office which allowed him more leisure for his favourite pursuits Other works, all in Latin, were an account of the monuments and inscriptions in Westminster Abbey, a collection of ancient English historians, a narrative of the trial of the Gunpowder Plotters, drawn up at the desire of James VI, and annals of the reign of The last of these works is Queen Elizabeth praised by Hume both for style and matter, and as being 'written with simplicity of expression, very rare in that age, and with a regard to truth It is eminently favourable to Elizabeth, and Robertson protested against its account of Scottish affairs under Queen Mary as inaccurate Camden, who left a short autobiography in Latin, died unmarried at Chislehurst, 9th November 1623, at the age of seventy two, and was buried in West-Not long before his death he minster Abbey founded and endowed a history lecture at Oxford.

In the Britannia, Camden, after describing the Britons of England, Wales, and Cornwall, and the Picts of Caledonia, thus proceeds to distinguish between the 'wild Scots' and the 'civil Scots'

Among the people of Britaine, after Picts, the Scotish nation by good right challenge the next place con cerning whom, before I speak ought, for feare lest evill willers and frowardly peevish, should calumniously mis construe those allegations, which I, simply, ingenuously, and in all honest meaning, shall heere cite out of ancient writers as touching Scots, I must certific the Reader before hand, that everie particular hath reference to the old, true, and naturall Scots onely whose of-spring are those Scots speaking Irish, which inhabite all the West part of the kingdome of Scotland, now so called, and the Ilands adjoyning thereto, and who now a daies be termed High land men. For, the rest which are of civil Leha jour, and bee seated in the Last part therof, ailest they beare now the name of Scotish men, yet are they no lung lease than Scots, but descended from the very same Germane originall, that we English men are, And this, neither can they chuse but confesse, nor we but acl no ledge, being as they are, termed by those above, aid. High land men, Sassones, as well as we, and using as they doe the same language with us, to wit, the Luclish Saxon, different onely in Dialect, a most assured argument of one and the same originall. In which regard, so farre am I from working any discredit unto them, that I have rather respectively loved them alvaics, as of the same bloud and stocke, ven and honoured them too, even when the Kingdomes were divided but now much more, since it hath pleased our almightic and most mercifull God, that wee growe united in one bodic, under one most Sacred head of the Luipire, to the joy, happinesse, welfare, and safetie of both Nations, which I heartily wish and pray for

He is sceptical about the most current contradictory etymologies of the word Scoti, and sensibly says, 'A man may with as great probability derive the Scots pedigree from the gods as from Scota, that supposed and counterfeat daughter of the Lgypti in King Pharao, wedded (forsooth) unto Guthelus, the sonne of Cecrops, founder of Athens "-a derivation not exploded in Scotland at that time. Less justly he weighs and rejects the etymology accepted by modern Celtic scholars 'And yet I cannot but marvell whence Isidorus had this. The Scots (saith he) take their name in their own proper tongue of their painted bodies, for that they are marked with sharpe yron pricks and inke.' (Professor Rhys defends the view that Scott is a Latin word from a British verb scod, used of this tattooing process) Camdon then shows justly enough that the early Scots were Irish

I or certainely knowen t is that out of Ireland, an He inhabited in old time by Britans, as shall in due place be prooved, they passed into Britain, and what time to they were first known unto writers by this name, scated they were in Ireland. I or Claudian the Poet hath written of their irruptions into Britaine, in these verses

Te'am e im Scotus Hibernem Mori, et infesto spumænt remige Thetis

What tune the Scots all Ireland stir'd offensive armes o take,

And with maine stroke of enemies ores, the sea much fome did ma' e

Also in another place,

Sco rum cumulos flevit glacialis Hite ne

Ind frozen Ireland heapes of Scots bewail'd with many a teare

Ore its blewise writer thus, Ireland is peopled with Scotis Nations. Gildas calleth Scots, Irish Spoilers. And beda, The Scots that inhabite Ireland, an Isle seat unto Britaine as also elsewhere. Yea, and in the dates of Charles the Great, Psinhardus in expresse words calleth Ireland The Isle of Scots Moreover, Giraldu Combrensis, That the Scotish nation (saith he) is desended out of Ireland, the affinitie as well of their Language, as of their apparell, of their weapons also, and of their maners even to this day doe sufficiently proove

Camden finally accepts the tradition that the Scots came from Spain into Ireland, and the (Irish) identification of the words Scots and Scyths. And though he sees the inconveniences of the theory, he is bound to hold that the Scythians must have been Goths, and so a kind of Germans originally. He adds a new argument for the identification of Scots, Scythi, and Gothi

But if arguments in this case may bee taken from the habite and apparell of the people, surely the array and clothing of the wild Scots at this day, is all one with that of the Gothes in times past, as we may by and by perceive out of Sidonius Apollinaris, who in describing a Goth, portraieth and depainteth unto us a wild Scot, as right as may be They are (saith he) of a flaming deepe yellow, died with saffron, they buckle upon their feet a paire of Broges made of raw and untanned leather up to their ankles, their knees, thighs, and calves of their legs are all bare. their garments high in the necke, straight made and of sundry colours, comming skarce downe to their hammes, the sleeves cover the upper points of their armes and no more, their souldiers coats of colour greene, edged with a red fringe, their belts hanging downe from the shoulder, the lappets of their eares hidden under the curled glibbes and lockes of haire lying all over them, (For so a man may very rightly call the manifold branched and parted twists of haire, which Scots and Irish weare,) they use also hooked Spears, which Gildas termeth Vnemata tela, and axes to fling from them. They were likewise strait bodied coats (as saith Porphyrio) fitted close to their breasts, without girdles. If this be not for all the world the very right apparell of the wild Irish Scots, let them selves be Iudges.

RYGHT WORTHY SYR,—That in my solitarines here I may worde the deadly sinne of Slouth, I am now an humble suitor to you that you would send me by William Holland my servant the Book of Heraldry, if you have bound it up, or as it is. Or some other booke or Papers which you shall think fitting my studies or delight. The Booke of France which I lately received standeth me in small steed, for I per cease by my Notes that I have had it heretofore. And therefore I will shortly returne it Your Absolon de Vita Guthlaci is the very same that other call Falix Monachus, and I have already both it and the other conjoined therewith. But for Fheodulus, I never sawe him before. Thus presuming of your ancient kindness, I rest,—Yours in all most assuredly, Felix's Life of St Guthlac is still an authority for the Life of the Hermit of Crowland.

Based on his own Memor icilia de Seifso and his letters, there are Lives of Camden by Smith (1691) and in the various editions of the Britimum (Git one, Gough's, Ec.), and in Wood's Allier & Oxenens s

John Speed (1552?-1629) published in 1611 a History of Great Britaine, in which he was assisted by Spelman, Cotton, and others Born at Farringdon, in Cheshire, and a London tailor too by trade, he enjoyed few advantages from education, yet his history is highly creditable to his acquirements and judgment, and was long the best in existence. He rejected some of the fables of preceding chroniclers concerning the origin of the Britons, and though he retained many of the time honoured errors, was more discriminating in his selection of authorities His history of the island extends to the union of England and Scotland under King James, to whom the work was In 1606 he published maps of England and Wales, subsequently extended to Scotland and Ireland, the best that had till then appeared following letters of the learned tailor to Cotton reveal the conscientious author and proof reviser

Worshipfull Sir, my thoughts runnyng upon the well performance of this worke, and fearfull to comitt any thing disagreeing from the truth, I have sent you a coppy of some part of that which you have alredy sene, because you left in writing at the Printers that with a fast eye you had overune it, and your leasure better affording that busines in the contrey then here you had, this therefore hath caused me to send you as much as my Printer cane espare, beseiching your Worshipe to read it more attenty vly, to place the Coynes, and what adicssions you will before you returne it, and I pray you to past a paper where you doe adde, and not to intirline the coppy, for somewhere we cannot read your Notes because the place geues your pene not rome to exprese your mynd I have sent such Coynes as are cutt, and will weekly supply the same, so much therefore as you shall perfect I praye you send againe with as much speed as you can, but where you do want the Coynes, kepe that coppy still with you, untill I send them, for I shall not be sattisfied with your other directions or Mr Coles helpe Good Sir, afford me herein your assistanc as you have begune, and remember my suit to my L privy seall, wherein you shall binde me in all dutifull service and affection to your Worship's command. So beseiking the Almighty to prosper our indevours I humbly take my leave, and leave your Worship to the Lordes protection

Your Worships to comand in all dutifull service,

I am returned to my Printers, and therfore yf you please your directions maye be thither Remember to signify the formes of 'our Altars.

Sir, I do most hartely thanke for your Worships assist ance and kinde remembrance of our busynes, which doth not a little revive my now decayed spirit, lying on bed of my old disease the stone, which is not more grievious unto me than the detraction of this so chargable a busyness. I have sent you as many Coynes as are done, and will weekly supply them as we can get them from detracting Swisser [Christopher Switzer, a well known engraver]. Also you shall herewith receive two leaves of coppy which we can not read the place that you have interlyined, and either to falsify your meaning, or leave out one silable we wold be lothe. Therfore I pray you both perfect that, and the yere of Christ in the other, and send them again in all hast possible, for the Printer already hath overtaken us Thus comending my self most hartely to your Worship, I humble tak my leave this 30th of August

Yor Worships in all duty,

JOH SPEEDE

Good Sir, I most earnestly entreat you to send these towe sheets inclosed, upon Wensday next, for in truth I dowbt we shall want them before that daye.

If you will send a Note of all Monasteryes in the Realm, as also the Book of Henry the fourth, I shalbe much beholding to your Worship Thus you see how bold I am, but it is in love of that Kingdom which your self seeks still to adorne

Amongst historical writers is also the poet Samuel Daniel (see page 339), who wrote the first and second parts of a History of England, extending from the Norman Conquest to the death of Edward III, a mere compilation -Str Henry Spelman (1564-1641), antiquary, was born at Congham, in Norfolk, of which county he was high sheriff in 1604. His works are almost all upon legal and ecclesiastical antiquities Having found it necessary to study Anglo-Saxon, he embodied the fruits of his labour in his ponderous Glossarium Archævlogicum (1626-64), explaining the obsolete words occurring in the laws of England, it was completed after the author's death by his son and Dugdale. Another work was a Latin history of English church councils, also left incomplete. He wrote further on tithes and on sacrilege.-Sir John Hayward (1564?-1627), born at Felistowe, in 1599 published The First Part of the Life and Reign of Henry IV, which he dedicated to the Earl of Essex. Some passages in it give such offence to the queen that she caused the author to be imprisoned He conciliated James I by defending his succession and the divine right of kings, and at the desire of Prince Henry, composed Lives of the Three Norman Kings of England (1613) After his death, in 1627, was published (1630) his Life and Raigne of King Edward the Sixt writes with smoothness, but in a dramatic style, imitating Livy and other ancient historians in the practice of putting speeches into the mouths of his historic characters When Queen Elizabeth ordered Lord Bacon to search Hayward's Life of Henry IV to see if it contained any treason, Bacon reported that there was no treason, but that there were many felomes, for the author had stolen many of his sentiments and conceits out of Tacitus —Sir Robert Bruce Cotton (1571-1631) is celebrated as an industrious collector of records, charters, and writings of every kind pertaining to the ancient history of England In the prosecution of his object he enjoyed only too great facilities, the recent suppression of monasteries having thrown many valuable books and written documents into private hands In 1600 he accompanied his friend Camden on an excursion to Carlisle, for the purpose of examining the Picts' wall and other relics of former times. It was principally on his suggestion that James I resorted to the scheme of creating baronets, as a means of supplying the 'reasury, and he himself was one of those who purchased the distinction Sir Robert Cotton was the author of various historical, political, and antiquarian works His Raigne of Henry III (1627) frankly discusses kingcraft, his Dangers wherein the Kingdom now Standeth (1628) marked him out to the court as an enemy, and an ironical Proposition to Brulle the Impertinency of Parliament led to his imprisonment for a time name is remembered chiefly for the benefit which he conferred upon literature, by gathering his valuable library of manuscripts, which was not restored to him on his release from prison, and grief at the deprivation shortened his days After being considerably augmented by his son and grandson, it became, in 1706, the property of the nation, and in 1757 was deposited in the British Museum One hundred and cleven of the manuscripts, many of them highly valuable, had before this time been unfortunately destroyed by fire During his lifetime materials were drawn from his library by Raleigh, Bacon, Selden, and Herbert, and he furnished literary assistance to Camden, Speed, and many contemporary authors

Richard Knolles (1550?-1610) published a Generall Historie of the Turles, which Johnson, in the 122nd number of the Rambler, eulogised as 'displaying all the excellences that narration can idmit. His style, though somewhat obscured by time, and sometimes vitiated by false wit, is pure, nervous, elevated, and clear' Hallam ranks Knolles high among our elder writers, and Southey and Byron were equally pronounced in their admiration Southey recommended Coleridge to read him, Byron said old Knolles was one of the first books that give him pleasure as i child, made him wish to visit the Levant, and "give perhaps that oriental colouring that has heen observed in my poetry' The historical value of the book is slender, original research on the subject was hardly possible to Knolles, and he seems to have followed a Latin history by Boissard, published it Frankfort in 1596 Knolles, born apparently it Coldashby, in North imptonshire, was educated at Oxford, and soon after 1571 became mister of the free school at Sandwich, in Kent, where he spent the rest of his life A fifth edition was issued in 1638, and the history was continued by Sir Paul Rycaut, whose edition in three folio volumes (1657-1700) became the standard one In ibridgment by John Savage (1701) was much read

The Taking of Constantinople.

A little before day the Turks approached the walls and began the resault, where shot and stones were delivered upon them from the walls as thick as hall, whereof little fell in viin, by reason of the multitude of the Furk, who, pressing fast unto the walls, could not see in the dark how to defend them elses, but were with at number wounded or slain, but these were of the common and worst souldiers, of whom the Turkish king made no more reckoning than to abate the first Upon the first appearance force of the defendants. of the day, Mahomet gave the sign appointed for the general assault, whereupon the city was in a moment and at one instant on every side most furiously assaulted by the Turks, for Mahomet, the more to distress the defendants and the better to see the forwardness of the souldiers, had before appointed which part of the city every colonel with his regiment should assail they valiantly performed, delivering their arrows and shot upon the defendants so thick that the light of the day was therewith darkned, other in the meantime couragiously mounting the scaling ladders, and coming even to handy strokes with the defendants upon the wall, where the formost were for most part violently borne forward by them which followed after. On the other side, the Christians with no less courage withstood the Turkish fury, beating them down again with great stones and weighty pieces of timber, and so overwhelmed them with shot, darts, and arrows, and other hurtful devices from above, that the Turks, dismayed with the terrour thercof, were ready to retire.

Mahomet, seeing the great slrughter and discomfiture of his men, sent in fresh supplies of his janizaries and best men of war, whom he had for that purpose reserved as his last hope and refuge, by whose coming on his fainting souldiers were again encouraged, and the terrible assault begun afresh At which time the barbarous king ceased not to use all possible means to maintain the assault, by name calling upon this and that captain, promising unto some whom he saw forward golden mountains, and unto others in whom he saw any sign of cowardise, threatning most terrible death, by which means the assault became most dreadful, death there raging in the midst of many thousands. And albeit that the Lurks lay dead by heaps upon the ground, yet other fresh men pressed on still in their places over their deal bodies, and with divers event either slew or were slain by their enemies.

In this so terrible a conflict, it chanced Justimianus the general to be wounded in the arm, who, losing much blood, cowardly withdrew himself from the place of his charge not leaving any to supply his room, and so got into the city by the gate called Romana, which he had caused to be opened in the inner wall, pretending the cause of his departure to be for the binding up of his wound, but being indeed a man now altogether discouraged

The souldiers there present, dismayed with the depur ture of their general, and sore charged by the janizaries, forsook their stations, and in hast fled to the same gate whereby Justinianus was entred, with the sight whereof the other souldier, dismayed, ran thither by heaps also Put whilst they violently strove all together to get in at once, they so wedged one another in the entrance of the gate, that few of so great a multitude got in, in which so great a press and confus on of minds, eight hundred persons were there by them that followed trodden under foot or thrust to death The emperor himself, for safeguard of his life flying with the rest in that press as a man not resurded, miserably ended his days together with the Greek empire. His dead body was shortly after found by the Furks among the slain, and known by his rich apparel whose head being cut off, was forthwith presented to the Furkish tyrant by whose commandment it was afterwards thrust upon the point of a launce, and in great derision carried about as a trophy of his victory, first in the camp, and afterward up and down the city

The Turks, encouraged with the flight of the Chris tians, presently advanced their ensigns upon the top of the uttermost wall, crying Victory, and by the breach entred as if it had been a great flood, which, having once found a breach in the bank, overfloweth and beareth down all before it, so the Turks, when they had won the utter wall, entred the city by the same gate that was opened for Justinianus, and by a breach which they had before made with their great artillery, and without mercy cutting in pieces all that came in their way, without further resistance became lords of that most famous and imperial city Some few there were of the Christians who, preferring death before the Turkish slavery, with their swords in their hands sold their lives dear unto their enemies, among whom the two brethren Paulus and Troilus Bochiardi, Italians, with Theophilus Palaeologus, a Greek, and Joannes Stiavus, a Dalmatian, for their great valour and courage deserve to be had in eternal remembrance, who after they had like hons made slaughter of their enemies, died in the midst of them embrued with their blood, rather oppressed by multitude than with true valour In this fury of the barbarians perished many thousands of men, women, and children, without respect of age, sex, or condition. Many for safeguard of their lives fled into the temple of Sophia, where they were all without pity slain except some few reserved by the barbarous victors to purposes more grievous than death itself. The rich and beautiful ornaments and jewels of that most sumptuous and magnificent church (the stately building of Justinianus the emperor) were in the turning of a hand plucked down and carried away by the Turks, and the church it self, built for God to be honoured in, for the present converted into a stable for their horses, or a place for the execution of their abominable and unspeakable filthiness, the image of the crucifix was also by them taken down, and a Turks cap put upon the head thereof, and so set up and shot at with their arrows, and afterwards in great dension carried about in their camp, as it had been in procession, with drums playing before it, railing and spitting at it, and calling it the God of the Christians, which I note not so much done in contempt of the image, as in despite of Christ and the Christian religion

But whilst some were thus spoiling of the churches, others were as busie in ransacking of private houses, where the miserable Christians were enforced to endure in their persons whatsoever pleased the insolent visitors, unto whom all things were now lawful that stood with their lust, every common souldier having power of life and death at his pleasure to spare or spill. At which time riches were no better than poverty, and beauty worse than deformity. What tongue were able to express the misery of that time? or the proud insolency of the conquerors? where of so many thousands every man with greediness fitted his own unreasonable desire, all which the poor Christians were enforced to endure. But to speak of the hidden money, plate, jewels and other riches there found passeth credit, the Turks themselves wondred thereat and were therewith enriched, that it is a proverb amongst them to this day, if any of them grow suddenly rich, to say, He hath been at the sacking of Constantinople, whereof if some reasonable part had in time been bestowed upon the defence of the city, the Turkish king had not so easily taken both it and the city

Dryden, who rarely borrowed, seems, as Macaulay pointed out, to have adapted a couplet from Knolles's history. Under the engraved portrait of Mustapha I are these lines

Greatnesse on goodnesse loves to slide, not stand, And leaves for Fortunc's ice Vertue's firme land

In Absalom and Achitophel, Dryden has

But wild Ambition loves to slide, not stand, And Fortune's ice prefers to Virtuc's land

Knolles also translated Bodin's Common IV eale

Sir Paul Ryenut (1628–1700), the continuator of Knolles, deserves mention for his other works. The son of a financier from Brabant who settled in England, he was born at Aylesford, in Kent, was secretary of Embassy at the Porte, consul at Smyrna, secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and British resident at Hamburg. In 1668 he published The Present State of the Ottoman Empire, based largely on his own observations, he also translated Platina's Latin history of the Popes, long a standard authority, and Garcilaso de la Vega's Commentaries of Peru

The Elizabethan Song-Writers.

The influence of music on the evolution of lyrical poetry in England was sudden and decisive It saved English verse, in the very nick of time, from being ruined by the heresies of the humanists, who wished to eject rhyme and to introduce lumbering equivalents for the classical measures necessity of writing in such a manner as that the words could be used to accompany music drove the poets into the employment of brisl, simple, and melodious metres It may therefore be said that Byrd and Tallis, the two first great English musi cians, whose labours date from about 1575, were the carliest encouragers of Elizabethan lyric, although at first little followed their training The year 1588 was really that which marks the starting-point of easy song-writing This was a year of surprising musical activity in England-now was printed the Musica Transalpina, which introduced the forms of Italian madrigal amongst us, now William Byrd (1538?-1623) published his first English song-book, the Psalms, Sonnets, and Songs, now Dowland began his career as a lutanist in Oxford After this year the art of writing madrigals or songs in light English verse was one which was perfectly understood, it was rendered easier by the introduction of Luca Marenzio's very popular Roman music, which was excessively admired in London, and by the publication of Byrd's Songs of Sundry Natures in 1589 and of Thomas Watson's Italian Madrigals Englished in 1590

It would not be right, however, while emphasising the fact that the muin flood of song-writing in England begins in 1588, to neglect to notice that several poets had, since 1580, been attempting, and sometimes with considerable success, to attain a pure lyrical movement. It is difficult to know exactly how to date the songs of Sidney, all of which must be precedent to 1586, while some may My true love has my heart' and date from 1581 'Weep, neighbours, weep,' were in any case among the very carliest and most successful of Eliza-The miscellany called A Handful bethan songs of Pleasant Delights was published in 1584, and the contents of it are entirely, as Mr Bullen has pointed out, 'intended to be sung to one or other popular tune. This is from that collection

Consider, Sweet, what sighs and sobs
Do nip my heart with cruel throbs,
And all, my Dear, for love of you,
frust me truly,
But I hope that you will some mercy show
In due time duly

If that you do my case well weigh,
And show some sign whereby I may Have some good hope of your good grace,
I rust me truly,
I count myself in blessed case,
Let reason rule ye

Here, however, it may be said that little advance beyond the shambling measures of folk-song has been made. But into his comedies of Campaspe and of Sapho and Phao, both published in 1584, Lyly introduces six or seven songs of a definitely artistic character, and these may be said to mark the advent of pure Elizabethan song. No previous lyrist had sung like this in England.

What bird so sings, vet so does wail?

O'tis the ravish d'nightingale
Jug, jug, jug, jug, tercu' she cr es
And still her woes at midnight rise.

Brave prick song! Who is 't now we hear?
None but the lark so shrill and clear,
How at heaven's gates she claps her wings,
The morn not waking till she sings.

Hark hark, with what a pretty throat
Poor Robin Redbreast tunes his note,
Hark! how the jolly cuckoos sing!

Cuckoo! to welcome in the spring!

the same eestitic and almost infantile melody is found in one or two scraps of another dramatist, George Peele, whose famous 'Pair, and fair, and thrice so fair' (quoted below at page 323) is found in his Arrangement of Paris, which dates from 1584

It is, however, certain that in the abundant romances of the period and the various poetical miscellanes this peculiar note of joyous lyricism does not show itself until about 1588, whereas after that year it becomes so natural and abundant that we cease to record its manifestations. This is undoubtedly connected with the foundation of the national chamber music, which or ed its character to William Byrd Italian airs were now imported and English airs invented in immense numbers, and it was necessary to find poems to suit those airs, the result was the composition of innumerable brief snatches of song, lucid, aerial, and sympathetic, either of a gaiety that chapped its hands and danced, or else of a melancholy which melted into tears. To 1588 belongs the old favourite by Sir Edward Dyer

My mind to me a kingdom is Such perfect joy therein I find
I hat it excels all other bliss
That God or Nature hath assigned Though much I want that most would have,
Yet still my mind forbids to crave.

One of the earliest poets to obtain ease in this particular manner of writing was Nicholas Breton This song belongs to the same year, but is of quite a different order of dance-music

Tho' Amaryllis dance in green
Like I very Queen,
And sing full clear
Corinna, with a smiling cheer,
Yet since their eyes make heart so sore,
Hey ho! I'll love no more

My sheep are lost for want of food,
And I so wood
That all the day
I sit and watch a herd maid gay,
Who laughs to see me sigh so sore,
Hey ho! I'll love no more

At the same time, the importation of the madrigal began from Italy Here is an example, dating probably from 1589, by Thomas Watson, it is an adaptation to the case of Sir Philip Sidney of a popular Italian madrigal by Luca Marenzio

How long with vain complaining,
How long with dreary tears and joys refraining,
Shall we renew his dying,
Whose happy soul is flying—
Not in a place of sadness—
But of eternal gladness?
Sweet Sidney lives in heaven,
O therefore let our weeping
Be turned to hymns and songs of pleasant greeting

Trom this time until the end of the century the abundance and variety of song in English poetry is beyond the power of any historian to chronicle The full choir burst forth simultaneously into warbling melody But it is to be noted that the connection with music continued unbroken most exquisite songs of Shakespeare and Fletcher were introduced to lighten the action by an instrumental is well as a vocal interlude, even the lyrics in the romances of Greene and Lodge were probably intended to be sung to an accompaniment on the lute. Campion, one of the most delicate and characteristic of Elizabethan lyrists, was an accomplished musician, and some of the most exquisite specimens of pure song-writing which have come down to us are those which have been gathered out of the motets and madrigals of Morley, Dowland, Robert Jones, Wilbye, Weelkes, and Orlando Gibbons, the Little Masters of English chamber music.

EDMUND GOSSE.

Sir Edward Dyer (c.1545-1607), poet and courtier-diplomatist, was born at Sharpham Park, in Somerset, studied at Oxford, was knighted in 1596, and died in London He was praised by his intimate friend Sidney, as well as by Puttenham and Meres, who commended especially his elegies It was long difficult to know which were his poems some ascribed to him in one collection were elsewhere recognised as the work of Lodge or Breton, but in 1872 Dr Grosart did his best to identify and edit all Dyer's extant work-a dozen pieces in all 'My Mind to Me a Kingdom is,' set to music by Byrd in 1588, is almost certainly his, and is by far the best known

My Mind to Me a Kingdom is.

My mynde to me a kyngdome is, Such preasent joyes therein I fynde, That it excells all other plisse That earth affords or growes by Lynde.

Thoughe muche I wante which moste would have, Yet still my mynde forbiddes to crave No princely pompe, no wealthy store, Nor force to winne the victorye,

No wilye wit to salve a sore, No shape to feede a lovinge eye, To none of these I yielde as thrall, Forwhy? my mynde doth serve for all

Because

I see how plenty suffers ofte, And hasty clymers sone do fall, I see that those which are alofte Mishappe doth threaten moste of all, They get with toyle, they keepe with feare Such cares my mynde could never beare.

Content I live, this is my staye, I seeke no more than maye suffyse, I presse to beare no haughty swaye, Look, what I lack my mynde supplies Lo! thus I triumphe like a kynge, Content with that my mynde doth bringe.

Some have too muche, yet still do crave, I little have and seek no more. They are but poore, though muche they have, And I am ryche with lyttle store They poore, I ryche, they begge, I gyve, They lacke, I leave, they pyne, I lyve

I laughe not at another's losse. I grudge not at another's gayne, No worldly waves my mynde can toss, My state at one dothe still remayne I scare no soe, I sawne no sriende, I loathe not lyfe nor dread my ende

Some weighe theyre pleasure by theyre luste, Theyre wisdom by theyre rage of wyll, Theyre treasure is theyre only e truste, A clocked craft theyre store of skylle

But all the pleasure that I fynde, Is to mayntayne a quiet mynde

My wealthe is healthe and perfect ease My conscience cleere my choyce desence, I neither seek by brybes to please, Nor by deceyte to breede offence Thus do I lyve, thus will I dye, Would all did so well as I!

Dr Hannah, the editor of Raleigh and others, has pointed out that one of Greene's poems ends with

A mind content both croune and kingdoine is, and Dyer himself, as if to show that this happy optimism was not the whole truth, indited a very different tune

The Man of Wos

The mann whose thoughtes agaynste him do conspyre, On whom Mishapp her storye dothe depaynt, The mann of woe, the matter of desier, Tree of the dead, that lives in endles plaint, His spirit am I whiche in this deserte lye, To rue his case whose cause I cannot flye

Despayre my name whoe never findes releife, Frended of none, but to myself a foe, An idle care mayntaynde by firme beleife,

That prayse of faythe shall throughe my torments growe, And counte those hopes that others hartes do ease, Butt base concertes the common sense to please

For sure I am I never shall attayne The happy good from whence my joys aryse, Nor have I power my sorrows to refrayne, Butt wayle the wante when noughte ellse maye suffyse, Wherebye my lyfe the shape of deathe muste beare, That deathe which feeles the worst that lyfe doth feare.

But what availes with tragicall complaynte, Not hopinge healpe, the Furyes to awake? Or why should I the happy mynds agunynte With doleful tunes, theyre settled peace to shake? All ye that here behould Infortune's feare, May judge noe woe may withe my gref compare.

And the alternating joys and sorrows of the lover are expressed in the song beginning

> I woulde it were not as it is, Or that I cared not yea or no, I woulde I thoughte it not amiss, Or that amiss myghte blamless goo, I would I were, yet would I not, I myghte be gladd, yet coulde I not

And he sums up the situation in Now griefe, now hope, now love, now spyghte, Long sorrows mixte with shorte delyghte.

Nicholas Breton (1545?-1626?) was a prolific and versatile writer of works in piose and verse, pastoral, satirical, romantic, religious, and humoious Of him little personally is known, save that his father, William Breton, a London merchant, left money and property for his education. William's widow married the poet Gascoigne, and Nicholas cloaked is said, on poor authority, to have studied at Oriel

College, Oxford. His Worls of a Young II it appeared a 1577, and a swift succession of small volumes proceeded from his pen—over a score in prose and about as many in verse, eight pieces with his name, comprising his first lynes, are in England's Helicon, a notable poetical miscellary published in 1600, including con tributions from Sidney, Spenser, Raleigh, Lodge, Marlowe, Watson, Greene, &c. He wrote far too much. His satire is less coarse but less effective than that of some contemporaries, his religious poems are disfigured by too fintastic conceits. It it's Frenchi our, a prose idyl of ingling, though named from an old merry dance, is one of his most notable pieces.

A Pastoral of Phillis and Coridon

On a hill there growes a flower,
Faire befull the daintie sy cet!
By that flower there is a bower,
Where the healenly Muses meete.

In that bower there is a chaire I ringed all about with golde, Where doth sit the fairest faire That did ever eye beholde

It is Phillis, fair and bright, She that is the shepheards joy, She that Venus did dispight, And did blind lier little boy

There is she, the wise, the rich,
That the world desires to see,
This is 1/50 /100, the which
There is none but onely shee

Who would not this face admire?
Who would not this saint adore?
Who would not this sight desire,
Though he thought to see no more?

O faire eyes, vet let me see
One good looke, and I am gone
Looke on me, for I am liee,
Thy poor sillic Condon

Thou that art the shepheards queene, Looke upon thy silly staine, By thy comfort have beene scene Dead men brought to life againe.

Phillida and Coridon.

In the merry moneth of May
In a morne by breake of day,
Forth I valked by the wood side,
Whenas May was in his pride
There I spied all alone
Phillida and Coridon.
Much adon there was, God wot!
It would love and he would not she ayd, Never man was true,
He avd, None was face to you.
He hadd, his had loved her long
She ayd, Love hou'd have no wrong
Condon would his a her then, she sayd, Maidea must kisse no men

Till they did for good and all, Then she made the sheepheard call. All the heavens to witness truth—Never loved a truer youth. Thus with many a pretty oath, Yea, and nay, faith and troth, Such as seely sheepheards use. When they will not love abuse, Love, which had beene long deluded, Was with kisses sweete concluded, And Phillida with garlands gay. Was made the Lady of the May

A Sweet Lullable

Come, little babe, come, silly soule,
Thy father's shame, thy mother's griefe,
Borne as I doubt to all our dole,
And to thyself unhappic chiefe
Sing lullable and lap it warine,
Poore soule that thinkes no creature harme.

Thou little thinkst, and lesse doost knowe.
The cause of this thy mother's moane,
Thou wantst the wit to waile her woe,
And I myselfe am all alone,
Why doost thou weepe? why doost thou waile?
And knowest not yet what thou doost ayle.

Come, little wretch! Ah! silly heart,
Mine onely joy, what can I more?
If there be any wrong thy smart,
That may the destinies implore,
'Twas I, I say, against my will—
I wayle the time, but be thou still

And doest thou smile? Of thy sweete face!
Would God Him selfe. He might thee see!
No doubt thou wouldst soone purchase grace,
I know right well, for thee and mee,
But come to mother, babe, and play,
I or father false is fled away

Sweet boy, if it by fortune chance
Thy father home agains to send,
If Death do strike me with his launce,
Yet mayest thou me to him commend
If any aske thy mother's name,
Tell how by love she purchast blame.

Then will his gentle heart loone yield I know him of a noble minde. Although a Lyon in the field, A lamb in towne thou shalt him finde. Aske blessing, babe, be not afrayde! His sugred words hath me betrayde.

Then mayst thou joy and be right glad,
Although in woe I seeme to moane.
Thy father is no rascall lad
A noble youth of blood and boane,
His glancing lookes, if he once smile,
Right honest women may beguile

Come, little boy, and rocke a sleepe! Sing lullable, and be thou still!

I, that can doe naught else but weepe, Will sit by thee and wale my fill God blesse my babe, and hillable, I rom this thy father's quality

Popular and estcemed in the seventeenth century, Breton's work was forgotten in the eighteenth, till Bishop Percy printed in the Reliques two of his There was no pieces from England's Helicor edition of his works in prose and verse till Dr Grosart produced them for the 'Chertsey Library' in 1877, another volume of new discoveries was added in 1893. Single works have been published separately—as The Bower of Delights in the 'Flizabethan Library' in 1893, and No II hippinge nor Trippinge in 1896 Professor Saintsbury reprinted in his Elizabethan and Jacobian Tracts (1892) Breton's 'Pretic and Wittie Discourse between Wit and Will,' which contains the 'Song between Wit and Will' and other amorbean struns between them, between Care and Misery, &c.

Edward de Vere, Earl of Oxford (1550-1604), studied at Cambridge, succeeded his father as seventeenth carl in 1562, and, already a favoured courtier, married Burghley's daughter in 1571 was handsome, accomplished, foppish, luxurious, rumously extravagant, and unbearably insolent and wrong-headed. He called Sidney a puppy, but was not allowed by the queen to accept Sidney's He was appointed to high offices, was special commissioner for the trial of Mary Queen of Scots, and acted is Lord Chamberlain at James I's coronation But his estates had to be sold—his wealth was utterly squandered by his w istefulness—and Burghley had to provide for his Yet some twenty three of his poems remain to support the contemporary judgment that he was one of the best of the courtier poets of Elizabeth's early reign, they were printed in the Paradise of Dainly Devices and other anthologies Puttenham illustrated his English Poes e with the one best known, given below, Grosart printed all that could be attributed to Oxford in his *Viscel*tantes of the Fuller II orthy Library (1872)

Fancy and Dosire

Come hither, shepherd s swaine '
Sir, what doe ye require?
I pray thee shew to me thy name!
My name is Fond Desire.

When werte thou borne, Desyre?
In prode and pompe of May
By whom, sweet boy, wert thou begott?
By selfe concepte, men say

Tell me who was thy nourse?
I reshe youthe, in sugred toye,
What was thy meat and davly food?
Sad syghes and great annoye.

What haddest thou than to drincke? Unfayned lovers' teares What cradle wert thou rocked in? In hope devoyde or feares

What fulled thee to the sleepe?

Sweet thoughtes which liked one beste
And wher is now thy dwelling place?

In gently hearts I res

then

What thing doth please thee mo t?

To page on beauty still Whom dost thou think to be thy toe?

Diviagne of my good will

Dothe companye displease?

It dothe in manye one Where would Desyre than chase to be?

He loves to muse alone

Will eyer age or death

Bring thee unto decaye?

Noe, noc! Desyre both lives and dyes

A thousande tymes a daye

Then, fond Desyre, farewell!

Thou art no mate for me,
I should be lothe methin! s to dwell
With such a one is thee

Another short poem runs thus

Doth sorrow feet thy soule? O direfull spirit Doth pleasure feed thy heart? O blessed min Hast thou bene happie once? O heavy plight Are thy mishaps forepast? O happie than Or hast thou blisse in eld? O blisse too late But hast thou blisse in youth? O sweet estate.

Thomas Watson (1557?-1592) was author of Hicatompathia, or Passionate Cinturie of Love (1582), a series of sonnets, Amyntæ Gaudia (in Latin, 1585), Italiai Vadrigals Englished (1590), one of which is quoted above at page 274, The Tears of Fancie (1593) He translated the Antigone of Sophocles into Latin. In the Hecatompathia, 'a hundred passions,' a hundred eighteen line poems called 'sonnets,' describe each a several passion, two of these are given below lovemaking was as artificial as the record of it, though Watson ranks high among the 'amoretists' Professor Arber reprinted the Hocatompathia, the Tears of Fance, and some of Watson's other things (1870) in his 'English Reprints' When Maye is in his prime, and youthfull Spring

Doth cloath the tree with leaves and ground with flowres, And time of yere reviveth every thing, And lovely nature smiles and nothing lowres, Then Philomela most doth straine her brest With night complaints, and sits in litle rest This birds estate I may compare with mine, To whom foud Love doth worke such wrongs by day, That in the night my heart must needes repine, And storm with sighe to ease me as I miy, Whilst others are becalm'd or life them still, Or sayle secure with fide and winde at will And as all the e which heare this bird complaine Conceive in all her tunes a swee e delight, Without remorse or pitving her payne, So she, for whom I wayle both day and night, Doth port her selfe in hearing my complaint, A just reward for acroing such a mint!

Time wasteth yeeres, and month, and howrs.

Time doth consume fame, benour witt, and strength,
Time kills the greenest herbes and sweetest flow rs.

Time weares out Youth and Benuties looke at length.
Time doth convey to ground both for and frend
And each thing els but Love, y bich high rolend

Time maketh every tree to die and rott,

Fime turneth ofte our pleasures into paine,

Fime causeth warres and wronges to be forgott,

Fime cleares the skie which first hung full of rayne,

Time makes an end of all humane desire,

But onely this which setts my heart on fire.

Fime turneth into naught each princely state,

Time brings a fludd from newe resolved snowe

Time calmes the sea where tempest was of late,

Time eates whate er the moone can see belowe,

And yet no time prevails in my behove,

Nor any time can make me cease to love!

Henry Constable (1562-1613), poet, the son of Sir Robert Constable of Newark, at sixteen entered St John's College, Cambridge, early turned Catholic, and betook himself to Paris He was an active Catholic negotiator, conducted a mission to James VI at Edinburgh (without result) on behalf of the papal powers, and was by and by pensioned by the French king. But he muntained his political loyalty, though on his return to Lingland in 1604 he was for a few months confined in the Tower He died at Liege. In 1592 was published his Diar a, e collection of twenty three sonnets, two years later, the second edition, containing seventysix, but some of these were by his friend Sir Philip Sidney and other poets 'The Shepheards Song of Venus and Adonis,' one of four pastoral poems contributed by him to England's Helicon, was thought by Millone and others to have suggested Shal espeare's Venus and Idonis See W C Hizlitt's edition of his works (1859), and J. Gray's (1897) The following is one of Constable's sonnets My ladies presence makes the Roses red because to see her lips they blush for shame, the lyllies leaves for envic pale became, and her white hands in them this envic bred The Mangold the leaves abroad doth spred. because the sunnes and her power are the same, the Violet of purple cullour came, dyed in the blood shee made my hart to shed. In briefe all flowers from her their vertue take, from her sweet breath their sweet smels do proceede. the living heate which her eye beames doth make warmeth the ground and quickeneth the seede The raine wherewith shee watereth the flowers I alls from mine eyes which she discolves in showers.

Ve ius and Adonis begins thus

Venus fair did ride,
Silver doves they drew her,
By the pleasant lawnds
Fre the sun did rise,
Vestas leauty rich
Open d wide to view her,

Pleasing harmonies

Barnabe Barnes (1569)-1609), son of the Bishop of Durhim, approved himself a true poet, but had been vell night forgotten when in 1875 Dr. Crossit reprinted his poems—Parthenophil, containing 'sonnets, madrigals, elegies and odes,' by far his best work, and a collection of Spirituall Sometts. He also wrote an unple is interagedy,

The Devil's Charter, and a treatise on political offices and duties, as a friend and collaborator of Gabriel Harvey, he suffered at the hands of Nash and his allies, and see below at Shakespeare, page 364. Professor Arber included Parthenophil in his English Garner (vol v 1882) This 'ccho sonnet' from Parthenophil shows Barnes perhaps at his worst, but is a fair specimen of the uncouth and inartistic artificialities to which writers of really fine verse sometimes condescended (rew being a form of 'row,' and here presumably meaning 'rank')

What be those hairs dyed like the marigold'

Echo Cold!

Echo Cold!
What is that brow whose frown makes many moan?
Anemone!
What were her eyes when they great lords controlled?

What were her eyes when they great lords controlled?

Rolled!

What be they when from them loves thrown?

Love's throne!

What be her cheeks (when blushes rose) like?

Rose like!

What are those lips which 'bove pearls' rew be?

Ruby '
Her ivory shoulders, what be those like?

What saints are like her' speak, if you be?

Few be'

Thou dwellst in rocks, hart like omewhat, then?

What then?

And rocks dwell in her heart, is 't true?

Whom she loves best, know this cannot men

Not men!

Pass him she loathes! Then I dismiss you

Miss you!

What's sex to whom men sue so vain much?

Furnes their fires, and I complain such?

Plan such!

Lord Yaux and Vicholas Grimonid were amongst the contributors to Fottel's 'Miscellany' Other sonneteers and minor poets of the period were William Percy (1575-1648), third son of the eighth Earl of Northumberland, a fellow-student at Ox ford and close friend of Barnes's, who produced in 1594 a volume of sonnets called Calu - Henry Lok, or Locke (1553?-1608?), son of a London mercer, published upwards of three hundred sonnets on Christian Passions, Conscience, and the like, which show more piety than poetry, and his sixty secular ones are hardly more valuable. He also versified Ecclesiastes and some of the Ps dms - n. Griffin-probably Burtholomew Griffin -who published in 1596 a collection of sixty two sonnets called Fidessa, some of them admirable He may have been an attorney, but the facts of his life are little known—Richard Linche, or Lynche, who wrote two unimportant prose works, is be heved to have been the R. L. who in 1596 published a collection of thirty eight sonnets somewhat unequal in quality -- william smith, another Spenseriin sonneteer, is remembered chiefly for his collection of over fifty sonnets called Chloris, published in 1596

Richard Hooker.

Richard Hooker, one of the great glories of the English Church, was born in Exeter in March 1554, of a family originally called Vowell, his uncle being city chamberlain (see the article on Holin-At school he displayed so much aptitude for learning and gentleness of disposition that, having been recommended to Jewel, Bishop of Salisbury, he was sent by him to Oxford university he studied with ardour and success Sandys, Bishop of London, put his son under Hooker's care. Another of his pupils was George Cranmer, a grand nephew of the archbishop, and with both these young men he formed a close In 1579 his skill in and enduring friendship Oriental languages led to his temporary appoint ment as deputy-professor of Hebrew, and two years later he entered into holy orders. Not long after this he had the misfortune to be led into a marriage which proved a constant source of annoyance to him during life. The tale is told by his biographer, Izaak Walton, whose picture of the saintly and simple-minded theologian is one of the most perfect things in English biography But it must be remembered that Walton did not sketch from life Keble pointed out that the excessive meekness and simplicity of the sketch hardly harmonise with the insight, incisiveness, and humour shown in Hooker's works Dean Paget thinks there are but a few grains of truth in the "ossip Walton got from Hooker's pupils Sandys and Cranmer, but there seems no doubt Mrs Hooker was a shrew from whom her husband got little sympathy Appointed to preach at Paul's Cross in London, Hooker put up at a house set apart for the reception of the preachers his arrival there from Oxford he was wet and veary, but received so much kindness and attention from the hostess that, according to Walton, 'he thought himself bound in conscience to believe all that she said. So the good man came to be persuaded by her that he was a man of a tender constitution, and that it was best for him to have a wife, that might prove a nurse to him-such a one as might both prolong his life, and make it more confortable, and such a one she could and would provide for him, if he thought fit to marry? Hooker authorising her to select a wife for him, she not unnaturally selected her own daughter, 'a silly, clownish woman, and withal a mere With this helpmate he led but an \antippe.' uncomfortable life, though apparently in a spirit of resignation When visited by Sandys and Cranmer at the Buckinghamshire rectory to which he had been presented in 1584, he was found by them reading Horace and tending sheep in the absence of his servant. In his house they received little entertainment except from his conversation. and even this Mrs Hooker did not fail to disturb, by calling him away to rock the cradle, and by exhibiting such other shrewish dispositions as made them glad to depart on the following morning In taking leave, Cranmer expressed his, regret at the smallness of Hooker's income and the uncomfortable state of his domestic affairs, to which the worthy man replied, 'My dear George, if saints have usually a double share in the miseries of this life, I, that am none, ought not to repine at what my wise Creator hath appointed for me, but labour—as indeed I do daily—to submit mine to His will, and possess my soul in patience and peace.' On his return to London, Sandys made a strong appeal to his father in behalf of Hooker, the result of which was the appointment of the meek divine, in 1585, to the office of Master of the Temple He accordingly removed to London, and commenced his labours as forenoon preacher Now, the afternoon lecturer was Walter Travers, a man of great learning and eloquence, but a Puritan and high Calvinist, whereas Hooker's views, both on church government and theology, were 'judicious' and moderate. The consequence was that 'the forenoon sermons spoke Canterbury, and the afternoon Geneva,' Travers sometimes even expressly denounced the latitudinarianism of his colleague, and in consequence of these controversies Whitgift suspended Travers from preaching Travers appealed to the Council with charges against Hooker's doctrine, and Hooker answered conclusively But to Hooker the personal controversy was so veratious that he strongly expressed to the archbishop his wish to retire into the country, where he might live in peace and have leisure to finish his treatise Of the Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity A letter he wrote to the archbishop shows his temper and aim

My LORD-When I lost the freedom of my cell, which was my college, yet I found some degree of it in my quiet county parsinge, but I am wears of the noise at lopped croof la place, and indeed Gol and nature lid no intend me for contentions, but for study and quietness. And, my lord, my part cular contests here with Mr Tru era have proved the more unpleasant to me, because I believe him to be a good man, and that belief light occasioned me to examine mine own conscience concern ng lus opinions, and to satisfy that, I have con silted the holy Scripture and other laws, both human and divine, whether the conscience of him and others of his judgment ought to be so far complied with by us as to alter our frame of Church government, our manner of God's vorship, our praising and praying to him, and our established coremonies, as often as their tender con scences shall require us and in this examination I have not only satisfied myself, but have begun a Treatise in which I intend the satisfaction of others, by a demon tration of the reasonableness of the Laws of our Ecclesi astical Polity, in which design God and his holy Angels shall at the last great day bear me that witness which my conscience not does, that my meaning is not to provoke any, but rather to satisfy all tender consciences, and I shall never be able to do this but where I may study, and pray for God's blessing upon my endeavours, and Leep myself in peace and privacy, and behold God's blessing spring out of my mother earth, and eat my own bread without oppositions, and therefore, if your Grace can judge me worths of such a favour, let me beg it, that I may perfect what I have begun.

In consequence of this appeal, Hooker was pre sented in 1591 to the rectory of Boscombe, in Wiltshire, there he finished four books of his treatise (printed in 1594). He became sub-dean ind prebendary of Sirum, and in 1595 was pre sented to the rectory of Bishopsbourne, in Kent. Here he wrote the fifth book, published in 1597, and on 2nd November 1600 he died sixth and eighth books appeared in 1648, the seventh in 1662. Doubts were raised as to the genuineness of the sixth bool, it is certainly out of keeping with the general plan of the work, but Keble had no doubt it was substantially Hooker's work, though not designed as part of The seventh and eighth books were probably written from Hooker's notes by Gauden, the editor or author of the Eikon Lasilife

Hool er's Ecclesiastical Polity is an unsurpassed musterpicce of reasoning and eloquence, its diction majestic, sonorous, and rhythmical. But the style is eminently Latinised, and so at times some s hat rhotorical and artificial, and the sentences ire not seldom intolerably long, with inconvenient 'So stately and graceful breils and parentheses is the march of his periods,' said Hallam, 'so various the fall of his musical cadences upon the ear, so rich in images, so condensed in sentences. so arme and noble his diction, so little is there of vulgarity in his racy idiom, of pedantry in his learned phrase, that I know not whether any later writer has more ad mirably displayed the capacities of our language, or produced passages more worthy of comparison with the splendid monuments of antiquas'

The unument against Roman Catholics and

Puritans alike is conducted by Hooker with rare moderation and candour, and on broad general principles, not on detached texts or interpretations of Scripture. The fundamental idea is the unity and all embracing character of law as the manifestation of the divine order of the universe, the outward expression of the mind of God, identical with reason 'It was a kind of maxim among the Purit ins that Scripture was so much the exclusive rule of human actions, that whatever, in mitters at least concerning religion, could not be found to have its authority, was unlawful. Hooker devoted the whole second book of his work to the refutation of this principle. He proceeded afterwards to attack its application, more particularly to the episcopal scheme of church-government, and to the various ccremonics or usages which those sectaries treated as either absolutely superstitious, or at least as impositions without authority was maintained by this great writer, not only that ritual observances are variable according to the discretion of ecclesiastical rulers, but that no certain form of polity is set down in Scripture as generally indispensable for a Christian church' The guide of human conduct is not Scripture alone, but the concurrent instruction of all the sources of knowledge Providence has put at man's The work is not a vast controversial pamphlet, but a monument of massive logic and masterly philosophical thought-one of the carlicst and greatest in the English tongue. It is fair to say that to the Ecclesiastical Polity of the 'judicious Hooker' Anglican theology owes the tone and direction which largely still characterise it. 'It is claimed for this great book,' Dean Paget says, 'that it first revealed to the nation what English prose might be It is significant that even those who censured him felt that somehow he stood apart, and that later ages have looked back to him as eminent even in the period of Spenser, of Shakespeare, and of Bacon'

There is a preface—not too conciliatory—to them that 'seck (as they term it) the reformation of the laws and orders ecclesiastical in the Church of England,' which begins thus

Though for no other cause, yet for this, that postenty may know to have not loosely through silence permitted things to pass away as in a dream, there shall be for men's information extant thus much concerning the present state of the Church of God established amongst us, and their careful endeavour which would have upheld the same. At your hands, beloved in our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ (for in him the love which we bear unto all that would but seem to be born of him, it is not the sea of your gall and bitterness that shall ever drown), I have no great cause to look for other than the self-ame portion and lot, which your manner liath been hitherto to lay on them that concur not in opinion and sentence with you. But our hope is, that the God of peace shall (notwithstanding man's nature too impatient of contume hous malediction) enable us quietly and even gladly to suffer all things, for that work sake which we cover to perform. [He tells the malcontents by whom 'their discipline was planted.'] A founder it had, whom, for mine own part, I think incomparably the wisest man that ever the French church did enjoy, since the hour it enjoyed him. His bringing up was in the study of the civil law Divine kno vledge he gathered, not by hearing or reading so much, as by teaching others. For, though thousands were debtors to him, as touching knowledge in that kind, yet he to none but only to God, the author of that most blessed fountain, the Book of Life, and of the admirable desterity of wit, together with the helps of other learning which were his guides till being occasioned to leave France, he fell at the length upon Geneva, which city the bishop and clergy thereof had a little before (as some do affirm) forsaken, being of likelihood frighted with the people's sudden attempt for abolishment of Popish reli gion the event of which enterprise they thought it not safe for themselves to wait for in that place. At the coming of Calvin thither, the form of their civil regiment was popular, as it continueth at this day neither king, nor duke, nor nobleman of any authority or power over them, but officers chosen by the people yearly out of themselves, to order all things with public consent. For spiritual government, they had no laws at all agreed upon, but did what the pastors of their souls by persuasion could win them unto Calvin, being admitted one of their preachers, and a divinity reader amongst them, con sidered how dangerous it was that the whole estate of that church should hang still on so slender a thread, as the liking of an ignorant multitude is, if it have power to change whatsoever itself listeth [And so he expounds the Calvinistic system, as he conceived it.]

The Nature and Majesty of Law

And if any complain of obscurity, they must consider that in these matters it cometh no otherwise to pass than in sundry the works both of art and also of nature, where that which hath greatest force in the very things we see, is notwithstanding itself oftentimes not seen. The stateliness of houses, the goodliness of trees, when we behold them, delighteth the eye, but that foundation which beareth up the one, that root which ministereth unto the other nourishment and life, is in the bosom of the earth concealed, and if there be at any time occasion to search into it, such labour is then more necessary than pleasant, both to them which undertake it and for the lookers on In like manner the use and benefit of good laws all that live under them may enjoy with delight and comfort, albeit the grounds and first original causes from whence they have sprung be unknown, as to the greatest part of men they are. But when they who withdraw their obedience pretend that the laws which they should obey are corrupt and vicious, for better examination of their quality, it behoveth the very foundation and root, the highest well spring and fountain of them, to be discovered Which because we are not oftentimes accustomed to do, when we do it, the pains we take are more needful a great deal than acceptable, and the matters which we handle seem by reason of newness (till the mind grow better acquainted with them) dark, intricate, and unfamiliar

And because the point about which we strive is the quality of our laws, our first entrance hereinto cannot better be made than with consideration of the nature of law in general

All things that are have some operation not violent or casual. Neither doth anything ever begin to exercise the same without some forc conceived end for which it worketh. And the end which it worketh for is not obtained, unless the work be also fit to obtain it by For unto every end every operation will not serve. That which doth assign unto each thing the kind, that which doth moderate the force and power, that which doth appoint the form and measure of working, the same we term a Law So that no certain end could ever be obtained unless the actions whereby it is obtained were regular, that is to say, made suitable, fit, and correspondent unto their end by some canon, rule, or law Which thing doth first take place in the works even of God himself (From Book 1. chap. 1)

Dangerous it were for the feeble brain of man to wade far into the doings of the Most High, whom although to know be life, and joy to make mention of his name, yet our soundest knowledge is to know that we know him not as indeed he is, neither can know him and our safest eloquence concerning him is our silence, when we confess without confession, that his glory is inexplicable, his greatness above our capacity and reach. He is above, and we upon earth, therefore it behoveth our words to be wary and few.

Moses in describing the work of creation attributeth speech unto God 'God said, let there be light, let there be a firmament, let the waters under the heaven be gathered together into one place, let the earth bring forth, let there be lights in the firmament of heaven. Was this only the intent of Moses, to signify the infinite greatness of God's power by the easiness of his accomplishing such effects, without travail, pain, or labour? Surely it seemeth that Moses had herein besides this a further purpose, namely, first to teach that God did not work as a necessary, but a voluntary agent, intending beforehand and decreeing with himself that which did outwardly proceed from him, secondly, to shew that God did then institute a law natural to be observed by creatures, and therefore, according to the manner of laws, the institution thereof is described as being established by solemn injunction. His commanding those things to be which are, and to be in such sort as they are, to keep that tenure and course which they do, importeth the establishment of nature's law. This world's first creation, and the preservation since of things created, what is it but only so far forth a manifestation by execu tion, what the eternal law of God is concerning things natural? And as it cometh to pass in a kingdom rightly ordered that after a law is once published it presently takes effect far and wide, all states framing themselves thereunto, even so let us think it fareth in the natural course of the world since the time that God did first proclaim the edicts of his law upon it, heaven and earth have hearkened unto his voice, and their labour hath been to do his will He 'made a law for the rain,' he gave his 'decree unto the sea, that the waters should not pass his commandment' Now, if nature should intermit her course, and leave altogether, though it were but for a while, the observation of her own laws, if those principal and mother elements of the world, whereof all things in this lower world are made, should lose the qualities which now they have, if the frame of that heavenly arch erected over our heads should loosen and dissolve itself, if celestial spheres should forget their wonted motions, and by irregular volubility turn themselves any way as it might happen, if the prince of the lights of heaven, which now as a giant doth run his unwearied course, should, as it were through a languishing faminess begin to stand and to rest himself, if the moon should wander from her beaten way, the time and seasons of the year blend themselves by disordered and confused mixture, the winds breathe out their last gasp, the clouds yield no rain, the earth be defeated of heavenly influence, the fruits of the earth pine away as children at the withered breasts of their mother, no longer able to yield them relief what would become of man himself, whom these things now do all serve? See we not plainly that obedience of creatures unto the law of nature is the stay of the whole world?

Wherefore that here we may briefly end Of Law there can be no less acknowledged than that her seat is the bosom of God, her voice the harmony of the world all things in heaven and earth do her homage, the very least as feeling her care, and the greatest as not exempted from her power both Angels and men, and creatures of what condition soever, though each in different sort and manner, yet all with uniform consent, admiring her as the mother of their peace and joy

Scripture and the Law of Nature

What the Scripture purposeth, the same in all points it doth perform. Howbeit that here we swerve not in judgment, one thing especially we must observe, namely, that the absolute perfection of Scripture is seen by relation unto that end whereto it tendeth hereby it cometh to pass that first such as imagine the general and main drift of the body of sacred Scripture not to be so large as it is, nor that God did thereby intend to deliver, as in truth he doth, a full instruction in all things unto salvation necessary, the knowledge whereof man by nature could not otherwise in this life attain unto, they are by this very mean induced either will to look for new revelations from heaven, or else dangerously to add to the Word of God uncertain tra dition, that so the doctrine of man's salvation may be complete, which doctrine we constantly hold in all respects without any such things added to be so com plete that we utterly refuse as much as once to acquaint ourselves with anything further. Whatsoever to make up the doctrine of man's salvation is added, as in supply of the Scripture's unsufficiency, we reject it, Scripture purposing this, both perfectly and fully done it. Again, the kope and purpose of God in delivering the holy Scripture, such as do take more largely than behoveth, they, on the contrary, side racking and stretching it further than by him was meant, are drawn into sundry is great inconveniences. These pretending the Scriptures perfection infer thereupon that in Scripture all things lawful to be done must needs be contained count those things perfect which want nothing requisite for the end whereto they were instituted. As therefore God created every part and particle of man exactly per feet, that is to say in all points sufficient unto that use for which he appointed it, so the Scripture, yea, every sentence thereof is perfect, and wanteth nothing requisite unto that purpose for which God delivered the same So that, if hereupon we conclude that because the Serifture is perfect, therefore all things lawful to be cone are comprehended in the Scripture, we may even as we'll conclude so of every sentence, as of the whole it was the drift, scope, and purpose of Almighty God in Holy Scripture to comprise all things which man may But admit this, and mark, I beseech you, what would follow God, in delivering Scripture to his Church, should clean have abrogated among them the Law of Nature, which is an infallible knowledge imprinted in the minds of all the children of men, whereby both general principles for directing of human actions are comprehended, and conclusions derived from them, upon which conclusions groweth in particularity the choice of good and evil in the daily affairs of this life. Admit this, and what shall the Scripture be but a snare and a torment to weak consciences, filling them with infinite perplexities, scrupulosities, doubts insoluble, and extreme despairs? Not that the Scripture itself doth cause any such thing (for it tendeth to the clean contrary, and the fruit thereof is resolute assurance and certainty in that it teacheth), but the necessities of this life urging men to do that which the light of nature, common discretion, and judgment of itself directeth them unto, on the other side, this doctrine teaching them that so to do were to sin against their own souls, and that they put forth their hands to iniquity, whatso ever they go about, and have not first the sacred Scrip ture of God for direction, how can it choose but bring the simple a thousand times to their wits' end, how can it choose but vex and amaze them? For in every action of common life to find out some sentence clearly and infallibly setting before our eyes what we ought to do (seem we in Scripture never so expert) would trouble us more than we are aware. In weak and tender minds we little know what misery this strict opinion would breed, besides the stops it would make in the whole course of all men's lives and actions. Make all things sin which we do by direction of nature's light, and by the rule of common discretion, without thinking at all upon Scrip ture, admit this position, and parents shall cause their children to sin, as oft as they cause them to do anything, before they come to years of capacity and be ripe for knowledge in the Scripture, admit this, and it shall not be with masters as it was with him in the gospel, but servants being commanded to go, shall stand still till they have their errand warranted unto them by Scripture Which, as it standeth with Christian duty in some cases, so in common affairs to require it were most unfit. (From Book it chap. 8.)

sum and body thereof, unless we first of all prove that

But so it is, the name of the light of nature is made hateful with men, the 'star of reason and learning' and all other suchlike helps, beginneth no otherwise to be thought of than if it were an unlucky comet, or as if God had so accursed it, that it should never shine or give light in things concerning our duty any way towards him, but be esteemed as that star in the Revelation called Wormwood, which being fallen from heaven maketh rivers and waters in which it falleth so bitter that men tasting them die thereof. A number there are who think they cannot admire as they ought the power and authority of the Word of God, if in things divine they should attribute any force to man's reason For which cause they never use reason so willingly as to disgrace reason. Their usual and common discourses are unto this effect. First, 'the natural man perceiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolish ness unto him, neither can be know them, because they are spiritually discerned. By these and the like disputes an opinion hath spread itself very far in the world, as if the ay to be ripe in faith were to be raw in vit and judgment, as if Reason were an enemy unto Keligion, children Simplicity the mother of ghostly and Divine Wi-dom

To our purpose it is sufficient that whosoever doth serve, honour, and obey God, whosoever believeth in him, that man would no more do this than innocents and infants do, but for the light of natural reason that slimeth in him, and maketh him apt to apprehend those tungs of God, which being by grace discovered are effectual to persuade reasonable minds and none other, that honour, obedience, and credit belong anglit unto No man cometh unto God to offer him sacrifice, to pour out supplications and prayers before him or to do him any service, which doth not first believe him both to be, and to be a rewarder of them who in such sort seek unto him. Let men be taught this either by revelation from heaven, or by instruction upon earth, by labour, study, and meditation, or by the only sceret inspiration of the Holy Ghost, whatsoever the mean be the know it by, if the knowledge thereof were possible without discourse of natural reason, why should none be found capable thereof but only men, nor men till such time as they come unto ripe and full ability to work by reasonable understanding? The whole drift of the Scripture of Go I, what is it but only to teach Theology? Theology, what is it but the science of things divine? What science can be attained unto without the help of natural discourse and reason? 'Judge ve of that which I speak,' saith the apostle In vain it were to speak anything of God, but that by reason men are able some what to judge of that they hear, and by discourse to discern how consonant it is to truth. Scripture indeed, teacheth things above nature, things which our reason by itself could not reach unto. Yet those also we believe, knowing by reason that the Scripture is the word of God.

The thing we have handled according to the question moved about it, which question is, whether the light of reason be so pernicious that in devising laws for the charch, men ought not by it to search what may be fit and convenient. For this cause therefore we have endeavoured to make it appear how in the nature of reason itself there is no impediment, but that the self same spirit which revealeth the things that God hath set down in his law, may also be thought to aid and direct men in finding out by the light of reason what laws are expedient to be made for the guiding of his church, over an I besides them that are in Scripture.

Roble's edution of Hooker (1836, 7th ed. revised by Church and Paget, 1683) superseded all earlier ones—it comprised Walton's Lift and a full introduction by Roble. See also the introductions to Book V by Paget (1839) and Bayno (1942).

Henry Smith (1550?-1591) was called by contemporaries the 'silver tongued Smith,' and esteemed the prime preceder of the nation,' and Anthony Wood records him is the 'mirriele and wonder of his age' for eloquence in the pulpit. He was the son of a gentlem in of good estate in I electershire, studied it Lincoln College, Oxford, and, drawn into church work in spite of difficulties about subscription, became it 'lecturer at St Clement Danes in London He was suspended for Puritanism, but restored as being in full sympath, with the Church in faith and doctrine, though doubtful about minor details of discipline. His sermons, remarkable as specially of free from the besetting vices of the age—vulgarity and quant ness and affected learning. The following passage on the two consciences is from Smith's famous sermon on of the Betraying of Christ.

If we would judge ourselves, we should not be judged Be not deceived, for sin doth not end as it hearn When the terrors of Judas come upon the soul, the tongue cannot hide his sins, for despair and horror will not be smothered, but he which hath Saul's spirit haunting him, will rage as Saul did. There is a warn ing conscience, and a gnawing conscience. The warning conscience cometh before sin, the grawing conscience followeth after sin The warning conscience is often lulled asleep, but the gnawing conscience wakeneth her again. If there he any hell in this world, they which feel the worm of conscience graw upon their hearts, may truly say that they have felt the torments of hell. Who can express that man's horror but himself? Nay, what horrors are there which he cannot express himself? Sorrows are met in his soul at a feast, and fear, thought, and anguish divide his soul between them furies of hell leap upon his heart like a stage calleth to fear, fear whistleth to horror, horror beel oneth to despair, and saith, Come and help me to torment this sinner. One saith that she cometh from this sin, and another saith that she cometh from that sin, so he south through a thousand deaths and cannot die. Irons are laid upon his body like a prisoner all his lights are put out at once he hath no soul fit to be comforted. Thus he lies as it were upon the rack, and saith that he hears the world upon his shoulders, and that no man suffereth that which he suffereth. So let him he (saith God) without ease, until he confess and repent, and call for mercy. This is the goodly way which the scrpent said would make you gods, and made him a devil fore at the last learn the sleight of Satan in this wretched His subtilties are well called the depths of traitor Satan, for he is so deep that few can sound him

Richard Hakluyt (1552?-1616) was a laborious compiler, to whom the world is indebted for the preservation of narratives which might other wise have fallen into oblivion, especially on the m tritime adventures and discoveries of his country-Hakluyt came of a family originally Dutch but settled for two centuries in Herefordshire (where the name was spelt in many ways, including Hackle vight 13, and received his elementary education it Westminster School He after wards studied at Christ Church, Oxford, where he engaged in an extensive course of reading in various languages, on geographical and nauticul subjects, he was appointed to lecture at Oxford on cosmography and the colliteral sciences, and carried on a correspondence with those cere britted Continental geographers Ortelius and Mercitor For the years he was in Piris as chaplain to the English ambassador, during which time he cultivated the acquaintance of persons eminent for their knowledge of geography and On his return from I rance in maritime history 1580, Sir Walter Raleigh appointed him one of the society of counsellors, assistants, and adventurers, to whom he assigned his patent for the prosecution of discoveries in America. He was in 1590 made rector of Wetheringsett, in Suitolk, was probendary and irclideacon of Westminster, and chaplain of the Sivoy, and was buried in Westminster Abbey In 1582 and 1584 he had published two small collections of voyages to America, but these are included in a much larger work in three volumes, which he published in 1599, entitled The Principall Navigations, Voiages, Fraffiques, and Discoveries of the English Nation, made by Sea or over Laid, to the Remote and Farthest Distant Quarters of the Earth, at any Time within the Compass of these 1500 Years In the first volume are contained voyages to the north and north east, the true state of Iceland, the defeat of the Spanish Aimada, the expedition under the Earl of Essex In the second he relates voyages to Cidiz, &c to the south and south east, and in the third, expeditions to North America, the West Indies, and round the world Narratives are given of nearly two hundred and twenty voyages, besides miny relative documents, such as patents, instructions, and letters To this collection all the subsequent compilers in this department have been largely indebted. In the preliminary essay on the history of navigation prefixed to Churchill's Collection of Voyages, of which John Locke was-on doubtful grounds—said to be the author (though he certainly helped in collecting the material), If ikluyt's collection is spoken of as 'valuable for the good there to be picked out but it might be wished the author had been less voluminous, delivering what was really authentic and useful, and not stuffing his work with so many stories taken upon trust, so many triding voyages that have nothing new in them, so many warlike exploits not at all pertinent to his undertaking, and such a inultitude of articles, charters, privileges, letters, relations, and other things little to the purpose of travels and discoveries' These documentary authentications would now be thought in nowise irrelevant or out of place in such a work. when I roude called Hakluyt's Aavigations 'the prose epic of the modern English nation,' he was probably rejoicing as much in these same warlike exploits the philosophical editor disapproved as in the more purely exploratory adventures The poetry of this epic, it should be added, lies rather in the facts themselves than in any creative effort of Hakluyts For he keeps himself studiously in the background, and wrote little in his own name, though he could, and did, write admirably-winess his preface, and doubtless many of the narratives he professes to give in the riters' words one much to his editorial pensystematising and abridging in his own excellent I

English He issued a second edition in 1598-1600 A new edition (5 vols, 4to, 1809-12) containing a supplement of tales collected by Hikluyt was added. He translated French voyages to Florida, and, from the Portuguese, the travels of Ferdinand de Soto, in what was then called Virginia. His papers came into the hands of Purchas, and were used for the Pilgrims, and the Hakluyt Society was founded in 1846 for publishing the records of early voyages and travels. Hakluyt begins his Navigations (standard edition in 12 vols 1903-5) with a few fables, in sharp contrast to the conscientiously realistic and authentic records of which all but the first two or three voyages consist unhappily, is a purely mythical 'Voyage of Arthur, King of Britaine, to Island and the most north eastern parts of Europe, Anno 517,' taken, like the second, the vovage of Malgo, an even less known British king, from Geoffrey of Monmouth and other Latin chroniclers Real history begins in the fourth and fifth with stories from Bede. Octher's (Ohthere's, see page 20) is the fifth voyage. The following is part of Hakluyt's own preface

For (to conteine myselfe onely within the bounds of this present discourse, and in the midst thereof to begin) wil it not in all posteritie be as great a renowme unto our English nation, to have bene the first discoverers of a Sea beyond the North cape (never certainly knowen before) and of a convenient passage into the huge Em pire of Russia by the bay of S Nicholas and the river of Duina, as for the Portugales to have found a Sea beyond the Cape of Buona Esperinza, and so consc quently a passage by Sea into the East Indies, or for the Italians and Spaniards to have discovered unknowen landes so many hundred leagues Westward and South westward of the streits of Gibraltar, & of the pillers of Hercules? Be it granted that the renowmed Portugale Vasques de Gama traversed the maine Ocean Southward Did not Richard Chanceler and his mates performe the like Northward of Europe? Suppose that Columbus that noble and high spirited Genuois escricil unknowen landes to the Westward of Europe and Did not the valiant English knight sir Hugh Willoughby, did not the famous Pilots Stephen Burrough, Arthur Pet, and Charles Jackman accoast Nova Zembla, Colgoieve, and Vaigatz to the North of Europe and Asia? Howbeit you will say perhaps, not with the like golden successe, not with such deductions of Colonies, nor attain ing of conquests. True it is that our successe hath not bene correspondent unto theirs yet in this our attempt the uncertaintic of finding was farre greater, and the difficultic and danger of searching was no whit less For hath not Herodotus (a man for his time, most skilfull and judicial in Cosmographie, who writ above 2000 yeeres ago) in his 4, booke called Melpomene, signified unto the Portugales in plaine termes, that Africa, except the small Isthmus between the Arabian gulfe and the Mediterran sea, was on all sides environed with the Ocean? And for the further confirmation thereof, doth he not make mention of one Neco an I gyptian king, who (for trials Lalle) sent a fleet of Phiemicians downe the Red sea, who setting forth in Autumne and sailing Southward till they had the Sunne at noonetide upon their sterbourd (that is to say, having crossed the .Lqui noctial and the Southerne tropique) after a long navigation, directed their course to the North, and in the space of 3 yeeres environed all Africk, passing home through the Gaditan strettes, and arriving in "Lgypt" And doth not Plinie tel their that Noble Hanno, in the flourishing time and estate of Carthage, sailed from Gades in Spaine to the coast of Arabia Foelis, and put downe his whole journall in writing? Doth he not make mention that in the time of Augustus Cæsar, the wracke of certaine Spanish ships was found floating in the Arabian gulfe? And, not to be over tedious in alleaging of testimonies, doth not Strabo in the 2 booke of his Geography, together with Cornelius Nepos and Plinie in the place beforenamed, agree all in one, that one Ludoxus flecing from king Lathirus, and valing [dropping] downe the Arabian bay, sailed along, doubled the Southern point of Africk, and at length arrived at Gades? And what should I speake of the Spaniards? Was not divine Plato (who lived so many ages ago, and plainely described their West Indies under the name of Atlantis) was not he (I say) instead of a Cosmographer unto them? Were not those Carthaginian, mentioned by Aristotle lib d admirabil au cilt their forerunners? And had they not Columbus to stirre them up, and pricke them forward unto their Westerne discoveries, yea, to be their chiefe loads man and Pilot? Sithens therefore these two worthy Nations had those bright lampes of learning (I means the most ancient and best Philosophers, Historiographers and Geo graphers) to shewe them light, and the load starre of experience (to wit those great exploits and voyages layed up in store and recorded) whereby to shape their course what great attempt might they not presume to undertal e? But alas our English nation, at the first setting foorth for their Northeasterne discovery, were either altogether des titute of such cleare lights and inducements, or if they had any inkling at all, it was as misty as they found the Northren seas, and so obscure and ambiguous, that it was meet rather to deterre them, then to give them encouragement

But besides the foresaid uncertaintie, into what dangers and difficulties they plunged themselves, Animus memi nusse horret, I tremble to recount. For first they were to expose themselves unto the rigour of the sterne and uncouth Northren seas, and to make triall of the swelling waves and boistrous winds which there commonly do surge and blow then were they to saile by the ragged and perilous coast of Norway, to frequent the unhaunted shoares of finmark, to double the dreadfull and misty North cape, to beare with Willoughbies land, to run along within bearing of the Countreys of Lapland and Corelia, and as it were to open and unlocke the seven fold mouth of Duina. Moreover, in their Northeasterly Navigations, upon the seas and by the coasts of Condora, Colgoieve, Petzora, Joughoria Samoedia, Nova Zembla, &c., and their passing and returne through the streits of Vaigats, unto what drifts of snow and mountaines of yee even in June, July, and August, unto what hideous over fals, uncertaine currents, darke mistes and fogs, and divers other fearefull inconveniences they were subject and in danger of, I wish you rather to learne out of the vovages of sir Hugh Willoughbie, Stephen Burrough, Arthur Pet and the rest, then to expect in this place an endlesse catalogue thereof And here by the way I cannot but highly commend the great industry and magnanimity of the Hollanders, who within these few yeers have discovered to 78 yea (as themselves affirme) to 81 degrees of Northerly lautude yet with this proviso, that our English nation led them the dance, brake the yee before them, and gave them good leave to light their candle at our torch. But nowe it is high time for us to weigh our ancre, to hoise up our sailes, to get cleare of these boistrous, frosts, and misty seas, and with all speede to direct our course for the milde, lightsome, temperate, and warme Atlantick Ocean, over which the Spaniards and Portugales have made so many pleasant prosperous and golden voyages. And albeit I cannot deny, that both of them in their East and West Indian Navigations have indured many tempests, dangers, and shipwracks yet this dare I boldly affirme, first that a great number of them have satisfied their fame thirsty and gold thirsty mindes with that reputation and wealth, which made all perils and misadventures seeme tolerable unto them, and secondly, that their first attempts (which in this comparison I doe onely stand upon) were no whit more difficult and dangerous then ours to the Northeast. For admit that the way was much longer, yet was it never barred with ice, mist, or darknes, but was at all seasons of the yeere open and Navigable, yea and that for the most part with fortunate and fit gales of winde

The 26 of July 1592, in my returning out of Barbary in the ship called the Amity of London, being in the height of 36 degrees or thereabout, at foure of the clocke in the morning we had sight of two shippes, being dis tant from us about three or foure leagues by seven of the clocke we fetched them up, and were within gunshot—whose boldnesse, having the king of Spaines armes displayed, did make us judge them rather ships of warre, then laden with marchandise. And as it appeared by their owne speeches, they made full account to have taken us it being a question among them whether it were best to carv us to S Lucar, or to Lisbon waved ech other a maine. They having placed themselves in warlike order one a cables length before another, we began the fight. In the which we con tinued, so fast as we were able to charge and discharge, the space of five houres, being never a cables length distant either of us from other In which time we received divers shot both in the hull of our ship, masts, and sailes, to the number of 32 great, besides 500 musket shot and harquebuzes a crocke [large earthenware jars] at the least, which we tolde after the fight. And be cause we perceived them to be stout, we thought good to boord the Biscaine, which was on head the other where lying aboord about an house, and plying our ordinance and small shot, in the end we stowed all his men. Now the other in the flie boat, thinking we had entred our men in their fellow, bare roome with us, meaning to have layed us aboord, and so to have intrapped us betwixt them both which we perceiving, fitted our ordinance so for him, as we quitted our selves of him, and he boorded his fellow by which meanes they both fell from us Then presently we kept our loofe [luff], hoised our top-sailes, and weathered them, and came hard aboord the flieboat with our ordinance prepared, and gave her our whole broad side, with the which we slew divers of their men, so as we might see the blood run out at the scupper holes. After that we cast about, and new charged all our ordinance, and came upon them a rine, willing them to weeld, or els we vould sinke them wherupon the one would have veelded, which was shot betweene winde and water. but the other called him traitor Unto whom we made answere, that if he would not yeeld presently also, we would sinke him first. And thereupon he understanding our determination, presently put out a white flag, and yeelded, and yet refused to strike their own sailes, for that they were swome never to strike to any Englishman We then commanded their captaines and masters to come abourd us, which they did And after examination & sto ving them, we sent certaine of our owne men aboord them, and strook their sailes, and manned their ships finding in them both 126 persons living, & 8 dead, besides those which they themselves had cast overboard So it pleased God to give us the victory being but 42 men and a boy, whereof 2 were killed and 3 wounded for the which good successe we give God the only praise These two rich prizes laden with 1400 chests of quick silver with the armes of Castile and Leon fastened upon them, and with a great quantity of bulles or indulgences, and guilded Missals or Service books, with an hundred tunnes of excellent wines, we brought shortly after into the river of Thames up to Blacke wall

The Elizabethan Sonnet-Cycles.

The sonnet is a species of lyrical poetry which the world owes to the instinct of the Italians for delicate and harmonious form The word sonnetto gives the effect of the recurring sound of a little peal of bells, skilfully rung once to attract attention or commemorate a pissing event. That the sonnet was originally an adaptation from some Provencal lyrical sequence is not doubted, but the whole essence of its merit is its conciseness and rotundity, and its escape from the loose Provençal prodigality of rhyming The sonnet must have fourteen lines. and an exact sonnet must have five rhymes arranged according to a very precise fashion (abba abba ede ede) This precision was not known to the carliest Italian sonneteers, who, however, never varied the number of lines, and never closed with a couplet. The oldest sonnet extant is believed to be one of considerable irregularity of form, written about 1220 by Piero delle Vigne. In the next generation Guittone di Arezzo, a poet of more industry than genius, gave his attention and its final form to the sonnet Folgore de San Geminiano, a precursor of Dinte, was the first, it appears, to produce a 'cycle' of sonnets-that is, a set of consecutive picces dealing progressively with a definite theme

The sonnet, having thus made Italy its home, flourished there, almost unintermittently, for the next five centuries, until it became as easy for an educated Roman or Neigolitan to write a sonnet as to sign his name. Petrirch was the model of excellence to all these generations of poets, and it is to be noted that when the renaissance was complete, and so many of the medical forms of literature were done away with, the sonnet was retained out of respect for the humanism of Petrarch. We have drawn attention on page 159 to the sonnets published in the collection which came to be known as 'Tottel's Miscellany' in 1557. in which Wyatt's and Surrey's paraphrases from Petrarch introduced the sonnet to English literature The word 'sonnet,' however, was misunderstood, and was used for the next forty years or so, as it still is by uneducated people, to mean any lyrical poem or ballad The French had by this time introduced several irregularities into the arrangement of the rhymes, and had invented the word 'quatorzain' to describe a poem in fourteen lines of rhymed verse, not necessarily a sonnet We find this useful word introduced into English as early as 1582, and it is perhaps worth pointing out that the thousands of Elizabethan poems called 'sonnets' are in their vast majority merely quatorzains, and not real sonnets at all Drayton was so conscious of this that he called his cycle of 1594 Amours ın Ouatorzains That the Elizabethans were slow to comprehend the real essence of the sonnet is shown by the fact that the work which more than any other served to popularise the form in England, the Hecatompathia of Watson (1582), is composed in a form of eighteen, instead of fourteen, lines

The fourteen-line limit, however, had been properly laid down in 1575 by Gascoigne, who, un fortunately, prescribes 'cross metre and the last two rhyming together,' heresies unknown to the Continental poets Such rules did not affect Sir Philip Sidney, who is to be taken as the real introducer of the Petrarchan sonnet into English As Mr Lee has said, the publication of his Astrophel and Stella gave the sonnet in England 'a vogue that it never enjoyed before or since' Sidney was the scholar of Petrarch in this matter, but he had a closer and more familiar relation with his own French contemporaries, especially Ronsard and Du Bellay It has recently been put forward that Sidney owed much as a sonneteer to Desportes, but dates make this improbable. As a matter of fact, Sidney died but a few months after Ronsard, he is affiliated as sonneteer to the original cenacle of the Pléiade His sonnets were probably composed about the year 1580, they were posthu mously published in 1591, and immediately set the fashion for cycles of sonnets Mr Sidney Lee, in an appendix to his learned Life of William Shakespeare, has analysed the output of sonnets in, England between 1591 and 1597 The result is surprising, he estimates that during that time far more than two thousand sonnets of various kindsamatory, congratulatory, philosophical, or religious -were actually published in this country post-Sidncian 'sonnets' were, almost without ex ception, quatorzains closing in a couplet

The influence of Desportes, if we cannot detect it in Sidney, is obvious in these later Elizabethans. In 1592 came the first flight of English sonnet-sequences, with Constable's Diana and Daniel's Delia, both of them dipped in the conventional sweetness of Desportes. In 1593 the cycles of sonnets were like flights of locusts, with Barnes,

Constable, Lok, Giles Fletcher (the elder), Watson, and Lodge, whose Phillis contains some very musical, experimental measures. Among the publications of 1594 deserve mention Drayton's Idea, Percy's Calia, a curious anonymous volume entitled Zephyria, Chapman's Coronet, and Barn field's Italianated perversity called The Affectionate Shepherd The year 1595 was made illustrious in the sonnet world by Spenser's series of eighty eight Amorette, 1596 produced Griffin's Fidessa, Linche's Dulla, Barnes's Divine Century, and the Chloris of William Smith. This was the culminating year of the Elizabethan sonnet, and after this the fashion began rapidly to fade away. It is to be noted that several collections of sonnets probably belong to this short period of six years (1591-97), although they were not then published Shakespeare's Souncis is by far the most illustrious example of this temporary suppression, but with it must be compared, and to the same period attributed, the Calica of Lord Brooke, the Aurora of Sir William Alchander (the Earl of Stirling), the love sonnets of Campion, and a comic cycle of Gulling Sonnets by Sir John Davies

The sonnet continued to be cultivated more fitfully after the Elizabethan age was over John Davies of Hereford and William Browne were less successful than Drummond of Hawthornden, who went back to the rigorous Petrarchan model with considerable adroitness Donne composed two cycles of Holy Sonnets and La Corona, which were not published until a generation later. After this the form fell into a disrepute from which it did not recover until, in Wilton's hands, 'the thing became a trumpet.'

It is not to be supposed that this extraordinary manufacture of short poems, all made after the same pattern, could display much individual origi-The sonnets of Shakespeare—puzzling as they are, and formed to mystify the commentator -are at least of a most thrilling sincerity, and are inspired by an original exercise of high imagination, but if from Shakespeare to Sidney and Spenser, as sonneteers, the descent is considerable, from these latter to the general herd of cyclewriters it is immense. In the average Elizabethan sonnet we find some picturesqueness of diction, much sweetness, a tiresome abuse of pedantry, an elegance which has something affected about it, a passion so covered up with the ashes of an alembicated preciosity that it is often doubtful whether it burns at all The monotony of the Elizabethan sonnets, their vague allusiveness, the instability and dimness of the images they evoke, do much to lessen our pleasure in reading them Yet it must not be forgotten that, even if Sidney, Shakespeare, and Spenser were removed, there would be left a body of graceful melodious poetry, all of which helped to give distinction to average poetic style in England, and some of which possessed positive ment of a high lyrical order

EDMUND GOSSE.

Sir Philip Sidney seemed destined to take a very prominent part in the evolution of English In considering his work in verse, we have to recollect that at the age which Sidney had attained when he fell beneath the walls of Zutphen, Spenser had published nothing but The Shepherd's Calendar, and Shakespeare was principally known as the author of Venus and Adonis Sidney was no less painfully working out his way through linguistic and traditional difficulties towards the open light of a perfect style, but the poisoned bullet cut short his chances of achieving a Faerie Queene or a Hamlet When critics speak of the 'coldness' and 'aftectation' of Sidney's poetry, they are forgetting the conditions under which he laboured, and are neglecting the evidence that he was rapidly surmounting those Perhaps, if the truth were known, conditions Philip Sidney was one of the most notable 'inheritors of unfulfilled renown' the world has ever He studied the art of poetry so closely he had such an expanding and mounting sense of its capacity-he was learning so to 'look into his heart, and write,' that everything seemed to point to his becoming one of the great English That he never became, but the charm, the romantic pathos, of the imperfect verses he did write is perennial

Sidney began to study verse at a time when the particular kind of poetry he enjoyed among the Italians and the Spaniards was unknown in England He conceived a British variety of Petrarchan art, a species of lyrical songs and sonnets, which 'might be employed, and with how heavenly fruit, both private and public, in singing the praises of the Immortal Beauty' But in doing so he was' aware of the necessity of avoiding the insipidity and insincerity which had fallen upon such poetry on the continent of Europe-the vain repetitions, the languid conceits, the preposterous frozen compliments In opening a new literature he desired to avoid falling immediately into the errors of an old, and indeed exhausted, literature, like that Hence Sidney starts with a divided aim, he wishes to introduce the psychology of love, with its delicacies and its refined analysis of emotion, into the rough and awkward English tongue, but at the same time he wishes to escape the pitfalls into which those descend who 'poor Petrarch's long-deceased woes with new-born sighs and denizen'd wit do sing '

The early numbers in the Astrophel and Stella show us the adventures of Sidney's spirit when this design of regenerating English lyrical poetry first occurred to him. He studied 'fing inventions' and Continental models, 'oft turning others' leaves' He tried hard to reproduce his emotions, but the effect merely depressed him, he was conscious that what he composed was harsh and pedantic, and that his speech bore no relation to his glow of inward feeling. The words came forth halting, and he became aware that study was driving away invention. Then it was that, 'great with child to speak, and helpless in his throes, Sidney was biting his pen and beating his bosom, when "Fool 171 said m. Muse to me, 'look in thy heart and write' Accordingly, look in his heart he did, but to eyes un iccustomed to the blaze of nature the white light of the heart at first only blinds and bewilders Hence, in the poetry which Sidney began to write about 1575 and onwards (for to this date we may perhaps, attribute his determination to reform poetry in England) we find at first much that seems to us dry and displeasing, much empty fluency, much flatness, and even some insipidity But Sidney advances in skill, he gains more and more command over the medium, and before the Istrophel and Stella is finished, we find that the young poet has secured the power of copying for mankind the emotional language which a living passion has written on his heart.

Hence the careful reader of Sidney's sonnets. who has at first found them a little colourless and dim after the far richer poetry of the succeeding generation, learns to appreciate in them that very quality v high the eighteenth, and until lately even the nineteenth, centuries were unable to detect in them, their rigorous sincerity When once the author has surmounted the difficulty of speaking in verse, of using the language of literature—as soon as he has a uned confidence in his own observation and in his own judgment of values-he sings 'with his eve upon the object,' so that, although a species of archaism makes the Astrophel and Stella secm old fashioned among the Elizabethan sonnetcycles, it will yet be found to be more interesting, because more sincere, varied, and circumstantial, than any of its successors, except that of Shake-All the time that he was writing so speare earnestly, an invincible modesty kept Sidney in the bickground of the poets-'Poor layman I, for sacred rites unfit,' he calls himself. But this sim plicity gave him a realistic vitality His genius was planted firmly on experience. The highway, along which his horse's feet went trampling, was his Parmissus His sheep were thoughts, which he pastured, far from the haunts of men, on the 'fur hills of fruitless love' Other men might be 'victors still of Phœbus golden treasure' Sidne, poetry was never the main object of life, never life itself, but he adorned the paths or love, war, patriotism, religion, all that led through the wide fields of his beautiful, practicil chivalry, with the roses and lilies of fragrant, flowery verse

Is a consequence of his not 'taking himself seriously' as a poet, when once his verse was written he cealed to care what became of it, and it might very easily have entirely dis appeared. It is probably to the piety of his admirable sister, the Countess of Pembroke, who had the courage to ignore her brother's dying command that the MS of his Areadia should be destroyed, that we ove the preservation of Sidney's prose and verse. He published nothing in his litetime, three editions of Istroblel and Stella belong to 1591 and his miscell incous poems were added to the third edition (1508) of the Some sonnets appeared for the first time with Constable's poems, in 1594. A great mass of rather interesting verse, probably belonging to Sidney's early and unemancipated years, is embedded in the Arcadia itself (1590), so that the effect which was made by the poetry of Sidney, save through the literary coteries influenced by him in his lifetime, did not belong to the period of his career, but was almost wholly posthumous With so extreme a rapidity was literature then developing, that in 1595 poetry of the most startling originality written in 1575, even by Spenser and Sidney, wore a faded air, as a consequence of this the influence of Sidney, which was for a few years immense, soon waned, though the Arcadia continued to be reprinted and many romances were written in imitation of it EDMUND GOSSE.

Sidney was born, 30th November 1554, at Penshurst, in Kent, son of Sir Henry Sidney (who usually spelt the name Sydney, while his son preferred Sidney or Sidney Philip studied at Shrewsbury and Christ Church, and after spending nearly three years on the Continent returned to England, an accomplished writer, in 1575, and was introduced to the court by his uncle, the Earl of Leicester He was present at the famous reception given by Leicester to the queen at Kenilworth in the summer of that year. At first a favourite of the queen, he was sent in 1577 on missions to the Elector Palatine, the Emperor Rudolf, and the Prince of Orange. Elizabeth was ungrateful towards his father for his exertions as Lord Deputy in Ireland, and Philip wrote in his defence, he also addressed the queen against her projected match with the Duke of Anjou Elizabeth frowned on him, and his mother's brother, the once powerful Leicester, fell into disfavour. Sidney retired (1580) to his sister Mary, now Lady Pembroke, at Wilton, where, probably, most of his Arcadia was written. In 1583 he was knighted, and married Frances, daughter of Sir F Walsingham arrangement (1585) to accompany Drake on one of his buccaneur expeditions was defeated by Elizabeth's caprice and Drake's treachery was ordered to accompany Leicester, chosen by the queen to carry her half hearted support to the Netherlanders in their struggle against Spain. After one small brilliant exploit, he received, on and October 1586, his death wound under the walls of Zutphen-where five hundred and fifty Englishmen made a gallant but all judged attack on nearly three thousand Spaniards—and died on the 17th

His work in literature may be placed between 1578 and 1582. Widely celebrated as it was in his lifetime, nothing vas published till after his death. His brilliant character, his connections, his generous patronage of men of letters, with the report of those to whom his writings were communicated, united to give him his pre-eminent contemporary fame This was, however, amply supported when the Arcadia (written probably 1578-80, but never finished) appeared, imperfectly in 1590, completely in 1598 This book long retained a vast popularity, though now it is almost unread. It is a pastoral romance, founded upon the Arcadia (1504) of Sannazaro, but perhaps even more influenced by the Spanish romances. An intricate love story, intermixed with poems and written in melodious but diffuse, elaborate, and artificial prose, not free from the artificial 'conceits' of that age, the book was received with enthusiasm at home, and was almost as well received in France. Its influence on English literature was smaller Shr'le spcare shows traces of his study of it in several of his plays, especially in Lear, Loves Labour's Lost, the I empest, and the Midsummer Night's Dream, Spenser was indebted to it, Crowne imitated it, and many plays were based on cpisodes in it. The eighteenth century, on the whole, reversed the verdict of that of the sixteenth and seventeenth, though Richardson borrowed his heroine Pamela from it, and Cowper unfeignedly admired it, calling its author 'a warbler of poetic Horace Walpole called it a 'tedious, lamentable, pedantic, pastoral romance, which the patience of a young virgin in love cannot now wade through,' Hazhtt was hardly more favourable, and Hallam's praise is faint. Now, unquestionably, its interest is mainly historical, though much of it is fine. Drayton commended Sidney for having checked Euphuism and improved English style, he says he

Thoroughly paced our language as to show That plenteous English hand in hand might go With Greek and Latin, and did first reduce Our tongue from Lylv's writing then in use

To about 1580 may be assigned Sidney's Apologie for Poetrie (1591, afterwards named Define of Poesse), written in clear, manly English in reply to an abusive Puritan pamphlet by Gosson Sidney defines poetry, after Aristotle, as Ideal Imitation, and for her claims her ancient place as the highest mode of literature, teaching mankind the most important truths through the medium of that pleasure which is the formal end of all fine art. In mediaval fashion, many authorities are quoted, and the range of reading ıs displayed Sidney criticises severely the crowd of contemporary versifiers --not peculiar to that age ' -- to whose want of power, bad tastc, and trivial style he partly ascribes the then existing low estimate of poetry And here he names the English poets known to Chaucer, Sackville, Surrey, and Spenser's just (anonymously) pub-'Besides these, I do not remember to have seen but few (to speak boldly) printed, that have poeti cal sinews in them ' En lish drama, it will be remembered, was then in its cradle In 1580 Ralph Roister Doister, Gorbodue, and Gammer Gurton were practically all the drama here to show, and Sidney could not foresee that his own contemporaries were just about to recreate the art. His criticism of the contemporary English stage was truned to Italian and pseudo-classical canons, he demanded the complete separation of tragedy and comedy, and the adhesion to Senecan Even Gorboduc, which might have been 'an exact model of all tragedies,' is 'very defectu ous in the circumstances. The next ten years saw Greene, Peele, Marlowe, and Shakespeare all busily at work In 1575 Sidney had met Penelope Devereux (1560-1607), daughter of the first Earl of Essex, but it was only in 1581, the year following her marringe to the Puritan Lord Rich, who afterwards divorced her, that Sidney awoke too late to love for her The one hundred and eight sonnets and cleven songs of Astrophel and Stella (1591) offer a mar cllous picture of passionate love. In 1583 he was knighted, and married Walsingham's young daughter, Frances. Sidney also translated the Psalins. He was among the first to recognise appensers promise, he knew Gabriel Harvey, Thomas Lodge, Marlowe, Bacon, and Raleigh, and he accepted dedications from Giordano Bruno

Sidney's impetuosity of temper is seen in much of his writing, as in his reply to Leacester's Common-realth, an attack on the Earl, his uncle declaring to the attacker, 'thou therein liest in thy throat, which I will be ready to justify upon thee in any place in Europe'. The same trut appears in the following letter—containing what proved to be a groundless accusition—which he addressed in 1578 to Ldward Molyneus, his father's secretary and (ultimately, at least) his own valued friend

MR MOLLYFLY—Few words are best. My letters to my fither have come to the eyes of some. Neither can I condemn any but you for it. If it be so, you have played the very knave with me, and so I will make you know, if I have good proof of it. But that for so much as is past. For that is to come, I assure you before God, that if ever I know you do so much as read any letter I write to my father, without his commandment, or my consent, I will thrust my dagger into you. And trust to it, for I speak it in earnest. In the meantime, farewell

Of the following extracts, four are from Sidney's Areadia, and the fifth from his Defence of Poesse

The treadin professes to deal with love and idventures in the Greek province which, actually famed for its pure air and its people and the purity and simplicity of their lives, the Roman poets had idealised into a kind of pastoral and romantic Utopia. This is the opening

It was in the time that the earth begins to put her new aparrel against the approch of her lover, and that the Sun running a most even course becomes an indifferent arbiter betwein the most and the day when the hope less shepheard Strephon was come to the scendes which he against the island of Cithera where viewing the place with a heavy kinde of delight and sometimes casting his eyes to the Heward, he called his friendly rivall the pastor Claus unto him, setting first downe in his darkened countenance a dolefull copic of what he would speake, and with a long speech on his absent love, during which they see a shipwrecked man, Musidorus, washed ashore. Him they offer to conduct back with them to their home in Arcadia, and to present to the hospitable gentleman Kalander

In Arcadia.

The 3. day after in the time that the morning did throw roses and violets in the heavenly floore against the comming of the Sun (the nightingales striving one with the other which could in most dainty variety recount their wrong caused sorow) and made them part of their sleep, and rising from under a tree (which that mant had bin their pavilion) they went on their jorney which by and by welcomed Musidorus eyes, wearied with the wasted soile of Laconia, with delightfull prospects.

There were hilles which garmshed their proud heights with stately trees, humble vallets, whose base estate seemed comforted with the refreshing of silver rivers, medows, enameld with al sorts of ey pleasing floures, thickets, which being lined with most pleasant shade, were witnessed so to by the chereful deposition of many well tuned birds, each pasture stored with sheep, feeding with sober security, while the prety lambs with bleting oratory craved the dams comfort, here a shepheards boy piping, as though he should never be old, there a yong shepherdesse knitting, and withall singing, and it seemed that her voice comforted her hands to work, and her hands kept time to her voices music. (Book is change)

A Stag Hunt

Then went they together abroad, the good Kalander entertaining them with pleasaunt discoursing-howe well he loved the sporte of hunting when he was a young man, how much in the comparison thereof he disdained all chamber delights, that the sunne (how great a jornie soever he had to make) could never prevent him with earlines, nor the moone (with her sober countenance) disswade him from watching till midnight for the deeres feeding O, saide he, you will never live to my age, without you kepe your selves in breath with exercise, and in hart with joyfullnes, too much thinking doth consume the spirits, and oft it falles out, that, while one thinkes too much of his doing, he leaves to doc the effect of his thinking Then spared he not to remember, how much Arcadia was chaunged since his youth, activitie and good felowship being nothing in the price it was then held in, but according to the nature of the old growing world, still worse and worse. Then would be tell them stories of such gallaunts as he had knowen, and so with pleasant company beguled the times hast, and shortned the wayes length, till they came to the side of the wood, where the houndes were in couples, staying their com ming, but with a whining accent criving libertie, many of them in colour and marks so resembling, that it shewed they were of one kinds. The huntsmen handsomely attired in their greene liveries, as though they were chil dren of Sommer, with staves in their hands to beat the guiltlesse earth, when the houndes were at a fault, and with hornes about their neckes, to sound an alarum upon a sillie fugitive the houndes were straight uncoupled, and ere long the Stagge thought it better to trust the nimblenes of his feet then to the slender fortification of his lodging, but even his feete betrayed him, for, how soever they went, they themselves uttered themselves to the scent of their enimies, who, one taking it of an other, and sometimes beloeving the windes advertisement, some times the view of their faithful councillors the huntsmen, with open mouthes then denounced warre, when the warre was alreadic begun. Their cric being composed of so well sorted mouthes, that any man would perceive therein some kind of proportion, but the skilful woodmen did find a musick Then delight and varietie of opinion drew the horsemen sundrie wayes, yet cheering their houndes with voyce and horn, kept still as it were The wood seemed to conspire with them together against his own citizens, dispersing their noise through all his quarters, and even the nimph Echo left to bewayle the losse of Narcissus, and became a hunter But the Stagge was in the end so helly pursued, that (leaving his flight) he was driven to make courage of despaire, and so turning his head, made the hounds with change of speech to testify that he was at a bay as if from hot pursuit of their enemie, they were sodainly, come to a parley (Book i. chap ra)

Shipwracke

But by that the next morning began to make a guilden shewe of a good meaning, there arose even with the sun a vaile of darke c'oudes before his face, which shortly (like inck powred into water) had blacked over all the face of heaven, preparing (as it were) a mourneful stage for a Tragedie to be placed on For forthwith the windes began to speake lov der, and as in a tumultuous king dome to thinke themselves fittest instruments of com maundement, and blowing whole stormes of hayle and rainc upon them, they were sooner in daunger then they coulde almost bethinke themselves of chaunge. For then the traiterous Sea began to swell in pride against the afflicted Navie, under which (while the heaven favoured them) it had layne so calinely, making mountaines of it selfe, over which the tossed and tottring ship shoulde clime, to the streight carried downe againe to a pit of hellish darkenesse, with such cruell blowes against the sides of the shippe that which way soever it went was still in his malice, that there was left neither power to stay nor way to escape And shortly had it so dis severed the loving companie, which the date before had tarned together, that most of them never met againe, but were swallowed up in his never satisfied mouth.

The prayer of the Princess Pamela was a favourite prayer of King Charles I, whom Milton reproached for 'having stolen a prayer word for word from the mouth of a heathen woman praying to a heathen god'

O all seeing Light and eternal Life of all things, to whom nothing is either so great, that it may resist, or so small, that it is contenined looke upon my miserie with thine eye of mercie, and let thine infinite power souchsafe to limite out some proportion of deliuerunce vnto me, as to thee shall seem most convenient. Let not murie, O Lord, triumphe ouer me, and let my faultes by thy handes be corrected, and make not mine vinuste enemie the minister of thy Justice. But yet, my God, if in thy wisdome this be the aptest chastizement for my inexcusable follie, if this low bondage be fittest for my ouer hie desires, if the pride of my not inough humble harte be thus to be broken, O Lord, I yeeld vnto thy will, and 103 fully embrace what sorrow thou wilt have me suffer. Onely thus much let me craue of thee, (let my crawing, O Lord, be accepted of thee, since euch that proceeds from thee,) let me crauc, euch by the noblest title, which in my greatest affliction I may guic my selfe, that I am thy creature, and by thy goodnes (which is thy self) that thou wilt suffer some beame of thy Maiestic so to shine into my mind, that it may still depende confidently upon thee. Let calamitie be the exercise but not the ouerthrowe of my vertue let their power preuaile, but preuaile not to destruction let my greatnes be their prine let my paine be the sweetnes of their revenge. Let them (if so it seem good vinto thee) veve me with more and more punishment. But, O Lord, let never their wickednes have such a hand, but that I may carre a pure minde in a pure bodie. (And pausing a while) Ind O, most gracious Lord (said she) what ever become of me, prescrue the vertuous Musidorus

'In these my not old yeres and idelest times, having slipt into the title of a Poet, I am provoked to say somthing unto you in defence of that my uncleeted vocation,' says Sidney in the pologie, 'I have just cause to make a pittiful defence of poore Poetry, which from almost the highest estimation of learning is fallen to be the laughing-stocke of children' And he thus compares poetry and philosophy

The philosopher sheweth you the way, hee informeth you of the particularities, as well of the tediousnes of the way, as of the pleasant lodging you shall have when your journey is ended, as of the many by turnings that may divert you from your way. But this is to no man but to him that will read him, and read him with attentive Which constant desire whosoever studious painfulnes hath in him, hath already passed halfe the hardnes of the way, and therefore is beholding to the Philosopher but for the other halfe Nay, trucly, learned men have learnedly thought that where once reason hath so much over mastred passion, as that the minde hath a free desire to doe well, the inward light each minde hath in it selfe is as good as a Philosophers book, since in nature we know it is well to do well, and what is well and what is evile, although not in the words of Arte which Philoso phers bestowe upon us, for out of naturall conceit the Philosophers drew it. But to be moved to doe that which we know, or to be moved with desire to knowe, How opus Hic labor est

Nowe therein of all sciences (I speak still of humane and according to the humane conceit) is our Poet the Monarch For he dooth not only show the way, but giveth so sweete a prospect into the way, as will infice any man to enter into it Nay, he dooth, as if your journey should lye through a fayr Vineyard, at the very firste, give you a cluster of Grapes, that, full of that taste, you may long to passe further He beginneth not with obscure definitions, which must blur the margent with interpretations, and load the memory with doubt fulnesse, but he commeth to you with words set in delightfull proportion, either accompanied with, or prepared for, the well inchaunting slill of musicke with a tale forsooth he commeth unto you, with a tale which holdeth children from play, and old men from the chimney corner And pretending no more, doth intende the winning of the mind from wickednesse to vertue, even as the childe is often brought to take most wholsom things, by hiding them in such other as have a pleasant taste, which if one should beginne to tell them the nature of the Moes or Kubarb they shoulde receive, would sooner take their Phisicke at their eares then their mouth. So is it in men (most of which are childish in the best things) till they bee cradled in their graves, glad they will be to hear the tales of Hercules, Achilles, Cyrus, Encas, and hearing them, must needs heare the right description of wisdom, valure, and justice, which if they had been barely, that is to say philosophically, set out, they would sweare they bee brought to schoole againe.

Sidney 'never heard the old song of Percy and Douglas but he found his heart stirred as with the sound of a trumpet,' and said 'they are never alone who are accompanied with noble thoughts,' 'there will be the time to die nobly when you cannot live nobly,' 'there is nothing more terrible to a guilty heart than the eye of a respected friend.'

With how sad steps, O Moone, thou clim'st the skies, How silently, and with how winne a face! What, may it be, that even in heavenly place. That busic Archer his sharpe arrowes tries? Surc, if that long with love acquainted eyes. Can judge of love, thou feel'st a lover's case, I read it in thy lookes thy languisht grace. To me that feele the like thy state discries. Then, even of fellowship, O Moone, tell me, Is constant love deemed there but want of wit? Are beauties there as proud as here they be? Do they above love to be loved, and yet

Those lovers scorne whom that love doth possesse?

Do they call vertue there ungratefulnesse?

Sonnets from 'Astrophel and Stella'

O happic Thames, that didst my Stella beare! I saw thee with full many a smiling line. Upon thy cheereful face joy's livery werre, While those faire planets on thy streames did shine. The boate for joy could not to daunce forbear. While wanton winds with beauties so divine. Ravisht, stud not, till in her golden hare. They did themselves (O sweetest prison) twine. And faine those (Tol's youth there would their stay. Have made but, forst by Nature still to flie, First did with puffing kisse those lockes display. She, so disheveld, blusht. From window I, With sight thereof, cried out. O faire disgrace, Let Honur's selfe to thee grant highest place!

I never dranke of Agruippe well,
Nor ever did in shade of Tempe sit,
And Muses scorne with vulgar brains to dwell,
Poore layman I, for sacred rites unfit
Some doe I heare of poets furie tell,
But, God wot, wot not what they meane by it,
And this I sweare by blackest brooke of hell,
I am no pick purse of another's wit
How falles it then that with so smooth an ease
My thoughts I speake, and what I speale doth flow
In verse, and that my verse best wits doth please?
Ghesse we the cause? What, is it this? Fie, no
Or so? Muche lesse. How then? Sure thus it is,
My lips are sweet, inspired with Stella's kisse

Come, Sleepe, O Sleepe, the certaine knot of peace, The baiting place of wit, the balme of woe, The poore man's wealth, the prisoner's release, Th' indifferent judge betweene the high and low With shield of proofe shield me from out the prease Of those fierce darts De paire at me doth throw, O male in me those civill warres to cease I will good tribate pay, if thou do so Take thou of me smooth pillowes, sweetest bed A chamber deaf of noise, and blind of light, A rosic garlind, and a weary hed. And if these things, as being thine in right, Move not thy heavy grace, thou shalt in me Livelier than else where Stella's image see.

Whether the Turkish new moone minded be To fill her homes this years on Christian coast? How Pole right king means without leave of hoast Fowering with ill made fire cold Muscosy? If I rench can yet three parts in one agree? What now the Dutch in their full diets boast? How Holland hearts, now so good townes be lost, I rust in the shade of pleasant Ornige tree? How Ulster likes of that same golden bit Wherewith my father once made it halfe tame? If in the Scotch Court be no weltring yet? These questions busic wits to me do frame I, cumbred with good maners, answer doe, But know not how, for still I thinke of you

Song 'Love is dead.'

Ring out your belies, let mourning shewes be spread, For I ove is dead

All Love is dead, infected
With plague of deep disdaine
Worth, as nought worth, rejected,
And Faith faire scorne doth gaine
From so ungrateful fancie,
From such a femall franzie,
From them that use men thus,

Weepe, neighbours, weepe, do you not heare it said. That Love is dead?

His death bed, peacock's follie,
His winding sheete is shame,
His will, false seeming holie,

Good Lord, deliver us '

His sole exec'tour, blame

From so ungrateful funcie,
From such a femall franzie,
From them that use men thus,
Good Lord, deliver us!

My True Love hath my Heart.

My true love hath my heart, and I have his, By just exchange the one for the other giv'ne I hold his deare, and mine he cannot misse, There never was a better bargaine driv'ne. His heart in me keepes me and him in one, My heart in him his thoughts and senses guides. He loves my heart, for once it was his owne, I cherish his because in me it bides. His heart his wound received from my sight, My heart was wounded with his wounded heart, For as from mee on him his hurt did light, So still methought in me his hurt did smart. Both equal hurt, in this change sought our blisse, My true love hath my heart, and I have his.

'Sidney's sister, Pembroke's mother' (c.1555-1621), was not merely the friend and patron of Spenser, Samuel Daniel, Nicholas Breton, and other poets and literary men. She edited the Arcadia her brother had dedicated to her, had a share with him in the translation of the Psalms, translated from the French A Discourse of Life and Death by her brother's friend Plessis du Mornay, and rendered into English blank verse Garnier's French tragedy, Antonie. She was the wife of the second Earl of Pembroke, and mother of the Earl to whom it has been supposed (and denied) that Shakespeare dedicated his sonnets

Sidney's poems and Apolique have been edited, the first ly Grosart (1877), the second by Arber (1968), Fingel (1880) Cook (1890) and Shuckburgh (1891) Astrophel and Stella by Gray,

Arber, Flügel (1889) and Pollard (1888) The Aradia was retroduced in facsimile by Professor Sommer in 1891. The Life by Fulke Greville (1652) was re-edited by Sir E Brydges (1810), and there are Lives by Zouch (1803), J. A. Symonds (1836) and Fox
Bourne (1862 and 1892). See Philip Sidney s Veniours of the Staticy

Edmund Spenser.

In a passage which has been often quoted Gibbon says, 'The nobility of the Spensers has been illustrated and enriched by the trophies of Marlborough, but I exhort them to consider the Faerie Queene as the most precious jewel of their coronet.' It is not, however, by any means certain that they have the right to claim him. He sprang from a family of Spensers settled at Hurstwood, in the north-east of Lancashire, and it is believed that his father was a certain John Spenser, a journeyman clothmaker, who came up to London before 1550 If so, his mother's name was Elizabeth, but her family is not known. He was born, about 1552, at East Smithfield, in 'merry London, my most kindly nurse,' as he says in the Prothalamion From the 'Spending of the Money of Robert Nowell,' it appears that he was sent, as a 'poor scholar,' to Merchant Taylors' School when it was opened in 1561 It is supposed that he was a foundation scholar, and that he stayed at the school until 1569 Lancelot Andrewes was his schoolfellow, and their head-master was Dr Mulcaster

Before he left school Spenser had 'commenced author,' for early in 1569 a Dutch refugee, Dr Jan van der Noodt, published a miscellany called A Theatre for Worldlings, in which were included certain translations from Petrarch and from Joachim du Bellav, which, though anonymous at the time, were afterwards in a modified form claimed by Spenser These translations, in blank verse and rhyme, have created a great deal of discussion, but there is no reasonable doubt that they came from the hand of Spenser, and they already display some of the characteristics of his style.

On the 20th of May 1569 Spenser passed directly from Merchant Taylors' School to Pembroke College, Cambridge, where he matriculated as a sizar We have evidence of his great poverty and of repeated illnesses while at college, he succeeded B.A. in 1573 and commenced M.A. in 1576, the year that he left Cambridge. He mentions the university in the Faerie Queene

My mother Cambridge, whom as with a crown He [i e. the Ouse] doth adorn, and is adorned by it With many a gentle Muse and many a learned Wit.

We know nothing of his academic life, but he formed at the university certain friendships which had an influence upon him. Edward Kirke, who afterwards edited the Shepherd's Calendar, and Gabriel Harvey, a poetaster and criticaster who assumed a position of authority at Cambridge, were his principal associates, and Harvey is the Hobbinol of Spenser's eclogues. As late as 1586

Spenser was still Harvey's 'devoted friend, during life.' Harvey was the chief of those who promulgated the heresy that the rhythms and rhymes of normal English verse were to be swept away in favour of accentuated rhymeless measures closely modelled on Greek and Latin prosody. There is no doubt that by too modestly acceding to all this nonsense Spenser was delayed in the development of his genius.

Spenser took his degree of MA. in 1576 and left Cambridge He went to his own people in Lancashire, and here, as has been suggested, met the Rosalind of his sonnets and pastorals. In the next year, Gabriel Harvey urging him to 'forsake his shire' and come south, Spenser seems to have paid a short visit to Ireland, and in 1578 or 1579 to have settled in London Here he seems to have been early presented to Sir Philip Sidney and his brother-in-law, the Earl of Leicester, and to have taken up his abode in Leicester House He wrote a series of poems which have been lost, called Stemmata Dudlerana A correspondence with Gabriel Harvey, who addresses Spenser as 'Immerito,' has been preserved, and is full of bad advice about hexameters and trimeters winter of 1579-80 Spenser had other poetical works ready-Dreams, The Dying Pelican, and Nine Comedies All these have disappeared, but on the 5th of December 1579 was entered at Stationers' Hall a poem, the effect of which on the expansion of English literature was astounding This is, of course, The Shepherd's Calendar

The publication of this famous collection of pastorals placed Spenser, at a bound, in front of all

English poets since Chaucer The originality and mustery of the 'new poet,' as Spenser began immed itely to be styled, was admitted at once Shetnerd's Calendar vas anonymous, and consisted of twelve cologues, as they may all be roughly styled, distinguished from one another in their mure, subject, and treatment. In adopting the Arcadian device of 'goatherds' tales' Spenser was yielding to the fashion of the hour, and to the prictice of the followers of Sannazaro The whole of Ludand was supposed to be a sheep farm, under the sway of the queen of shepherds, fur Elisa, daughter of Pan, the god of shepherds setting of bucolic illegory offers many inconvenicrices to the fanc, of the poet, especially as he wishes to treat questions of Puritan religious discipline, which have remirkably little to do with Pan and Syrinx. Under the general denomination of 'cclosues,' moreover, are included fables, saures. amatory lyrics, and other forms of current verse, so that the Slepherd's Calerdar is really to be looked upon as a sort of miscellany

To his contemporaries the most daring thing about the new poet was his diction, which Spenser enriched, or attempted to enrich, with a multitude of obsolcte and rural forms Sidney, who was one of the earliest admirers of the Calendar, and who put the new poet on a level with Theocritus, Virgil, ind Sannazaro, 'dared not allow that same framing of his style in an old rustic language? Spenser's object, however, no doubt was by this diction to accentuate the English character of his verses and to lessen their Italian aspect. Moreover, in the Shepherd's Calendar Spenser shows himself still related to the primitive and rural poets of the English middle ages-allegorical and alliterative. Indeed, it is not to be denied that many critics. coming upon these poems after traversing the wastes of the fifteenth and early so teenth centuries. have applieded them with cicess, since, after all. in comparison with what the English poets, and Spenser himself, were almost immediately ifterwards to produce, the greater part of the Shephurd's Calendar is but tame, colourless, and experimental In the cologues for May and August we see 'the new poet,' at his best, and that is far ahead of any of his immediate predecessors, except Sackville.

In the summer of 1500 Lord Grey de Wilton, on being appointed the Queen's Deputy in Ireland, took Spenser over to Dublin as his secretary, and it is supposed that he was an eye witness of the horrible scenes enacted in the province of Munster a little later, when the Rebellion of Desmond broke out Long afterwards, in his prose View of Ireland, the poet recounted many of his experiences 15d1 he was appointed Registrar of Chancers in Iteland ud bot a lease or grant of the abbey and castle of Enn acorthy, in county Wexford, these vere succeeded by arrous employments and residences and Spanser probably made Dublin his herdquaters from 1580 to 1588 In the latter year ne seems to have settled at Kilcolman, I an abandoned peel-tower of the Desmonds. in a then wooded glen of the Galtee Hills, in the north of county Cork, some thirty miles south of Limerick, this, with its 3000 or 4000 acres of land, was Spenser's share of the spoil. Here, in 1589, Sir Walter Raleigh visited him, and here Spenser read to his friend the early cantos of the great poem which had now for so many years been occupying his thoughts and The 'Shepherd of the Ocean,' as Ralcizh was called, perceived in a moment that this romance of fairyland rose immeasurably high above anything that had called itself poetry in England before In the very interesting autobiographical poem called Colin Clout's Come Home Again, first published in 1595, Spenser gives a minute account of the conversations of the two fricads Raleigh, on his part, read his own poem of Cynthia, the greater portion of which is now lost, and urged Spenser to come with him to court, so that they might in unison lay their songs before Elizabeth This Spenser immediately agreed to do, it would appear that he accompanied Raleigh to England, and was presented to the queen She gave him a pension of £50 a year, and in December 1589 the first three books of that epoch making poem, the Faire Queen, were entered in the registers of the Stationers' Company It was announced as 'disposed into twelve books,' but when it was published early in 1590 only three books were produced, and it is probable that no more was at this time completed. It was dedicated, in words which seem blown through a golden trumpet, to 'the most high, mighty and magnificent Empress,' Elizabeth, 'to live with the eternity of her fame,' as was added in a later edition

The reception of the Faerie Queene was more than enthusiastic. All England responded to the opinion attributed to Shakespeare, that Spenser's 'deep conceit was such as, passing all conceit, needed no defence.' He was accepted, in that age of glorious singers, as the first of English pocts Caressed and congratulated by all the court, Spenser stayed in England until far on into 1591, enjoying to the full, no doubt, these the most vivid and agreeable months of his existence. He was obliged at length to return to his duties, for he was now Clerk of the Council of Munster, and he had his poems to write, which no doubt were better encouraged by the solitude of Kilcolman than by the excitements of London He was troubled, however, by a law-suit with his crazy neighbour, Lord Roche, but the importance of this has perhaps been evaggerated. We may believe that Spenser's life was now for some years comfortable, and of a nature to encourage him in the prosecution of We may leave him his noble poetical labours at Kildolman for the moment, and consider the scheme of his great romantic masterpiech

of miscomprehending his intention. By the 'Elvish' Monarch, Gloriana, who is kept out of sight throughout, but who animates the whole idea, he meant national splendour as embodied The Knight of the Red Cross was in Elizabeth emblematical of Holiness, Sir Guyon of Temperance, the Lady Britomart of Chastity of the Taerie Queene was intended to be this The Queen Gloriana keeps her annual festival upon twelve consecutive days, on each of which there occur adventures, undertaken by twelve successive knights, and these form the subjects of the books of the poem, eked out by such episodes as the overthrow of Marinell and the resistance of Belphæbe. Such is the scheme of the Faerie Queene as Spenser himself unfolded it to Raleigh. It was to be a great chivalrous epic after the Italian fashion of Boiardo and Ariosto, but with this distinction, that allegory was to be predominant in the outline of it, and that the conduct of the sentiment was to be uniformly splendid, with none of the descents to playfulness and even triviality which the Italians allowed themselves Since Pulci had enjoyed so facile a success with the Morgante Maggiore, there had been a growing tendency to introduce burlesque, and even pantomimic absurdity, into the chivalrous epic, which, indeed, was now dying in the south of Europe. Spenser came just in time to lift it again to an incomparable magnificence, in a poem of extreme dignity and gravity

We do not know how Spenser would have rounded forth his plan, for he did not live to complete the Faire Queene Only six of the twelve promised books were finished. But nothing that he might have added could have removed one basal fault, as Dean Church says, the poem 'carries with it no adequate account of its own story, it does not explain itself, or contain in its own structure what vould enable a reader to understand how it arose.' There seems to have been planned yet another parallel epic, celebrating the 'politic virtues,' also, no doubt, to be in twelve books. What we possess, therefore, is but a fragment, and yet, beautiful as this is, no one has ever wished for more. Spenser did not possess constructive gifts, he was more prolix, if possible, than his Italian predecessors, and it is better to enjoy the actual texture of what he gives us in such gorgeous profusion than to attempt to realise what it was which he intended to supply As he wrote on he used the Faerie Queen. as a receptacle into which to pour whatever he had felt or suffered, dreamed or longed for, it became his constant haunting vision of life, now dropped for a while, now taken up anew, fused in nothing but in its uniformity of delicious music and radiant colour

The form of the Faerie Queene deserves our attention Spenser chose the ottava rima, as it had been used by Boiardo and was still being used by Tisso, but he altered it by adding a line between the Italian fourth and fifth, by modifying the arrangements of rhymes, and by adding a foot to the last line, which became an Alexandrine. This was a real metrical invention of high importance, and it has been claimed for Spenser that it is the only one which can be traced home to an English poet. It was little appreciated in Spenser's own age, or at least little and incorrectly imitated, but from the central years of the eighteenth century, when it was resuscitated by Akenside and Thomson, onwards to Tennyson and later, it was the characteristic metre of English romanice, to Byron, Shelley, and Keats, in particular, it proved irresistibly attractive. None of these poets have used it with more complete success than its founder, in whose hands its sinuous and voluptuous melody, so subtle, so long drawn, so majestic, presents to us something which is the very type and emblem of sustained poetic expression. The difficulty of handling this metre, especially in the group of four identical rhymes, is, however, greater than Spenser, who seems strangely breathless and hurried, can give himself time to overcome He constantly forces sound, sense, and grammar to the evigencies of rhyme, satisfied if, without positively tripping, he can close his stanza in a rich Alexandrine.

Before Spenser returned to Ireland, he pub lished in London a collection of nine of his miscellaneous poems, which appeared early in 1591 under the general title of Complaints these, Munopotmos, or the Fate of the Butterfly, had already been issued in 1500, this is a lyrical narrative of the loves of a winged fay, Clarion, treated with extreme delicacy and lightness of touch. The Ruins of Time is an exquisite series of elegies, prolonged in several measures, and closing with a lament for Sir Philip Sidney, who had died on the 17th of October 1586, which doubtless indicates the date of composition of the poem In The Tears of the Muses the poet calls upon Clio and her sisters to sing the degradation and sloth of England and her rulers in jeremiads which have little appropriateness or value beyond their verbal music, this is one of the poorest of Spenser's compositions Virgil's Gnat appears to be a very early production, touched up by the more practised hand of the poet just before publication, little is to be said regarding this fluent paraphrase. Vastly more important is Prosopopoia, or, as it is more usually named. 'Mother Hubbard's Tale' This sature, we are told by the poet himself, was 'long sithens composed in the raw conceit of my youth." It is interesting to see Spenser here deliberately competing with Chaucer Two central ideas run through ' Mother Hubbard's Tale,' it is a sarcastic picture of the English court, in its political conditions, and it is a satire of the contest proceeding between the Catholic and the Reformed Church under Elizabeth. It has been observed that Spenser's picture of society is obscured by his mability to touch life directly, Spenser must always be either romancing or allegorising

the Complaints is taken up by four series of short pieces, mystical or allegorical, two of which are translated from Joachim du Bellax, one paraphrased from Petrarch, while one, Visions of the World's Vanity, seems to be substantially original Among the former are found the boyish sonnets of 1569, revised and republished to take their place among the maturer writings of the poet

Larly in 1502 (the date on the title page is 1501) Spenser published Daphnaida, an elegy in memo rial of Douglas Howard Gorges, the only daughter of Lord Bindon. This is a good example of his less personal manner in funereal poetry, sedate, fluent, and elegant, but too much taken up with the commonplaces of mortuary reflection to move the heart very deeply Indeed, there is little doubt that the composition of death poems of this class was part of the business of a professional Elizabethan poet, and not the least lucrative part. A knowledge of the deceased was not necessary, the family supplied the outlines on which the clegy was to be constructed, and the verse writer then built up his work around such a scriffolding The poet. in fact, was called in, as the sculptor or the painter might have been, and no charge of insincerity could be brought against the result of his labours Although the preface of Daphnaida is signed 'London, this first of January, 1591[2],' there is good reison to believe that Spenser had reached Ireland before the close of December

He resumed his duties as Clerk to the Council of the province of Munster Of his history during the next two years nothing is preserved was probably working, in the seclusion of his barbarous little pecl-tower of Kilcolman, on the remaining books of the Facrie Oucene 11th of June 1594 Edmund Spenser and Elizabeth Boyle were married in the Cathedral of Cork, by William Lyon, bishop of that diocese. Of the bride we may learn as much as the subsequently published Imorette and Epithalamion are inclined to tell us, for little more is known She bore him four, if not five, children, to two of whom he gave characteristically romantic names-Sylvanus, Laurence, Peregrine, Katherine It has been discovered that about the time of his marriage Spenser resigned the Clerkship of the Council to Sir Richard Boyle, a kinsman of his wife, and a family arrangement has been conjectured. unquestionably anxious to be free to visit England once more and see his later poems through the

Fo Sir Wilter Raleigh he had sent, immediately upon his arrival at Kilcolman in the winter of 1591, the MS of his Coine Cloud's Come Home Igain, but his friend refrained from printing it. It was published in 1595. This is one of the most vigorous, viried, and felicitous of Spenser's works, a record in exquisitely animated verse of ill that had happened to him, socially and spiritually, during the two years of brilhant awakening under Raleigh's protection. There is reason to suppose that Colin

Clout's Come Home Again did not pass to the press straight from Spenser's hands, for it contains a celebration of his old lost love Rosalind, which reads strangely as coming from the recent bride groom of Elizabeth Boyle. Probably the poem was printed, without his revision, from the old MS But we are not left in the same doubt regarding Spenser's next publication, Amorette and Epitha lamion, which was brought over from Kilcolman in the autumn of 1595 by Sir Robert Needham, and put safely in the hands of Ponsonby, the publisher, who brought it out in a tiny volume in November

This book was entirely devoted to a celebration of his married love. The Amoretti were the son nets, eighty eight in number, which he had composed during their courtship, while Lpithalamion was their marriage ode. The former were of the Petrarchan order, melodious and graceful, but dimmed to excess by the indefiniteness which was Spenser's great fault, and very rarely giving the reader that hold upon reality which is indispensable for the true enjoyment of poetry of this class On the other hand, Lpithalamion is perhaps Spenser's most perfect and most picturesque production, this poem glows with life and passion said long ago, 'I do not know any other nuptial song, ancient or modern, of equal beauty, it is in intoxication of ecstasy, ardent, noble, and pure' This magnificent poem is a canzone of the Italian class, perhaps the most perfect in the English language, whether Spenser borrowed the form direct from Petrarch or was affected by some experiments of Sir Philip Sidney may be questioned It is enough to point out here that the style of Spenser is nowhere of so consummate a splendour as it is in the gorgeous strophes of Epithalamion

It is believed that Spenser returned to England towards the end of 1595, and that he brought with him the manuscript of the eccond part of the Faerie Queene, consisting of the fourth, fifth, and sixth This was published by Ponsonby in 1596, and continued the romance with the story of Cambel and Iritmond, or of Iriendship, that of Artegall, or of Justice, and that of Sir Calidore, or of Courtesy This was all that Spenser ever published of his great scheme, but it is certain that he proceeded further, for two cantos, the sixth and the seventh of 'some following book' of the Faerie Queene, were published in 1609 in the carliest folio These are known as the Cintos of Muta bility, and they are supposed to illustrate a legend of constancy In 1596 Spensor was a guest at the wedding of Elizabeth and Catherine, the daughters of the Earl of Worcester, and to this feast he contributed a 'spousal' odc, Prothalamion, which was privately printed by Ponsonby This same year saw the publication of his Four Hymnsin Honour of Love, in Honour of Beauty, of Heavenly Love and of Heavenly Beauty been claimed that these were among Spenser's earliest effusions, 'composed in the greener times of my youth,' and these words are supposed particularly to affect the two earlier hymns. These are, doubtless, more mannered and less highly finished than the two later ones, but they greatly differ, as we now possess them, from what Spenser originally composed. 'Many copies' of the two Earthly Hymns, in their earlier form, 'were formerly scattered about,' but not one has hitherto been discovered.

When the poet issued his Four Hymns he was living at Greenwich, where Queen Elizabeth had a palace. He was extremely active in the year 1596, doubtless availing himself of the fact that he was closer to London to publish the various miscellaneous effusions of the past years He printed .1strophel, an Arcadian elegy on Sir Philip Sidney's death, a subject which he had treated elsewhere with greater fervour. In this year, too, Spenser wrote his prose treatise, the View of Ireland, a statesman-like proposition for the 'thorough subjugation of that rebellious country,' which has been misunderstood by Celtic patriotism Spenser could not be expected to take a view in opposition to the queen whom he served and the Government with which he was associated, but his little book testifies to close and not unsympathetic study of the elements of Irish society as he saw it in those troubled years

Ireland was peculiarly unsettled when Spenser, probably in the opening weeks of 1597, returned to his home in Kilcolman On the 30th of September 1598 the poet was appointed Sheriff of Cork, and on this occasion the queen describes him in her letters as 'a gentleman dwelling in the county of Cork, who is so well known unto you all for his good and commendable parts, being a man endowed with good knowledge in learning, and not unskilful or without experience in the wars' Meanwhile the new rebellion under Tyrone was gathering to a head in secret, and in 1598 the wild Irish rose throughout Munster in the hope of regaining from the English Undertakers, of whom Spenser was-one, the lands of which they had been dis possessed. In October all the province of Munster was in the hands of the rebels Spenser was attacked in his peel tower, and had only just time to escape with his household before the whole of Kilcolman was in flames Ben Jonson told Drummond of Hawthornden that Spenser's youngest child, a baby, perished in the fire got safe to Cork, where he joined the President, Sir Thomas Norris, who sent the poet to London with a despatch containing a first report of the rebellion Spenser arrived in England about the middle of the month of December 1598 State papers drawn up by the poet for the queen's guidance 'in the recovery of the realm of Ireland' were printed first by Dr Grosart in 1884, and are valuable biographically, as showing that Spenser was not overwhelmed by his misfortunes end, however, was startlingly near at hand the 16th of January 1599 he died in an inn at King Street, Westminster There was a very painful story of his having died in extreme indigence, from want of food, and Jonson reported that, as he was starving, 'he refused twenty pieces sent him by my lord Essex, and said he was sure he had no time to spend them'. It is also reported that he was buried at the expense of Lodowick Lloyd, the queen's serjeant-at-arms, a poetaster of the time. On the other hand, we hear from Camden that Essex paid for a public funeral at the Abbey, where the nobles and poets threw elegies, 'and the pens wherewith they had been written,' into the grave. A monument was raised in the Abbey by Anne Clifford, Countess of Dorset, in 1620

Spenser was early distinguished as the poet's poet, and through successive generations, even when there has seemed little sympathy between his ideas and those in vogue among his youthful admirers, he has exercised an extraordinary influence over enthusiastic and imaginative young men. In his own day a cluster of disciples gathered about his work, although it is possible that of his person they knew little or nothing Later on in the next century poets as unlike him as Cowley and Dryden acknowledged a lasting debt to him for stimulating their love of the poetic art. But we reach the most unlikely of the admirers of Spenser when we come to Pope, whose childhood was nourished on the Faerie Quiene, who scornfully accused Addison of criticising Spenser without having really read him, and who held up the great Elizabethan as one of the landmarks of our litera-Pope wrote, when he was twelve, an epic poem of Alcander, in which he tried to reproduce the beauties of the Faerie Queene When he was old he read Spenser's poems over again, and said that they gave him as much delight as they did when he was a child The list of the great English poets which Pope drew out began with the name of Spenser

This evidence of Pope's is of peculiar value, because of the diametrical opposition between the praiser and the praised in the technical character of their work. It shows that there is a peculiar quality of romance in the poetry of Spenser which is entirely independent of style and fashion, and naturally attracts all who are attracted, in whatever form, by the art of verse. After the classical period, and when romance came slowly back into fashion, it is no wonder that Spenser became again a favourite, or was imitated by such poets as Thomson, Collins, and Shenstone. With the complete revival of imagina tive literature in England he was closely identified, and we trace him strongly in Shelley, Keats, and Wordsworth, and, less obviously, in Byron the writings of Tennyson and even of Browning the Spenserian elements are clearly perceptible. Spenser, in short, has entered into the very blood and bones of our national poetry, and we are with him oftener than we are conscious of his presence. He is still our criterion of the romantic virtues, of cardour and courtesy in a man, of dignified sweetness in a woman. His types are, without our realisation of the fact, the ideal portraits which we like to point to as those of the noblest specimens of our race and breed.

When we look broadly at the poetic work of Spenser, we find that the Faire Queene stands out so mussively that it dwarfs all his other achieve-Taking this glorious fragment, then, as representative of his power and quality, we see that the most prominent characteristic of Spenser is his intense conviction of the paramount importance No poet has ever lived in whom the of be tuty obsession of leveliness, in person and scenery, in thought and act, in colour and sound, in associa tion and instinct, was so constraining as it is in He is led by beauty as by a golden Spensor chain, and his work has the weaknesses inherent on a too persistent concentration of the mind on this particular species of harmony sublimity, he does not know the heightening power of austerity in treatment, he shrinks from all life that is not led in the mazes of an enchanted forest or by the lustral waters of an ocean cordingly, his statcliness and his fantastic pageant of the imagination have a certain unreality about them, which his migic is seldom quite intense chough to remove. His scenes are too spectacular and too phintasmal to give complete satisfaction to any but children and poets

It would be an error, however, to regard 'our sage and serious Spenser' as one who merely designed to unroll before our eyes a panorama of exquisite and dignified pictures of an incredible His extreme devotion to the principle of beauty did not preclude him from the aim of being 'a better teacher than Scotus or Agumas' It is true that the least pleasing parts of his great poem are those in which he strains most tightly his ethical or didactic purpose. Like many great teachers, he teaches best when his thoughts are least set on teaching. His studies of womanhood, extraordinary in their variety and subtlety, are living sources of education. Age after age our best youth has learned to adore the female virtues in this exquisite series of full length por-What could not be said of Una and Amoret, of Britomart and Belphabe, of Florincl and Screna. In these stainless and tender creations Spenser trught the wild men of his own age 'the rude rabblement' not less than the Sityranes and braggadochios of Elizabeth's 'salvage' court, to honour and submit to the inherent m yesty of woman, which, indeed, was at the sime time quaintly and artificially foreshidowed by the efiquette due from a gentleman in addressing the queen as a beautiful and perfect maiden, although to the gross outward eye she might seem to him old and harsh and ugh

Of Spender's treatment of the phenomena of the physical world much might be said. He excels in broad effects, he brings up before us the illimitable wideness of great plains, the billow vastness of primeval forests, the world veiled in shadow, drowned in a blaze of sunshing, brooded over by the starry stillness of midnight. metre, so tense and delicate, becomes like an æolian harp as he describes the various movements of the air, from a light breeze to the very roar of tempest But, perhaps, most of all Spenser exercises his magic in rendering the sound and appearance of living waters-in sea, in lake, in river Even in the depths of the woodland his embodied virtues are never far from some glade down which the sound is heard of forming breakers or of silver Spenser's treatment of landscape can nowhere be more favourably studied than in the long drawn voluptuous scenes of Aciasia's Bower of Bliss in the second book of the Faerie Oucene, where we possess, combined in extraordinary full ness, his typical characteristics, his love of allc gorical presentment, the richness of his vision, his amazing fluency and melody of style, his Platonic elevation, and also his cardinal fault, his want of constructive resolution. We think of him at last, in face of all that is ineffectual and mistaken in his theory of poetry, as nevertheless one of the noblest figures in our poetical history clothed with romance as with a garment, he is an impressioned votrry of the loftiest imaginative purity, and he is one of the most lavish of those who have strewn at our fect the rubies of exquisite In the masque of the English poets Edmund Spenser rides on a white horse and blows a golden trumpet, the champion of beauty and Paladin of poets

'Ye dayntye Nymphs, that in this blessed brooke Doe bathe your brest,

Forsake your watry bowres, and hether looke, At my request

And che you Virgins, that on Parnasse dwell, Whence floweth Helicon, the learned well,

Helpe me to blaze Her worthy praise,

Which in her sexe doth all excell

Of fayre Elisa be your silver song,

That blessed wight,

The flowre of Virgins may slice florish long

In princely plight!

For shee is Syrinx daughter without spotte, Which Pan, the shepheards God, of her begot

So sprong her grace Of heavenly race,

No mortall blemishe may her blotte

'Sec, where she sits upon the grassic greene, (O seemely sight!)

Una and the Red Cross Knight.

A gentle Knight was pricking on the plaine, Yeladd in mightie armes and silver shielde, Wherein old dints of deepe woundes did remaine, The crucil markes of many a bloody fielde, Yet armes till that time did he never wield His angry steede did chide his forming bitt, As much disdayning to the curbe to yield Full jolly knight he seemd, and taire did sitt, As one for I nightly guists and fierce encounters fitt

And on his brest a bloodie Crosse he bore,
The deare remembrance of his dying Lord,
For whose sweete sake that glorious badge he wore,
And dead, as living, ever him ador d
Upon his shield the like was also scor'd,
For soveraine hope which in his helpe he had Right faithfull true he was in deede and word,
But of his cheere did seeme too solemne sad,
Yet nothing did he dread, but ever was ydrad.

Upon a great adventure he was bond,
That greatest Gloriana to him gave,
(That greatest Glorious Queene of Faery lond)
To winne him worshippe, and her grace to have,
Which of all earthly thinges he most did crave
And ever as he rode his hart did earne.
To prove his puissance in battell brave
Upon his foe, and his new force to learne,
Upon his foe, a Dragon horrible and stearne.

A lovely Ladic rode him faire beside, Upon a lowly Asse more white than snow, Yet she much whiter, but the same did hide Under a vele, that wimpled was full low, And over all a blacke stole shee did throw As one that inly mournd, so was she sad, And heavie sate upon her palfrey slow, Seemed in heart some hidden care she had, And by her in a line a milkewhite lambe she lad

So pure and innocent as that same lambe
She was in life and every vertuous lore,
And by descent from Royall lynage came
Of ancient Kinges and Queenes, that had of yore
Their scepters stretcht from East to Westerne shore,
And all the world in their subjection held,
Till that infernall feend with foule uprore
I orwasted all their land, and them expeld,
Whom to avenge she had this knight from far compeld

I chind her farre awiy a Dwarfe did lag,
That laste ceind, in being ever last,
Or weared with bearing of her lag.
Of needments at his backet. Thus as they past.
The day with cloudes was suddenic overeast,
And anory Jove an indeous storme of rame.
Did poure in o his Lemans lap so fast,
That everie wight to shrowd it did constrain,
And this faire couple eke to shroud themselves were fain.

Enforst to seeke some covert mgh at hand, A hadie grove not fur tway they spide, That promist ivide the tempest to withstand, Whose loftic trees, yelad with sommers pride, Did spred to broad, that heavens light did lide, Not perceable vith power of any starr And all within were pathes and alleres vide, With footing vorne, and leading inward farr Faire harbour that them seems, so in they entred ar

And foorth they passe, with pleasure forward led, Joying to heare the birdes sweete harmony, Which, therein shrouded from the tempest dred, Seemd in their song to scorne the cruell sky Much can they praise the trees so straight and hy, The styling Pine, the Cedar proud and tall, The vine propp Elme, the Poplar never dry, The builder Oake, sole king of forrests all, The Aspine good for staves, the Cyprese funerall,

The Laurell, meed of mightic Conquerours
And Poets sage, the I are that weepeth still
The Willow, worne of forlorne Paramours,
The Lugh, obedient to the benders will,

The Marke sweete bleeding in the bitter wound,
The warlike Beech, the Ash for nothing ill,
The fruitfull Olive, and the Platane round,
The carver Holme, the Maple seedom inward sound.

Led with delight, they thus beguile the way Untill the blustring storme is overblowne, When, weening to returne whence they did stray, They cannot finde that path, which first was showne, But wander too and fro in waies unknowne, Furthest from end then, when they neerest weene, That makes them doubt their wits be not their or ne So many pathes, so many turnings seene, That which of them to take in diverse doubt they been (From The Facile Quient Book neemed)

Acrasia's Bower of Bliss

The creative most daintie Paradise on ground. It selfe doth offer to his sober eye,
In which all pleasures plenteously abound,
And none does others happinesse envice,
The punted flowres, the trees upshooting hye,
The dales for shade, the hilles for breathing space,
The trembling groves, the christall running by,
And, that which all faire workes doth most aggrace,
The art which all that wrought appeared in no place

One would have thought (so cunningly the rude And scorned partes were mingled with the fine). That nature had for wantonesse cusuale. Art, and that Art at nature did repline,. So striving each the other to undermine,. Lach did the others worke more heautify,. So differing both in willes agreed in fine. So all agreed, through sweete diversity. This Gardin to adome with all variety.

And in the midst of all a fountaine stood,
Of richest sul stance that on earth might Lee,
So pure and shi iv that the silver flood
Through e ery channell running one might see,
Most goodly it with curious yinngetee
Was overwrought, an I shapes of nalled boyes,
Or which some seemd with lively jollitee
To the about, playing their wenton toyes, Whyles others did them selves embay in liquid joyes.

And over all of purest go'd was spred
A travic of five in his native hew,
For the rich metall was so coloured,
That right who did not well avis'd it vew
Would surely deeme it to bee give trew
Lov his lascivious armes adown did creepe,
That themselves dipping in the silver dew
Their fleecy flowres they fearefully did steepe,
Which drops of Christall seemd for wantones to weep

Infinit streames continually did well
Out of this fountaine, sweet and faire to see,
The which into an ample layer fell,
And shortly grew into so great quantitie,
That like a litle lake it seemd to bee,
Whose depth exceeded not three cubits hight,
That through the waves one might the bottom see,
All pav'd beneath with Jaspar shining bright,
That seemd the fountaine in that sea did sayle upright

And all the margent round about was sett
With shady Laurell trees, thence to defend
The sunny beames which on the billowes bett,
An I those which therein bathed mote offend.
As Guyon hapned by the same to wend,
Two naked Damzelles he therein espyde,
Which therein bathing seemed to contend
And wrestle wantonly, he car'd to hyde
Their dainty partes from vew of any which them eyd.

Sometimes the one would lift the other quight Above the waters, and then downe again. Her plong, as over may stered by might, Where both as hile would covered remaine, And each the other from to rise restraine. The whiles their snowy limbes, as through a vele, so through the christall waves appeared plaine. Then suddeinly both would themselves unfiele, and the amarous sweet spoiles to greedy eyes revele

As that fure Starre, the messenger of morne, His deavy face out of the sea doth reare, Or as the Cyprian goddesse, newly borne Of th' Ocean's fruitfull froth, did first appeare Such seemed they, and so their yellow heare Christalline humor dropped downe apace. Whom such when Guyon saw, he drew him neare, And somewhat gan relent his earnest pace, His stubborne brest gan secret pleasaunce to embrace.

The wanton Maidens, him espring, stood Grein, while at his unwonted guise.
Then th' one her selfe low ducked in the flood, Abo ht that her a strainger did axise.
But thother rather higher did arise, Aigh her two hilly paps aloft displayd, and all that might his inclining hart entyse. To fee delights she unto him bewared. The rest hidd underneath him more desirous made.

With that the offer like vise up arose, And her to re lockes, which formerly were bound Up in one knott, she low adowned did lose Which flowing loss and thick her clothed around, And the yeone in golden mantle gownd.
So that faire spectacle from him was reft,
Yet that which reft it no lesse faire was found.
So hidd in lockes and waves from lookers theft,
Nought but her lovely face she for his looking left.

Withall she laughed, and she blusht withall,
That blushing to her laughter gave more grace,
And laughter to her blushing, as did fall
Now when they spyde the knight to slacke his pace
Them to behold, and in his sparkling face
The secrete signes of kindled lust appear,
Their wanton meriments they did encreace,
And to him beckned to approach more neare,
And shewd him many sights that corage cold could reare.

On which when gazing him the Palmer saw, He much rebult those wandring eyes of his, and counseld well him forward thence did draw Now are they come nigh to the Bowre of blis, Of her fond favorites so named amis, When thus the Palmer 'Now, Sir, well avise, For here the end of all our traveill is Here wonnes Acrasia, whom we must surprise, Els she will ship away, and all our drift despise'

Estsoones they heard a most melodious sound,
Of all that mote delight a daintie care,
Such as attonce might not on living ground,
Save in this Paradise, be heard elsewhere
Right hard it was for wight which did it heare,
To read what manner musicke that mote bee
For all that pleasing is to living care
Was there consorted in one harmonee, Birdes, voices, instruments, windes, waters, all agree.

The joyous birdes, shrouded in chearefull shade Their notes unto the voice attempred sweet, Th' Angelicall soft trembling voyces made To th' instruments divine respondence meet, The silver sounding instruments did meet With the base murmure of the waters fall, The waters fall with difference discreet, Now soft, now loud, unto the wind did call, The gentle warbling wind low answered to all.

There, whence that Musick seemed heard to bee, Was the faire Witch her selfe now solacing With a new Lover, whom through sorcered And witchcraft she from farre did thither bring There she had him now laid aslombering In secret shade after long wanton joyes, Whilst round about them pleasauntly did sing Many faire Ladies and laser rous boyes, That ever mixt their song with light licentious toyes

And all that v hile right over him she hong With her false eyes fast fixed in his sight, As seeking medicine whence she was stong Or greedily depasturing delight, And oft inchining downe, with kisses light For teare of waking him, his lips bedowd, And through his humid eyes did sucke his spright, Quite molten into lust and pleasure lewd, Wherewith she sighed soft, as if his case she rewd.

The whiles some one did chaunt this lovely lay Ah' see, whose fayre thing doest frine to see, In springing flower the image of thy day Ah' see the Virgin Rose, how sweetly shee Doth first peope foorth with bashfull modestee, That fairer seemes the lesse ye see her may Lo! see soone after how more bold and free Her bared bosome she doth broad display, Lo! see soone after how she fades and falls a "ay

So passeth, in the passing of a day,
Of mortall life the leafe, the bud, the flowre,
Ne more doth florish after first decay,
That earst was sought to deck both bed and bowre
Of many a lady, and many a Paramowre
Gather therefore the Rose whilest yet is prime
For soone comes age that will her pride deflowre,
Ga her the Rose of love whilest yet is time,
Whilest loving thou may at loved be with equal crime

(From The Faerie Queene, Book it canto xit.)

The Temple of Venus

'Into the inmost Temple thus I came,
Which furning all with frank ensence I found
And odours rising from the alters flame
Upon an hundred marble pillors round
The roofe up high was reared from the ground,
All deckt with cro ones, and chaynes, and girlands gay,
And thousand pretious gifts worth many a pound,
The which sad lovers for their vowes did pay,
And all the ground was strow'd with flowres as fresh as

'An hundred Altars round about were set,
All flaming with their sacrifices fire,
That with the steme thereof the Temple swet,
Which rould in clouds to heaven did aspire,
And in them bore true lo ers vowes entire
And cke an hundred brasen caudrons bright,
To both in jo, and amorous desire,
Every of which was to a damzell hight,
For all the Priests vere damzels in soft hinnen dight

Right in the midst the God lesse selfe did stand Upon an altar of some costly masse,
Who— substance was uneath to understand hard For neither 1 retious atone, nor durefull brasse,
For shining bold, nor meuldring clay it was.
Put much more rire and pretious to esteeme,
Pure in aspect, an 1 like to christall glasse,
Yet glasse has not, if one did rightly deeme,
But, being faire and brickle, likest glasse did seeme

'I ut it in shape and heautic did excell.
All other Idole is high the heathen adore,
Farre palling that which by surpassing skill.
I hidias did make in Paphos Isle of yore,
With which that wretched Greeke, that life forlore,
Did fall in love yet this much fairer shined,
But covered with a slender veile afore,
And both her feete and legs together twyred.
Were with a snake, whose head and tail were fast combyned.

'And all about her necke and shoulders flev
A flocke of little loves, and sports, and joyes,
With nimble wings of gold and purple liew,
Whose shapes seem'd not like to terre triall boyes,
But like to Angels playing heavenly toyes,
The whilest their eldest brother was a vay,
Cupid their eldest brother, he enjoyes
The wide kingdome of love with lordly sway,
And to his last compels all creatures to obay

'And all about her altar scattered lay
Great sorts of lovers piteously complaying,
Some of their losse, some of their loves delay,
Some of their pride, some paragons disclaying,
Some fearing fraud, some fraudulently faying,
As every one had cause of good or ill
Amongst the rest some one, through Loses constraying Tormented sore, could not containe it still,
But thus brake forth, that all the temple it did fill

""Great Venus! Queene of beautie and of prace,
The joy of Gods and men, that under "kie
Doest fayrest shine, and most adorne the place,
That with thy smyling looke doest pacific
The raging seas and maket the stormes to flic,
Thee, goddesse, thee the winds, the clouds doe feare,
And, when thou spredst th, mantle forth on hie,
The waters play, and pleasant lands appeare,
And heavens laugh, and at the vorld shows joyous

Mutability

When I bethinke me on that speech shyleare exemple Of Mutabilitie, and well it way,

Me seemes that though she all unworthy were.

Of the Heavins Rule, yet, very moth to say,

In all things classific beares the greate to my.

Which makes me loath this state of life so tickle, in meture And lose of things so vaine to east away,

Whose floring pride, so fading and so fielde,

Short Time shall soon cut down with his consuming sickle.

Then gin I thinke on that which Nature sayd,
Of that same time when no more Change shall be,
But stedfast rest of all things, firmely stayd
Upon the pillours of Eternity,
That is contrayr to Mutabilitie,
For all that moveth doth in Change delight
But thence forth all shall rest eternally
With Him that is the God of Sabaoth hight
O! that great Sabaoth God, grant me that Sabaoths sight

From the 'Epithalamion.'

Wake now, my love, awake! for it is time, The Kosy Morne long since left Tithones bed, All ready to her silver coche to clyme. And Phœbus gins to shew his glorious hed. Hark ! how the cheerefull birds do chaunt they lates And carroll of Loves praise The merry Larke hir mattins sings aloft. The I hrush replyes, the Mavis descant playes The Ouzell shrills, the Ruddock warbles soft, Redbreast So goodly all agree, with sweet consent, To this dayes merriment. Ah! my deere love, why doe ye sleepe thus long, When meeter were that ye should now awake, T' awayt the comming of your joyous make, And hearken to the birds love learned song. The deawy leaves among! Nor they of toy and pleasance to you sing, That all the woods them answer, and theyr eccho ring

My love is now awake out of her dreames, And her fayre eyes, like stars that dimmed were With darksome cloud, now shew their goodly beams More bright than Hesperus his head doth reru-Come now, ye damzels, daughters of delight, Helpe quickly her to dight But first come ye fayre houres, which were begot In Joves sweet paradice of Day and Night, Which doe the seasons of the yeare allot, And all that e er in this world is favre. Doe make and still repayre And ye three handmayds of the Cypnan Queene, The which doe still adorne her beauties pride, Helpe to addorne my beautifullest bride And, as ye her array, still throw betweene Some graces to be seene. And, as yo use to Venus, to her sing, The whiles the woods shal answer, and your eccho ring

Not is my love all ready forth to come Let all the virgins therefore well awayt And ye fresh boyes, that tend upon her groome, Prepare your selves, for he is comming strayt. Set all your things in scemely good aray, Fit for so joyfull day The joyfulst day that ever sunne did see Faire Sun! show forth thy favourable ray, And let thy lifull heat not fervent be, bledall For feare of burning her sunshyny face, Her beauty to disgrace. O fayrest Phochus! father of the Muse! If ever I did honour thee aright, Or sing the thing that mote thy mind delight, Doe not thy servants sample boone refuse, But let this day, let thir one day, be myne, Let all the rest be thine. Then I thy soveragne prayees loud wil sing, That all the woods shal answer, and theyr eccho ring

Harke! how the Minstrils gin to shrill aloud Their merry Musick that resounds from far, The pipe, the tabor, and the trembling Croud. Fiddle That well agree withouten breach or jar But, most of all, the Damzels doe delite When they their tymbrels smyte, And thereunto doe daunce and carrol sweet, That all the sences they doe ravish quite, The whyles the boyes run up and downe the street, Crying aloud with strong confused noyce, As if it were one voyce, Hymen, 10 Hymen, Hymen, they do shout, That even to the heavens theyr shouting shrill Doth reach, and all the firmament doth fill, To which the people standing all about, As in approvance, doe thereto applaud, And loud advaunce her laud, And evermore the, Hymen, Hymen sing, That al the woods them answer, and theyr eccho ring

Loe! where she comes along with portly pace, Lyke Phobe, from her chamber of the East, Arysing forth to run her mighty race, Clad all in white, that scemes a virgin best. So well it her beseemes, that ye would weene Some angell she had beene Her long loose yellow locks lyke golden wyre, Sprinckled with perle, and perling flowres atweene, Doc lyke a golden mantle her attyre, And, being crowned with a girland greene, Seeme lyl e some mayden Queene. Her modest eyes, abashed to behold So many gazers as on her do stare, Upon the lowly ground affixed are, Ne dare lift up her countenance too bold, But blush to heare her prayses sung so loud, So farre from being proud. Nathlesse doe ye still loud her prayses sing, That all the woods may answer, and your eccho ring

Tell me, ye merchants daughters, did ye see So fayre a creature in your towne before, So sweet, so lovely, and so mild as she, Adornd with beautyes grace and vertues store? Her goodly eyes lyke Saphyres shining bright, Her forchead yvory white, Her checkes lyke apples which the sun hath rudded, Her lips like cherryes charming men to byte, Her brest like to a bowle of creame uncrudded, Her paps lyke lyllies budded, Her snowie necke lyke to a marble towre, And all her body like a pallace fayre, Ascending up, with many a stately stayre, To honors seat and chastities sweet bowre. Why stand ye still, ye virgins, in amaze, Upon her so to gaze, Whiles ye forget your former lay to sing, To which the woods did answer, and your eccho ring?

But if ye saw that which no eyes can see,
The inward beauty of her lively spright,
Garnisht with heavenly guifts of high degree,
Much more then would ye wonder at that sight,
And stand astonisht lyke to those which red
Medusaes mazeful hed
There dwels sweet love, and constant chastity,
Unspotted fayth, and comely womanhood,
Regard of honour, and mild modesty,

There vertue raynes as Queene in royal throne,
And giveth lawes alone,
The which the base affections doe obay,
And yeeld theyr services unto her will,
Ne thought of thing uncomely ever may Thereto approch to tempt her mind to ill.
Had ye once seene these her celestial threasures,
And unrevealed pleasures,
Then would ye wonder, and her prayses sing,
That al the woods should answer, and your eccho ring

The New of the Present State of Ireland, 'discoursed by way of a dialogue betweene Eudoxus and Irenæus,' begins thus

Eudox But yf that countrey of Ireland, whence you lately came, be see goodly and commodious a soyle, as ye report, I wonder that noe course is taken for the tourning thereof to good uses, and reducing of that savadge nation to better government and civilitye.

Iren Marry, soe there have beene divers good plottes devised, and wise counsells cast alleready about reformation of that realme, but they say, it is the fatall desteny of that land, that noe purposes, whatsoever are meant for her good, will prosper or take good effect, which whether it proceede from the very Genius of the soyle, or influence of the starres, or that Allmighty God hath not yet appointed the time of her reformation, or that he reserveth her in this unquiett state still for some secrett scourdge, which shall by her come unto England, it is hard to be knowen, but yet much to be feared

Spenser expounds at some length the melancholy fact that the earliest English settlers in Ireland became Hibernis ipsis Hiberniores

Iren The cheifest abuses which are nowe in that realme, are growen from the English that were, but are nowe much more lawless and licentious then the very wild Irish soe that as much care as was then by them had to reforme the Irish, soe much and more must nowe be used to reform them, soe much time doth alter the manners of men

Eudox That seemeth very straunge which you say, that men should soe much degenerate from theyr first natures as to growe wilde

Iren Soe much can libertye and ill example doe.

Eudox What libertye had the English there, more then they had heere at home? Were not the lawes plaunted amongest them at the first, and had not they governours to courbe and keepe them still in awe and obedience?

Iren They had, but it was, for the most part, such as did more hurte then good, for they had governours for the most part of themselves, and commonly out of the two howses of the Geraldins and the Butlers both ad versaryes and corryvalls one agaynst the other though, for the most parte, they were but as deputyes under some of the King of Englandes sonnes, brethren, or other neere kinsemen, whoe were the Kinges lieu tenauntes, yet they swayed soe much, as they had all the rule, and the others but the title Of which Butlers and Geraldins, albeit (I must confess) theye were very brave and woorthye men, as also of other the Peeres of that realme, made Lord Deputyes and Lord Justices at sundry times, yet thorough greatnes of their late conquests and seignories they grewe insolent, and bent both that regall authoritye, and also theyr private powers, one agaynst

another, to the utter subversion of themselves, and strengthening of the Irish agayne This ye may see playnly discovered by a letter written from the cittizens of Corl e out of Ireland, to the I arle of Shrewsbury then in England, and remayning yet upon record, both in the Foure of London, and also amongest the Chronicles of Wherein it is by thein complained, that the Irclan.i English Lords and Gentlemen, who then had great pos essions in Ircland, beganne, through pride and insolutione, to make private warres one against another, and when either parte was weake they would wage and dray e in the Irish to take theyr parte, by which meanes they both greatlie encouraged and enabled the Irish, which till that time had bene shutt up within the Moun tayne of Slewloghir, and weakened and disabled them selves, insoemuch that theyr revenues were wonderfully impayred, and some of them, which are there reckoned to have bene able to have spent 12 or 13 hundred poundes per annum, of old rent, (that I may say noe more) besides they commodities of creekes and havens. were nowe scarce able to dispend the third part which disorder, an other huge calamitye came upon them, as that, they are nowe growen to be allmost as lewde as the Irish I meane of such English as were planted above toward the West, for the English Pale hath preserved it self, through neereness of their state, in reasonable civilitye, but the rest which dwell above Consught and in Mounster, which is the sweetest soyle of Ireland, and some in Leinster and Ulster, are degenerate, and growen to be as very patchockes [clowns, boors] as the wild Irish, yea and some of them have quite shaken of theyr English names, and put on Irish that they might be alltogither Irish

Yet, though taking a somewhat pessimist view of Irish polity and Irish character in these distracted times, Spenser, as Irenaus, says

I have heard some greate warriours say that, in all the services which they had seene abroide in forrayne countreys, they never sawe a more comely horseman then the Irish man, nor that cometh on more bravely in his charge neither is his manner of mounting unseemely, though he wante stirrops, but more ready then with stirrops, for in his getting up his horse is still going wherby he gayneth way

And when Eudovus asks about the bards fell me (I pray you) have they any arte in theyr compositions? or be they any thing wittye or well savoured, as Poems should be? [Ireneus answers.]

Yea truly, I have caused diverse of them to be trans lated unto me that I might understand them, and surely they savoured of sweete with and good invention, but skilled not of the goodly ornamentes of Poetrye yet were they sprinckled with some prety flowers of theyr owne naturall devise, which gave good grace and combiness unto them.

For dates of the first publication of Spenser's separate works have been given in the coarse of the narrative. The Faeric Queene was completed in the books in 1.96, the earliest edition in folio i that of 1600. Spen er's withis were first collected in 1611 and 2, annual 17 with a late. During the last two conturnes the editions lave been innumerable after Clobe edition (1393) is the most comparation, Dr. Grosaits (10 vols. 1232-24) the most copious. The Lewing ray by of Spenser 1 still that published by Dean K. W. Church in 1372.

Sir Walter Raleigh was one of the mos bulliant and heroic of the great men who adorned the reign of Elizabeth Ralegh, Rauleygh, and Rauley, other spellings used by himself, show how the name was pronounced. He was born in 1552, at Hayes manor, near Sidmouth in Devon of an ancient family, and from his youth wa distinguished by great intellectual acuteness, bu still more by a restless and adventurous dispo Having studied awhile at Oriel College Oxford, he became a soldier at seventeen, fough for the Huguenot cause in the civil wars of France and in 1578 joined a luckless expedition of his half-brother, Sir Humphrey Gilbert, in quest o the 'Unknown Goal' In 1580 he went to Ireland with a hundred soldiers to act against the rebels He took part in the massacre on 10th November of six hundred Spaniards and Italians from the fort of Smerwick, and in all his movements showed vigour and ability and no scruples He remained in Ireland until December 1581, when we find hin receiving £20 for carrying despatches from Colone Zouch to the queen, with the aid of a handsome person and winning address, he soon became a special favourite with Elizabeth The energy dis played in suppressing the rebellion of Desmond brought Raleigh a grant of part of the forfeited property—ultimately extended to 40,000 acres, i would seem, and he had the 'farm of wines' and In 1584 he was a license to export broadcloth knighted, in 1585 he became Lord Warden of the Stannaries and Vice Admiral of Devon and Corn wall, and in 1585-86 he sat in parliament for In 1584 he joined in an adventure for the discovery and settlement of unknown countries With the help of his friends, two ships were sen out in quest of gold mines to that part of North America of which a section still retains the name Virginia, conferred by Queen Elizabeth, but The R deigh himself was not with these vessels commodities brought home by them produced so good a return that the owners were induced to fit out, for the next year, another ficet of seven ships, under the command of Raleigh's cousin Sir Richard Grenville. The attempt made to colonise America proved an utter failure, and after a second trial in 1587 the enterprise was given up The second expedition is said to have been the means of introducing tobacco into England, and also of making known the potato, which was first cultivated on Ralcigh's land in Ireland. On these expeditions he spent £40,000, but acquired a right to be regarded as the first Englishman who seriously aimed at creating a Greater England over-seas, the father of British colonial enterprise. When visiting his Irish estates Raleigh formed

When visiting his Irish estates Raleigh formed or renewed with Spenser an acquaintance which ripened into intimate friendship. He introduced the poet to Elizabeth, and otherwise benefited him by his patronage and encouragement, for which favour Spenser acknowledged his obligation in

Colin Clout's Come Home Igain, where Raleigh is celebrated under the title of the 'Shepherd of the Ocean,' and also in a letter to him, prefixed to the Faerie Queene, explaining the plan ind design of that poem Raleigh's famous tract on the Fight about the Isles of the Azores, which inspired Tennyson's noblest war lyric, appeared in 1591 In 1592 he prepared a new expedition to seize the Spinish treasure-ships, but his doting mistress forbade him to sail with the fleet. Now he fell into disgrace, Elizabeth having discovered his in trigue with one of her maids of honour, Bessy Throgmorton (whom he afterwards married), and Elizabeth sent both culprits to the lower, where Raleigh was confined several months So carly as 1593 R ileigh had contemplated a voyige to Guinna, ind in 1595 he undertook, at his own expense, an expedition to this region, concern ing the riches of which many wonderful talus were then cur-Hc took rent. formal possession of the country in the queen's name, and after coming back to England, he published, in 1596, i Discovery of the Large, Rich, and Beautiful Empire of Gutana-1 work Hume, following the sneering judgments of Raleigh's worst enemies, character used as full of the grossest and most palpable lies that were ever attempted to be imposed on the credulity of mankind' Subsequent explorers of Venezuel (part of Raleigh's 'Gurina') have proved his substantial accuracy In the same year we find him holding a command in the expedition against Cadiz, under the Earl of Essex and Lord Effingham In the successful attack on that town, his bravery as well as prudence, was very conspicuous. In 1597 he was rear admiral in the expedition which sailed under Essex to intercept the Spanish West India fleet, and by capturing Figul, one of the Azores, before the arrival of the commander in chief give great offence to the 1 (1594-1612).

Earl, who considered himself robbed of the glory of the action. A temporary reconciliation was effected, but Raleigh ifterwards heartily joined with Cecil in promoting the downfill of Essex, and was a spectator of his execution from a window in the Armoury. On the accession of James I in March 1603, Raleigh's prosperity was at an end. Cecil naturally promoted his own supporters, Raleigh's friends fell from power, and he himself was deprived of his offices. He may have done and burs indiscreet things at a dinsecrous time. He vas accused of conspiring to de 'trone the king and place the crown on the hend of Arabella tuart, as also Dbring in popery and put England 11 the power of Spain After his arrest, he attempted suicide in the Tower I ried for treason Lefore a commis-Jon comprising Cecil, the Earls of Suffoll and Devon, the Chief Justice, and others, he was condemned to a traitors death on very inadequate evidence, mainly that of Lord Cob him, himself al ready convicted of treason Edward Coke

SIR WALFLR RALEIGH
From the Portrait by Zucharo in the National Portrait Callery

('Coke upon-Littleton'), who was then attorneygeneral, abused Raleigh during the trial in violent and disgraceful terms, bestowing upon him such epithets as viper, damnable atheist, the most vile and execrable traitor that ever lived, monster, and spider of hell! Raleigh defended himself with such temper, acuteness, and eloquence that some even of his enemies were convinced of his innocence, and all parties were ashamed of the judgment pronounced. He was reprieved on the scaffold, his sentence being commuted to perpetual imprisonment, and for six of the twelve and a half years during which he was confined in the Tower his wife was permitted to bear him company. During his imprisonnent he wrote his H story of the World, encouraged b, the sympathy and friendship of Prince Henry

In 1616 Le was liberated through his having projected a second expedition to Guiana, from which the king hoped to derive some profit. His purpose was to colonise the country and work gold mines, and in 1617 a fleet of twelve armed He made vessels sailed under his command formal - but obviously impracticable - promises not to molest the dominions of the King of Spain, for the gold mine he proposed to work was certainly on Spanish territory Storms, disease, descrition, deaths in encountering Spanish hostility (Raleigh's elder son, Walter, being one of the slain), miscrably thwarted the expedition Returning to England, Raleigh landed at Plymouth, and on his way to London was betrayed by his cousin, Sir Lewis Stukeley, and arrested in the king's name. At this time the projected match between Prince Charles and the Infanta of Spain occupied James's attention, and, to propitiate the Spanish Government, he determined that Rileigh should be sacrificed. He damaged his defence before Bacon and a commission by equivocations and contradictory statements, he had many enemies who denounced him as proud, covetous, unscrupulous, it was decided to proceed upon the old sentence of 1603, and Raleigh was accordingly beheaded at Whitehall on the 29th of October 1618 On the scaffold his behaviour was firm and calm, after addressing the people in justification of his character and conduct, he took up the axe, and touching the edge, said with a smile, 'This gives me no fear. It is a sharp and fur medicine to cure me of all my diseases' Having tried how the block fitted his head, he told the executioner that he would give the signal by lifting up his hand, 'and then, fear not, but strike home" He laid himself down, but being re quested to alter the position of his head, said, 'What matter how the head he, so the heart be right?' On the signal being given, the executioner fuled to act promptly, and Raleigh asked, 'Why dost thou not strike? Strike, man" By two strokes received vithout shrinking, the head of that great Englishman was severed from his body

Strange that the two most conspicuous and many-sided Englishmen of their time should both have fallen from fortune so c damitously as Raleigh and Bacon, and in both cases the fall was partly due to inherent faults of temper and character Raleigh was, as Mr Stebbing has said, 'poet, st itesman, courtier, schemer, patriot, soldier, sailor, frecooter, discoverer, colonist, castle builder, historian, philosopher, chemist, prisoner, and visionary' He vas wonderfully gifted, gallant, fearless, enterprising, but he was also in his lifetime the best hated man in England, and though political rancour and envi at his glory grossly evapperated his defects of character, he was aggressivel self-confident, overweeningly ambitions self-seeling and grasping, regardless of others, and at times unscrupulous. The re-ulsion of feeling in his favour that folloaced on his death was partly due to increasing dislike of the king and dynasty, whose victim he was believed to have been. In his poems and books his best characteristics rather than his worse are reflected—his learning, his originality, his energy, his dignity, his masterly command of the mothertongue as of all his tools. He seems to have really written these lines with the snuft of a candle the night before he died

Cowards may fear to die, but courage stout, Rather than live in snuff, will be put out

His works lend no countenance to the tradition that he was an atheist, their devout tone makes it even difficult to believe that he was a sceptic at heart 'Atheist' was long a term of reproach for all freethinkers, but universal rumour makes it certain that his house was a meeting-place for men who at least treated religious questions with a freedom then regarded as eminently suspicious. Marlowe (see pages 326, 350) may have been a member of this coterie, which Parsons the Jesuit called a 'school of Atheism'

The following verses, like several other short poems, are said to have been composed the night before his execution, it seems certain that they were 'found in his Bible in the Gate house at Westminster, 1618'

Lven such is Time, that takes on trust
Our youth, our joys, our all we have,
And pays us but with earth and dust,
Who in the dark and silent grave,
When we have wandered all our ways,
Shuts up the story of our days
But from this earth, this grave, this dust,
My God shall raise me up, I trust.

W R.

While in prison in expectation of death, either on this or the former occasion, he wrote also a tender and affectionate valedictory letter to his wife, of which the following is a portion

You shall receive, my dear wife, my last words in these my last lines, my love I send you, that you may keep when I am dead, and my counsel, that you may remember it when I am no more. I would not with my will present you sorrows, dear Bess, let them go to the grave with me, and be buried in the dust. And seeing that it is not the will of God that I shall see you any more, bear my destruction patiently, and with a heart like yourself.

First, I send you all the thanks which my heart can conceive, or my words express, for your many travails and cares for me, which, though they have not tal en effect as you wished, yet my debt to you is not the less, but pay it I never shall in this world.

Secondly, I beseach you, for the love you bear me living, that you do not hide yourself many days, but by your travails seek to help my miscrable fortunes, and the right of your poor child, your mourning cannot avail me, that am but dust

Remember your poor child for his father's sake, who loved you in his happiest estate. I sued for my life, but, God knows, it was for you and yours that I desired it, for know it, my dear wife, your child is the child of a true man, who, in his own respect, despiseth death, and his mis shapen and ugly forms. I cannot write much—God knows how hardly I steal this time when all sleep—and it is also time for me to separate my thoughts from the world. Beg my dead body, which living was denied you, and either lay it in Sherborne or Exeter Church, by my father and mother 1 I can say no more, time and death calleth me away. The everlasting God, powerful, infinite, and inscrutable God Almighty, who is goodness itself, the true light and life, keep you and yours, and have mercy upon me, and forgive my persecutors and false accusers, and send us to meet in His glorious kingdom. My dear wife, farewell, bless my boy, pray for me, and let my true God hold you both in His arms.

¹ [He was buried in the chancel of St Margarets, Westminster, but his w fe preserved his head in a red leather bag till her death in 1547]

Raleigh's short poems are excellent. He was more a man of action, of roving and adventurous spirit, than of poetic contemplation, but he had a daring and brilliant imagination, with a Shakespearian energy of thought and condensed felicity of expression. His long imprisonment turned his mind inward on itself, and tamed the wild fire of erratic hopes and ambitions Spenser's allusions to his friend's poetical genius are well known, and Raleigh repaid the compliment by his beautiful sonnet on the Faerie Queune One lost poem of Raleigh's, Cynthia, in praise of Queen Elizabeth, was only known through Spenser's mention of it, till part of it was published by Dr Hannah in 1885 There is no doubt that the following beautiful verses are by Raleigh, but some have been claimed for various contemporary writers

On Passions.

Passions are likened best to floods and streams,
The shallow murmur, but the deep are dumb,
So when affections yield discourse, it seems
The bottom is but shallow whence they come.
They that are rich in words, in words discover
That they are poor in that which makes a lover

Wrong not, sweet empress of my heart, The ment of true passion, With thinking that he feels no smart That sues for no compassion,

Since if my plaints serve not to approve
The conquest of thy beauty,
It comes not from excess of love,
But from excess of duty

For knowing that I sue to serve A saint of such perfection, As all desire, but none deserve, A place in her affection,

I rather choose to want relief,
Than venture the revealing,
Where glory recommends the grief,
Despair distrusts the healing

Thus those desires that aim too high For any mortal lover, When reason cannot make them die, Discretion doth them cover Yet when discretion doth bereave
The plaints that they should utter,
Then thy discretion may perceive
That silence is a suitor

Silence in love bewrays more woe
Than words though ne'er so witty,
A beggar that is dumb, you know,
May challenge double pity

Then wrong not, dearest to my heart '
My true though secret passion,
He smarteth most that hides his smart,
And sues for no compassion.

A Vision upon this Conceit of the 'Faerie Queene.'

Methought I saw the grave where Laura lay,
Within that temple where the vestal flame
Was wont to burn, and passing by that way,
To see that buried dust of living fame,
Whose tomb fair Love and fairer Virtue kept,
All suddenly I saw the Fairy Queen,
At whose approach the soul of Petrarch wept,
And from thenceforth those graces were not seen,
For they this Queen attended in whose stead
Oblivion laid him down on Laura's hearse
Hereat the hardest stones were seen to bleed,
And groans of buried ghosts the heavens did pierce,
Where Homer's sprite did tremble all for grief,
And cursed the access of that celestial thief.

Lines prefixed to Gorges' 'Lucan,' 1614.

Had Lucan hid the truth to please the time,

He had been too unworthy of thy pen,
Who never sought nor ever cared to climb
By flattery or seeking worthless men.
For this thou hast been bruised, but yet those scars
Do beautify no less than those wounds do,
Received in just and in religious wars,
Though thou hast bled by both, and bear'st them too.
Change not ' to change thy fortune 'tis too late
Who with a manly faith resolves to die
May promise to himself a lasting state,
Though not so great, yet free from infamy
Such was thy Lucan, whom so to translate, Nature thy muse like Lucan's did create.

The Pilgrimage.

Give me my scallop shell of quiet, My staff of faith to walk upon, My scrip of joy, immortal diet, My bottle of salvation, My gown of glory, hope's true gage, And thus I ll take my pilgrimage! Blood must be my body's balmer, No other balm will there be given. Whilst my soul, like quiet palmer, Travelleth towards the land of Heaven. Over the silver mountains Where spring the nectar fountains There will I kiss The bowl of bliss, And drink mine everlasting fill Upon every milken hill. My soul will be a-dry before,

But after, it will thirst no more.

Then by that happy blissful day, More peaceful pilgrims I shall see, That have east off their rags of clay, And walk apparelled fresh like me. I ll take them first To avench their thirst. And taste of nectar suckets It those clear wells Where sweetness dwells Drawn up by saints in crystal buckets. And when our bottles and all we Are filled with immortality, Then the blest paths we'll travel. Strewed with rubies thick as gravel-Culings of diamonds sapplier floors, High walls of coral and pearly bowers. From thence to heaven's bribeless hall, Where no corrupted voices brawl. No conscience molten into gold No forged accuser bought or sold, No cause deferred, no vain spent journey, For there Christ is the King's Attorney, Who pleads for all without degrees, And He hath angels but no fees, And when the grand twelve million jury Of our sins, with direful fury, 'Gainst our souls black verdicts give, Christ pleads His death, and then we live. Be thou my speaker, taintless pleader, Unblotted lawyer, true proceeder ! Thou giv'st salvation even for alms, Not with a bribed lawyer's pulms. And this is mine eternal plea To Him that made heaven, earth and sea, That since my flesh must die so soon, And want a head to dine next noon, Just at the stroke when my veins start and spread, Set on my soul an everlasting head! Then am I ready, like a palmer fit, To tread those blest paths which before I writ. Of death and judgment, heaven and hell, Who oft doth think, must needs die well.

The Pilgrin age is supposed to have been written by Raleigh in 1603, in the interval between his condemnation and his respite. One of the finest of Raleigh's poems is an epitaph on Sir Philip Sidney, appended to Spenser's Astrophel, and published without signature, but quoted as Raleigh's, in 1591 We give the first three of the fifteen verses. The versincation even more than the elegiac tone suggests a comparison with Tennyson's In Memoriam

On Sir Philip Sidney

To praise the life, or wail thy worthy death,
And want thy wit—thy wit high, pure, divine—
Is far beyond the power of mortal line,
Nor any one bath worth that draweth breath.

Yet rich in zeal (though poor in learning's lore),
And friendly care obscured in secret breast,
And love that envy in thy life suppressed—
Thy dear life done—and death hath doubled more.

And I, that in thy time and living state,
Did only praise thy virtues in my thought,
As one that seeld the rising san hath sought, seldom
With words and tears now sail thy timeless fate.

The 'bold and spirited poem' of The Lie is traced in manuscript to 1593, but first appeared in print in the second edition (1608) of Davison's Poetical Rhapsody. It has been assigned to various authors, but on Raleigh's side there is good evidence besides the internal testimony. Two answers to it, written in Raleigh's lifetime, ascribe it to him, and two manuscript copies of the period of Elizabeth bear the title of Sir IValler Wrawly his Lye

Go, soul, the body's guest,
Upon a thankless arrant,
Fear not to touch the best,
The truth shall be thy warrant
Go, since I needs must die,
And give the world the he.

Say to the court it glows
And shines like rotten wood,
Say to the church it shews
What's good, and doth no good
If church and court reply,
Then give them both the he.

Tell potentates, they live
Acting by others' action,
Not loved unless they give,
Not strong but by a faction
If potentates reply,
Give potentates the he

Tell men of high condition
That manage the estate,
Their purpose is ambition,
Their practice only hate.
And if they once reply,
Then give them all the lie.

Tell them that brave it most,
They beg for more by spending,
Who, in their greatest cost,
Seek nothing but commending
And if they make reply,
Then give them all the lie.

Tell zeal it wants devotion,
Tell love it is but lust,
Tell time it is but motion,
Tell flesh it is but dust,
And wish them not reply,
For thou must give the lice.

Tell age it daily wasteth,
Tell honour how it alters,
Tell beauty how she blasteth,
Tell favour how it falters
And as they shall reply,
Give every one the he.

Tell wit how much it wrangles
In tickle points of niceness,
Tell wisdom she entangles
Herself in over wiseness.
And when they do reply,
Straight give them both the lie-

Tell physic of her boldness. Tell skill it is pretension, Tell charity of coldne.s, Tell law it is contention. And as they do reply, So give them still the lie.

Tell fortune of her blindness. Tell nature of decay, Tell friendship of unkindness, Tell justice of delay And if they will reply. Then give them all the lie.

Tell arts they have no soundness, But vary by esteeming, Tell schools they want profoundness, And stand too much on seeming If arts and schools reply, Give arts and schools the lie.

Tell faith it's fled the city, Tell how the country erreth, Tell manhood shakes off pity, Tell virtue least preserreth And if they do reply, Spare not to give the he is a well known quotation from his Silent Lover During the twelve years of his imprisonment, Sir Walter Raleigh wrote the chief portion of his works, especially the History of the World, of which only a part was finished, the six books comprehending the period from the Creation to the downfall of the Macedonian empire, about 170 BC. This was published in 1614. The acquirements of Raleigh-who, in the words of Hume, 'being educated amidst naval and military enterprises, had surpassed, in the pursuits of literature, even those of the most recluse and sedentary lives'-justly excited much admiration, but, it is to be remembered, the historian was aided by the contributions of his learned friends. Ben Jonson told Drummond that Raleigh 'esteemed more fame than conscience The best wits in England were employed in making his history' Ben himself had 'written a piece to him of the Punic war, which he altered, and set in his book.' According to another contemporary, a still more important helper was Dr Robert Burrel [Burhill or Burghill], rector of Northwold, in the county of Norfolk, who was a great favourite of Sir Walter Raleigh, and had been his chaplain

So when thou hast, as I Commanded thee, done blabbing, Although to give the lie Deserves no less than stabbing, Yet stab at thee who will, No stab the soul can kill

> Where glory recommends the grief Despair disdains the healing-

Walter's History, for criticisms, chronology, and reading Greek and Hebrew authors, was performed by him,' but the design and composition of the work were Raleigh's own The historical lore is now antiquated and useless, the method is wholly that of a compiler, not of a scientific historian, large sections of the history are uninspired and tedious to a degree But a thousand asides and excursuses illustrate Raleigh's genius and powerful personality, and his profound and varied knowledge of men and experience of the world, with a wealth of apt and witty illustrations, give a perennial charm to this most extraordinary product of prison life.

Both in manner and in matter, the History is vastly superior to all the English historical productions which had as yet appeared though frequently clumsy and awkward, and abounding in immensely long and lumbering sentences, is freer than that of any contemporary writer from euphuisms or fantastic conceits, and is usually dignified and often majestic. The preface announces very forcibly the responsibility of rulers, and expressly attacks Henry VIII, and the history everywhere deals severely with the tyranny and injustice of kings James naturally thought it 'too saucy in censuring the acts of kings,' and the book was suppressed for a time. Raleigh's ideal was the benevolent despotism of an oligarchy, he was essentially aristocratic in his attitude towards 'the rabble.' Other writings of Raleigh's captivity were The Prerogative of Parliaments, The Cabinet Council, published by Milton in 1658, and Three Discourses, that on war being one of his most perfect pieces of writing The Aavice to his Son contains much admirable counsel, sometimes tinctured, indeed, with that worldliness and suspicion which the writer's hard experience had strengthened in a mind naturally disposed to self interest. Points on which he advises his son are the choice of friends and of a wife, flattery, quarrels, preservation of estate, choice of servants, the eschewing of evil ways of seeking riches, drunkenness, and the service of God Our first prose extracts are from the History

The Uncertainty of Human Happiness

If we truly examine the difference of both conditions, to wit, of the rich and mighty, whom we call fortunate, and of the poor and oppressed, whom we account wretched, we shall find the happiness of the one and the miserable estate of the other so tied by God to the very instant, and both so subject to interchange (witness the sudden downfall of the greatest princes, and the speedy uprising of the meanest persons), as the one hath nothing so certain, whereof to boast, nor the other so uncertain, whereof to bewail itself. For there is no man so assured of his honour, of his riches, health, or life, but that he may be deprived of either or all the very next hour or day to come Quad vesper vehat, incertum est 'What the evening will bring with it, it is uncertain' 'And yet ye carnot tell' (south S James) 'what shall be 'All, or the greatest part of the drudgery of Sir I to-morrow To day he is set up, and to-morrow he shall not be found, for he is turned into dust, and his purpose perisheth.' And although the air which compasseth adversity be very obscure, yet therein we better discern God than in that shining light which environeth worldly glory, through which, for the clearness thereof, there is no vanity which escapeth our sight And let adversity seem what it will, to happy men, ridiculous, who make themselves merry at other men's misfortunes, and to tho c under the cross, grievous yet this is true, that for all that is past, to the very instant, the portions remaining are equal to either. For be it that we have lived many years, 'and' (according to Salomon) 'in them all we have rejoiced,' or be it that we have measured the same length of days, and therein have evermore sorrowed yet, looking back from our present being, we find both the one and the other, to wit the joy and the woe, sailed out of sight, and death, which doth pursue us and hold us in chace from our infancy, hath gathered it Que juid atatis retro est mors tenet 'Whatsoever of our age is past, death holds it' So as whosoever he be to whom I ortune hath been a servant and the Time a friend, let him but take the account of his memory (for we have no other keeper of our pleasures past), and truly examine what it hath reserved, either of Beauty and Youth, or foregone delights, what it hath saved, that it might last, of his dearest affections, or of whatever else the amorous Spring time gave his thoughts of content ment, then unvaluable, and he shall find that all the Art which his elder years have, can draw no other vapour out of these dissolutions, than heavy, secret, and sad sighs He shall find nothing remaining but those sorrows which grow up after our fast springing youth, overtake it when it is at a stand, and overtop it utterly when it begins to wither insomuch as looking back from the very instant time and from our now being, the poor, diseased, and captive creature hath as little sense of all his former miscrics and pains, as he that is most blessed in common Opinion hath of his forepast pleasures and delights. For whatsoever is east behind us is just nothing, and what is to come, deceitful hope hath it Отта дих entura sunt in incerto jacent. Only those few black Swans I must except, who, having had the grace to value worldly vanities at no more than their own price, do, by retaining the comfortable memory of a well acted life, behold death without dread, and the grave without fear, and embrice both, as necessary guides to endless glory

(From the Preface to the History)

The Battle of Thermopylæ

After such time as Xerxes had transported his army over the Hellespont, and landed in Thrace (leaving the description of his passage along that Coast, and how the River of Lissus was drunk dry by his multitudes, and the Lake near to Pissyrus by his cattel, with other accidents in his marches tov ards Greece), I will speak of the encounters he had, and the shameful and incredible overthrows which he received. As first at Thermopyle, a narrow passage of half an acre of ground lying be ween the mountains which divide Thesaly from Greece, where sometime the Phocians had raised a will with gates, which is then for the most part ruined At the entrane Leonidas one of the lings of Sparta, with three hundred Laced emonian, assisted with one thousand lege it and Mantineans, one thousand Arcadians, and other beloponnessins, to the number of three thousand one handred in the v hote, basides one thousand Phoeians, four hundred Thebans, seven hundred Thespians, and all the forces (such as they were) of the bordering Locrians, defended the passage two whole days together against that huge Army of the Persians. The valour of the Greeks appeared so excellent in this defence, that in the first dayes fight Nerves is said to have three times leaped out of his Throne, fearing the destruction of his Army by one handful of those men, whom not long before he had utterly despised, and when the second day's attempt upon the Greeks had proved vain, he was altogether ignorant how to proceed further, and so might have continued, had not a runagate Grecian taught him a secret way, by which part of his Army might ascend the ledge of mountains, and set upon the backs of those who kept the Straits. But when the most valuant of the Persian Army had almost enclosed the small forces of the Greeks, then did I couldrs, King of the Lacedamonians, with his three hundred and seven hundred Thespians, which were all that abode by him, refuse to quit the place which they had undertaken to make good, and with admirable courage not only rusist that world of men which charged them on all sides, but issuing out of their strength, made so great a slaughter of their enemies, that they might well be called vanquishers, though all of them were slain upon the place. Verves, having lost in this last fight, together with twenty thousand other Soldiers and Captains, two of his own brethren, began to doubt what inconvenience might be fall him by the virtue of such as had not been present at these battles, with whom he knew that he shortly was Especially of the Spartans he stood in great to deal fear, whose manhood had appeared singular in this trial, which caused him very carefully to inquire what numbers they could bring into the field. It is reported of Dieneces the Spartan, that when one thought to have terrified him by saying that the flight of the Persian Arrows was so thick as would hide the Sun, he answered thus 'It is very good news, for then shall we fight in the cool shade' (Book in chap. 6)

English Valour and English Cross-bows

All that have read of Cressi and Agincourt will bear me witness, that I do not alledge the Battel of Poictiers for lack of other as good examples of the Linglish Vertue the proof whereof hath left many a hundred better marks in all quarters of France, than ever did the valour of the If any man impute these Victories of ours to the long bow, as carrying farther, piercing more strongly, and quicker of discharge than the I rench Cross bow, my answer is ready that in all these respects, it is also (being drawn with a strong arm) superiour to the Musket, yet is the Musket a weapon of more use. The Gun and the Cross bow are of like force when discharged by a Boy or Woman, as when by a strong man, Weakness, or sickness, or a sore finger, makes the long Bow unservice able. More particularly, I say, that it was the custome of our ancestors to shoot for the most part pointblank, and so shall he perceive that vill note the circumstances of almost any one Battel I his takes away all objection. for when two Armies are within the distance of a Butts length, one flight of Arrows, or two at the most, can be delivered before they close. Neither is it in general true, that the long Bow reacheth farther, or that it pierceth more strongly than the Cross bow But this is the rare effect of an extraordinary arm, whereupon can be grounded no common rule. If any man shall asl, how then came it to pass that the English wan so many great battels, having no advantage to help him? I may, with lest commendation of modesty, refer him to the French Historian, who, relating the victory of our men at Crevant, where they passed a Bridge in face of the Enemy, useth these words 'The English comes with a conquering bravery, as he that was accustomed to gain every where, without any stay, he forceth our guard placed upon the Bridge to keep the passage' [John de Serres] Or I may cite another place of the same Author, where he tells how the Britons, being invaded by Charles the Eighth, king of France, thought it good policy to apparel a Thousand and five Hundred of their own men in English Cassocks, hoping that the very sight of the English red cross would be enough to terrific the French But I will not stand to borrow of the Trench Historians (all which, excepting De Serres and Paulus Lmilius, report wonders of our Nation) the proposition which first I undertook to main tain, That the military virtue of the English, prevailing against all manner of difficulties, ought to be preferred before that of the Romans, which was assisted with all advantages that could be desired. If it be demanded, Why then did not our kings finish the conquest, as Cæsar had done? my answer may be (I hope without offence), that our I mgs were like to the Race of Lacide, of whom the old Poet Ennius gave this note Bellipstentes sunt mage quam sapientipotentes 'They were more war like than politic.' Who so notes their proceedings may find that none of them went to work like a Conquerour, save only King Henry the Fifth, the course of whose victories it pleased God to interrupt by his death

On Ambition and Death.

By this which we have already set down is seen the beginning and end of the three first Monarchies of the World, whereof the Founders and Liceters thought that they could never have ended. That of Rome, which made the fourth, was also at this time almost at the highest. We have left it flourishing in the middle of the Field, having rooted up or cut down all that kept it from the eyes and admiration of the World. But after some continuance, it shall begin to lose the beauty it had, the storms of ambition shall beat her great boughs and branches one against another, her Leaves shall fall off, her Limbs wither, and a rabble of barbarous Nations enter the field, and cut her down

I or the rest, if we seek a reason of the succession and continuance of this boundless ambition in mortal men, we may add to that which hath been already said, that the Kings and Princes of the world have always laid before them the actions, but not the ends, of those great They are always trans Ones which preceded them ported with the glory of the one, but they never mind the misery of the other, till they find the experience in themselves. They neglect the advice of God, while they enjoy life, or hope it, but they follow the counsel of Death upon his fir t approach. It is he that puts into man all the wisdom of the world, without speaking a word, which God, with all the words of his law, promise, or threats, doth not infuse. Death, which hateth and destroyeth man, is believed, God, which hath made him and loves him, is always deferred "I have considered," saith bolomon, all the works that are under the sun, and, behold, all is vanity and vexation of spirit,' but who believes it, till Death tells it us? It was Death which opening the Conscience of Charles the Fifth made him enjoin his Son Philip to restore Navarre, and King Francis the First of France, to command that justice should be done upon the murderers of the Protestants in Merindol and Cabrieres, which till then he neglected. It is therefore Death alone that can suddenly make man to know himself. He tells the proud and insolent that they are but abjects, and humbles them at the instant, makes them cry, complain, and repent, yea even to hate their forepast happiness. He takes the account of the rich, and proves him a beggar, a naked beggar, which hath interest in nothing but in the gravel that fills his mouth. He holds a Glass before the eyes of the most beautiful, and makes them see therein their deformity and rottenness, and they acknowledge it.

O eloquent, just, and mighty Death ' whom none could advise, thou hast perswaded, what none have dared, thou hast done, and whom all the world hath flattered, thou only hast cast out of the world and despised, thou hast drawn together all the far stretched greatness, all the pride, cruelty, and ambition of man, and covered it all over with these two narrow words, Hie jucet'

(Conclusion of the History, Book v chap 1)

The last paragraph is usually accounted its author's most eloquent, just, and mighty utterance. Raleigh's contemporary 'report on the truth of the fight about the Iles of the Azores, this last sommer betwint the Revenge, one of Her Maiestic's Shippes, and an Armida of the King of Spaine,' has acquired new interest from Tennyson's magnificent verse rendering of the story

After the Revenge was intangled with this Philip. foure other boorded her, two on her larboord, and two on her starboord. The fight thus beginning at three of the clocke in the after noone, continued verie terrible all that evening But the great San Philip having received the lower tire of the Revenge, discharged with crosschir shot, shifted hir selfe with all diligence from her sides, utterly misliking hir first entertainment. Some say that the shippe foundred, but wee cannot report it for truth, unlesse we were assured. The Spanish ships were filled with companies of souldiers, in some two hundred besides the Marriners, in some five, in others eight hundreth. In ours there were none at all beside the Marriners, but the servants of the commanders and some fewe voluntarie Gentlemen only After many enter changed voleies of great ordinance and small shot, the Spaniards deliberated to enter the Rev n is and made divers attempts, hoping to force her by the multitudes of their armed souldiers and Musketiers, but were still repulsed againe and againe, and at all times beaten backe, into their owne shippes or into the seas. In the beginning of the fight, the Garge Nob'e of London, having received some shot thorowher by the Armados, fell under the Lee of the Recenge, and asked Syr Richard what he would command him, being lut one of the victulers and of small force. Svr An and bot him save himselfe, and leave him to his fortune. After the fight had thus without intermission continued while the day lasted and some houres of the night, many of our men were slaine and hurt, and one of the great Gallions of the Armada and the Admirall of the Hulkes both surke, and in many other of the Spanish ships great slaughter was made. Some write that Sir Ri Fard vas vene dangerously hurt almost in the beginning of the fight, and late speechlesse for a time ere he recovered But two of the hearings owne companie, brought home in a ship of Lime from the flandes, examined by some of the Lordes, and others, afterned that he was never so wounded as that her forsooke the upper decke, til an houre before midnight, and then being shot into the bodie with a Musket as her was a dressing, was againe shot into the head, and withall his Chirurgion younded to death

Put to return to the fight the Spanish ships which attempted to board the Reing, as they were wounded and beaten of, so alwaies others came in their places. she having never lesse then two mightie Gallions by her sides, and aboard her. So that ere the morning from three of the clocke the day before, there had fifteene severall Armados assauled her, and all so ill approved their entertainment, as they were by the breake of day far more willing to harken to a composition then hastily to make any more assaults or entrics. But as the day encreased, so our men decreased, and as the light grew more and more, by so much more grew our discomforts for none appeared in fight but enemies, saving one small ship called the Pilsrin, commanded by Iacob Il middon, who hovered all night to see the successe but in the morning bearing with the Recense, was hunted like a hare amongst many ravenous houndes, but escapul.

All the posider of the Revence to the last barrell was now spent, all her pikes broken, fortie of her best men slaine, and the most part of the rest hart. In the beginning of the fight she had but one hundreth free fro n sicknes, and fourescore and ten sicke, laid in hold upon the Ballast. A small troupe to man such a ship, and a weake Garrison to resist so mighty an Army those hundred all was sustained, the volets, bourdings, and entrings of fifteene shippes of warre, besides those which best her at large. On the contrarie, the Spanish were alwaies supplied with souldiers brought from everie all maner of Annes and pouder at will. Unto ours there remained no comfort at all, no hope, no supply either of ships, men, or weapons, the mastes all beaten over board, all her tackle cut asunder, her upper worke altogether rased, and in effect evened shee was with the water, but the vene foundation or bottom of a ship, nothing being left over head either for flight Syr Richard finding himselfe in this dis or defence tresse, and unable anic longer to make resistance, having endured in this fifteene houres fight, the assault of fifteene severall Armadoes all by tornes aboorde him, and by estimation eight hundred shot of great artillerie besides manic assaults and entries, and that himselfe and the shippe must needes be possessed by the enemie, who were now all east in a ring round about him, the herenge not able to move one way or other, but as she was moved with the waves and billow of the sea, com manded the muster Gunner, whom he knew to be a most resolute man, to split and sinke the shippe, that thereby nothing might remaine of glone or victoric to the Spiniard, seeing in so manic houres fight, and with so great i Ni ie they were not able to take her, having had fifteene houres time tifteene thousand men, and fiftic and three sule of men of warre to performe it withall. And persuaded the companie, or as manie as he could induce, to yeelde themselves unto God and to the nerce of none els, but as they had like valiant resolute men repul ed to manie enimies, they should not now shorten the honour of their nation, by prolonging their owne lives for a few houres or a few daies. maister Gunner readilite condescended and divers others. but the Captaine and the Maister were of an other opinion, and besought Sir Richard to have care of them alleaging that the Spaniard would be as readie to enter taine a composition, as they were willing to offer the same and that there being diverse sufficient and valunt men yet hving, and whose woundes were not mortall. they might doe their countrie and prince acceptable service hereafter And (that where Sir Richard had alleaged that the Spaniards should never gloric to have taken one shippe of her Maiesties, seeing that they had so long and so notably defended them selves) they answered, that the shippe had sixe foote water in hold, three shot under water which were so weakly stopped, as with the first working of the sea, she must needes sinke, and was besides so crusht and brused, as she could never be removed out of the place

And as the matter was thus in dispute, and Sir Richard refusing to hearken to any of those reasons the maister of the Recenge (while the Captaine wan unto him the greater party) was convoyde aborde the Generall Don Alfonso Bassan Who finding none over hastic to enter the Revenge againe, doubting least S Archard would have blowne them up and himselfe, and perceiv ing by the report of the maister of the Recenge his daungerous disposition yeelded that all their lives should be saved, the companie sent for England, and the better sorte to pay such reasonable ransome as their estate would beare, and in the meane season to be free from Gally or imprisonment. To this he so much the rather condescended as well as I have saide, for feare of further losse and mischiefe to them selves, as also for the desire hee had to recover Sir Richard Grinvile, whom for his notable valure he seemed greatly to honour and admire.

When this answer was returned, and that safetic of life was promised, the common sort being now at the end of their perill, the most drew backe from Sir Richard and the maister Gunner, being no hard matter to diswade men from death to life. The maister Gunner finding him selfe and Sir Aichaid thus prevented and maistered by the greater number, would have slaine himselfe with a sword, had he not beene by force withheld and locked into his Cabben Then the Generall sent manie boates abord the Revenze, and diverse of our men fearing Sir Richards disposition, stole away abound the Generall and other shippes Sir Richard thus overmatched, was sent unto by Alonso Bassan to remove out of the Recenge, the shippe being marvellous unsaverie, filled with bloud and bodies of deade, and wounded men like a slaughter house. Sir Richard answered that he might do with his bodic what he list, for he esteemed it not, and us he was carried out of the shippe he swounded, and reviving againe desired the companie to pray for him Generall used Sir Richard with all humanitic, and left nothing unattempted that tended to his recoverie, highly commending his valour and worthines, and greatly be wuled the daunger wherein he was, beeing unto them a rire spectacle, and a resolution sildome approved, to see one ship turne toward so many enemies, to endure the charge and boording of so many huge Armides, and to resist and repell the assaults and entries of so many souldiers.

Syr Richard died, as it is said, the second or third day aboard the Generall, and was by them greatly bewailed. What became of his bodie, whether it were buried in the sea or on the lande wee know not the comfort that remaineth to his friendes is that he hath ended his life honourably in respect of the reputation wonne to his nation and country, and of the same to his posteritie, and that being dead, he hath not outlived his owne honour

It is not Raleigh that gives the dying sailor's speech, so admirably adapted by Tennyson, but the Dutch traveller Jan Huygen van Linschoten (1563–1611), who at the time of the battle was at Terceira (seventy miles from Flores), on his return voyage from India. He published in Dutch an account of his voyage to and from India immediately after his return, and an English translation appeared in 1598 Mr Arber has printed his account of the engagement along with Raleigh's and Gervase Markham's metrical rendering of it. One paragraph from Linschoten is as follows

He was borne into the ship called the Saint Paule, wherein was the Admirall of the fleet, Don Alouso de Barsan there his woundes were drest by the Spanish Surgeons, but Don Alonso himselfe would neither see him, nor speake with him all the rest of the Captaines and Gentlemen went to visite hym, and to comfort him in his hard fortune, wondring at his courage and stout hart, for that he shewed not any signe of faintnes nor changing of colour But feeling the hower of death to approch, hee spake these wordes in Spanish, and said Here die I Richard Greenfield, with a joyfull and quiet mind, for that I have ended my life as a true soldier ought to do, that hath fought for his countrey, Queene, religion, and honor, whereby my soule most joyfull departeth out of this bodie, and shall alwaies leave behinde it an everlasting fame of a valiant and true soldier, that hath done his dutie, as he was bound to doe. When he had finished these or such other like words, hee gave up the Ghost with great and stout courage, and no man could perceive any true signe of heavinesse in him

An edition of the Works was published at Oxford in 1829, with the Lives by Oldys (1736) and Birch (1751) prefixed. The story of the Revenge we have given substantially as in Mr Arber's reprint (1871) the extracts from the History are from the 1614 edition. Sir E. Brydges edited the poems in 1814, and Hannah in 1835 and there is a bibliography by Brushfield (1836). Recent re earch has proved that many of the poems and prose pieces once attributed to Raleigh are not his. There are Lives by Cayley (1805) Tytler (1833) Mrs Thoinson (1830) Kingsley (Miccellinute 1836), Edwards (1868) St John (1865.) Mrs Creighton (1877) Gosse (1886), Stebbing (1892) and Hume (1868). For Raleigh's trial see Howell's State Trials or H L. Stephen's selection therefrom (1899) and for the atheism attributed to Raleigh Marlowe and others, see the edition of kyd's works by Mr Boas (1900).

John Lyly, author of Euphues and dramatist, was born in the Weald of Kent about 1554. He went to Magdalen College, Oxford, in 1569, and graduated M.A. in 1575, as at Cambridge in 1579. He petitioned Queen Elizabeth in vain that he might be appointed Master of the Revels, but Lord Burghley gave him a post in his household. In 1589 he took part in the Martin Marprelate controversy, and incurred the enmity of Gabriel Harvey, who described him in Pierce's Supererogation (1593) as 'a mad lad as ever twang'd, never troubled with any substance of witt or circumstance of honestie, sometime the fiddle-sticke of Oxford, now the very bable of London.' He was returned for Hindon to parliament in 1589, for Aylesbury in 1593, for Appleby in 1597, and again for Aylesbury in October 1601 The precise date of his death is not known, but he was buried in London on the 30th of November 1606

The first part of Lyly's famous romance, Euphnes, the Anatomy of Wit, was published in the spring of 1579, the second, Euphues and his England, in 1580, and at court both were received with applause. The book went through five editions in six years, and became a sort of textbook for court ladies and people of fashion, who were fascinated by its curious ornate style, comparisons, and conceits, and got its peculiar phrases by heart. In the words of Edward Blount the publisher 'Our Nation are in his debt for a new English which hee taught them Ladies were then his Schollers, And that Beautie in Court which could not Parley Euphueisme was as little regarded as shee which now there speakes not French.' The significance of the fact that Lyly wrote for the women of England has already been touched on at page 239. Lyly renounced the old sources of interest, in enchantments and startling adventures, and relied solely on his style, its alliterations and antitheses, its word-plays and conceits, which have to bear the burden of much moralising and many disquisitions, often quite Another feature of Lyly's 'new English' is the constant employment of similes, drawn from mediæval fables, from bestiaries and herbals, about animals, plants, and minerals It is usual to trace the cuphuistic style to the influence of Guevara. Lord Berners and North had translated works of Guevara (see pages 104 and 259), and other Englishmen also were affected by him. Euphuism was an evaggeration of the style introduced by Sidney from the Italian romancers, Gongorism (from the Spaniard Gongora) and Mannism (from the Italian Manni) were some what analogous later influences in poetry, and Ronsard, the Pleiad, and Du Bartas illustrate the Mr Sidney Lee holds that same tendency Guevara's influence on euphuism has been exaggerated, that pedantic eccentricity was in the air, and might have grown out of Lyly's own natural impulses Greene, Lodge, and others deliberately imitated Euphiues, as will be seen from the specimen given at page 317 of Lodge's Rosalyude, but their affectations were seldom so pronounced as Lyly's, though Lyly is more sober and less tedious than many of his later imitators, the pedants of King James's court. Later the euphuistic style was held up to derision Drayton, who praises Sidney for having put euphuism out of fashion, speaks scornfully of Lilly's writing then in use, Talking of stones, stars, plants, of fishes, flyes, Playing with words and idle similes.

Sidney and, later, Ben Jonson were amongst hostile critics, Shakespeare (Love's Labour's Lost) and Sir Walter Scott caricatured the style, Scott's Sir Piercie Shaiton, meant for a euphuistic hero, Some of the influences of is an extravaganza cuphuism continued in the so called 'metaphysical school' disturbed the standard of English style till the great writers of the seventeenth century, such as Milton, Clarendon, and Barrow, effectively revived dignified simplicity and vigour. But of late the excellences of Lyly have also been recognised, in spite of over ornament, the iteration of antitheses, and consequent tediousness, there is, as Mr Gosse has pointed out, a new element of richness and harmony in Lyly's style, and Euphnes is in England the earliest 'book prose which shows any desire to be splendid. The matter is in many ways excellent, sound advice is offered on friendship, love, travel, education, morals, and religion, in his views on the conduct of life the anti-Puritan pamphleteer was, theoretically at least, a Puritan In the first part of the romance the author places his hero, a young Athenian, in Naples, and in the second part brings him to England, 'his voyage and adventures being mixed with sundry pretty discourses of honest love, the description of the country, the court, and the manners of that

How the lyfe of a young man should be ledde

There are three things which cause perfection in man, Nature, Reason, Use Reason I call discipline, Use, Exercise, if anye one of these braunches want, certeinely the Tree of Vertue must needes wither For Nature without Discipline is of small force, and Discipline without Nature more feeble if exercise or studie be voyd of any of these it avayleth nothing. For as in tilling of the ground and husbandry there is first chosen a fertill soyle, then a cunning sower, then good seede, even so must we com pare Nature to the fatte earth, the expert husbandman to the Schoolemaster, the faculties and sciences to the pure seedes. If this order had not bene in our prede cessors, Pithagoras, Socrates, Plato, and who so ever was renowmed in Gra c, for the glorie of wisedome, they had never hene eternished for wise men, neither canonised as it were for Saincts, among those that studie Sciences. It is therefore a most evident signe of Gods singular favour towards him that is endued with all these qualities without the least of the which man is most iniscrable But it il er be any one that thinketh wit not necessary to the obtaining of wisedome, after he hath gotten the waye to vertue by Industrie and Exercise, he is an Hercticke, in my opinion, touching the true fayth of learning, for if A tture play not hir part, in vaine is labour, and as I said before, if studie be not imployed, in vain is Nature Sloth tour oth the edge of wit, Studie sharpeneth the mindy a thing be it never so easie is harde to the (idle), a thing he it never so hard is casie to the wit well employed. And most playfily we may see in many things the efficience of industric and labour

The lyttle droppe, of rayne pearceth hard Marble, yron with often handling is worne to nothing. Besides this, Industrie she yeth hirselfe in other things, the fertill soyle if it he never tilled, doth waxe barren, and that which is most noble by nature, is made most vyle by neglygence. What tree if it be not topped, beareth any fruite? What Vine if it be not proyned, bringeth foorth Grapes? Is not the strength of the bodye tourned to weakenesse with too much delycacie, were not Milo his armes brawne fallen for want of wrastlyng? Morcover by labour the fierce Unicorne is tamed, the wildest Fawlchon is reclaimed, the greatest bulwarke is sacked. It was well aunswered of that man of Thessalte, who beeing de mounded, who among the Thissalians were reputed most vile, those sayde hee that lyve at quyet and ease, never giving themselves to martiall affaires but what shoulde one use many words in a thing already proved? It is Custome, Use, and Exercise, that bring a young man to Vertue, and Vertue to his perfection. Licurgus the lawgiver of the Spartans did nourish two Whelpes both of one sire and one damme, but after a sundry manner, for the one he framed to hunt, and the other to he alwayes in the chimneyes ende at the porredge pot. Afterward calling the Lacedemonians into one assembly he saide To the atteining of vertue, ve Lacedemonians, Education, Industrie, and Exercise, is the most noblest meanes, the truth of which I will make manifest unto you by tryal, then bringing forth the whelpes, and setting downe there a pot and a Hare, the one ran at the Hare, the other to the porredge pot The Laced momans scarce understanding this mistery, he said. Both of these be of one sire and one damme, but you see how Education altereth Nature.

A Father's Grief

Thou weepest for the death of thy daughter, and I laugh at the folly of the father, for greater vanitie is there in the minde of the mourner then bitternesse in the death of the deceased But shee was amiable, but yet sinful, but she was young and might have lived, but she was mortall and must have dyed I [Ay] but hir youth made thee often merry, I but thine age shold once make thee wise I but hir greene yeares wer unfit for death, I but thy hoary haires should dispyse life. Knowest thou not, Eubulus, that life is the gift of God, death the due of Nature, as we receive the one as a benefite, so must we abide the other of necessitie Wise men have found that by learning which old men should know by experience, that in life ther is nothing sweete, in death The Philosophers accompted it the nothing sowre chiefest felicitie never to be borne, the second soone to dye. And what hath death in it so hard that we should take it so heavily? is it straunge to see that cut off, which by nature is made to be cut? or that melten, which is fit to be melted? or that burnt which is apt to be burnt, or man to passe that is borne to perish? But thou grauntest that she should have dyed, and yet art thou greeved that she is dead. Is the death the better if the life be longer? no trucly For as neither he that singeth most, or prueth longest, or ruleth the sterne oftenest, but he that doth it best deserveth greatest praise, so he, not that hath most yeares but many vertues, nor he that hath graiest haires but greatest goodnes, lyveth longust chicle beauty of life consisteth not in the numbring of many dayes, but in the using of vertuous dooms. Amongst plants those be best estemed that in shortest time bring foorth much fruite. Be not the fairest flowers gathered when they be freshest? the youngest beasts killed for sacrifice bicause they be finest? The measure of life is not length, but honestic, neither do we enter into life to the ende we should set downe the day of our death, but therfore do we live, that we may obey him that made us, and be willing to dye when he shal cal us

(From Eupinies, the Anatomy of Wit)

Continue not in Anger

The sharpe Northeast winde (my good Euphues) doth never last three dayes, tempestes have but a short time, and the more violent the thunder is, the lesse permanent it is. In the like manner it falleth out with the jarres and crossings of friends which, begun in a minuit, are ended in a moment.

Necessary it is that among friends there should bee some overthwarting, but to continue in anger not convenient, the Camill first troubleth the water before he drinke, the Frankensence is burned before it smell, friendes are tryed before they are to be trusted, least shining like the Carbuncle as though they had fire, they be found being touched to be without fire.

Friendshippe should be like the wine which Homer, much commending, calleth Maroneum, whereof one pinte being mingled with five quartes of water, yet it keepeth his old strength and vertue, not to be qualified by any discurtesie. Where salt doth grow nothing els can breede, where friendship is built no offence can harbour (From Euphues and his England)

It should be remembered that, in spite of his mania for over-elaborateness and artificiality, Lyly could and did, even in Euphines, make effective use of the mother-tongue in its pithiest shape. Thus, recurring to the proverbial wisdom of the race, he speaks of standing as though one 'had a flea in his care,' 'Ah! well I wot a new broome sweepeth cleane' shows no trace of Italianisation, nor do 'Always have an eye to the mayne,' 'A burnt childe dreadeth the fire," 'Children and fooles speake true,' 'Cut thy coat according to thy cloth,' 'He that loseth his honestie hath nothing else to lose,' 'It is too late to shutte the stable doore when the steede is stolne," 'Is it not a by word, lyke will to lyke?' 'To run with the hare and holde with the hounde,' and 'Fayre words fat fewe.' This, also from Euphnes, would come home even to the contemporary Philistine 'An Englishman hath three qualityes, he can suffer no partner in his love, no stranger to be his equal, nor to be dared

Lyly's comedies (which were performed before the queen by boys' companies) are more readable than his romance The earliest seems to have been The Woman in the Moone, produced perhaps before 1583 (though not printed till 1597), and was followed by Campaspe and Sapho and Phao (both published in 1584), Endimon (1591), Gallathea and Midas (1592), Mother Bombie (1594 -named from the fortune teller in the play), and Love's Metamorphosis (1601) Except the blank-verse Woman in the Moone, these comedies (on p istoral and mythological subjects) were written in prose, with occasional passages in verse. They display little dramatic power, but handle the old stories cleverly, and, in spite of its inevitable euphuism, the dialogue is frequently pointed and sparkling

Phao Thou art a ferriman, Phao, yet a freeman, possessing for riches content, and for honours quiet. Thy thoughts are no higher than thy fortunes, nor thy desires greater than thy calling Who climbeth, standeth on glasse, and falleth on thorne. Thy hearts thirst is satisfied with thy hands thrift, and thy gentle labours in the day turne to sweete slumbers in the night. As much doth it delight thee to rule thine oare in a calme streame, as it doth Sapho to sway the scepter in her brave court Envi never casteth her eye low, ambition pointeth alwayes upward, and revenge barketh only at Thou farest delicately, if thou have a fare to buy anything Thine angle is readile, when thine oare is idle, and as sweet is the fish which thou gettest in the river as the foule which other buy in the market, thou needest not feare poyson in thy glasse, nor treason in thy The wind is thy greatest enemy, whose might is withstood with pollicie O sweet life, seldome found under a golden covert, often under a thatched cottage!

Hazlitt was a warm admirer of Lyly's Endimion 'I know few things more perfect in characteristic painting,' he remarks, 'than the exclamation of the Phrygian shepherds, who, afruid of betraying the secret of Midas's ears, fancy that "the very reeds bow down as though they listened to their talk," nor more affecting in sentiment than the apos trophe addressed by his friend Eumenides to Endimion, on waking from his long sleep "Behold the twig to which thou laidest down thy head is now become a tree" The Maydes Metamor phosis, an anonymous play, has on no good grounds been assigned to Lyly, except that its lyrics are not unworthy of Lyly—the fairies' song, for example

By the moon we sport and play, With the night begins our day As we dance the dew doth fall, Trip it, little urchins all.
Lightly as the little bee,
Two by two, and three by three,
And about go we, and about go we.

It may have been by John Day, some ascribe it to Daniel.

The delightful songs were first printed in the collective edition of 1632, the best known is—

Cupid and Campaspe

Cupid and my Campaspe playd,
At cardes for kisses, Cupid payd,
He stakes his quiver, bow, and arrows,
His mother's doves, and teeme of sparows,
Loses them too, then downe he throwes
The corrill of his lippe, the rose Growing on's cheek (but none knows how),
With these, the cristall of his brow,
And then the dimple of his chinne,
All these did my Campaspe winne
At last hee set her both his eyes,
Shee won, and Cupid blind did rise
O Love! has shee done this to thee?
What shall (alas!) become of mee?

Song from 'Sapho and Phao'

O cruell Love! on thee I lay My curse, which shall strike blinde the day, Never may sleepe with velvet hand Charme thine eyes with sacred wand, Thy jaylours shal be hopes and feares, The prison mates, grones, sighes, and teares, Thy play to weare out wears times, Phantasticke passions, vowes, and rimes, Thy bread bec frownes, thy drinke bee gall, Such as when you Prao call, The bed thou lyest on by despaire, Thy sleepe, fond dreames, thy dreames long care, Hup. (like thy foole) at thy beds head, Mockes thee, till madnesse strike thee dead, As Phao, thou dost mee, with thy proud eves, In thee poore Sapno lives, for thee shee dies

The nightingale song, also from Sapho and Phao, is given in the section on Elizabethan song writers (page 274), where Lyly's importance as a lyrist is recognised

The Lyly of Euphues is such a very pointed contrast to the Anti Martinist pamphleteer that (although we say with Harvey, his antagonist, 'Would God Lilly had always been Euphues and never Papp Hatchett') we give a fragment from Papp with a Hatchett, Lyly's principal contribution to the Martin Marprelate controversy (see page 332)—for, though the authorship has been disputed, it seems to have been his

If Martin will fight Citie fight, wee challenge him at all weapons, from the taylors bodkin to the watchmans browne bil. If a field may be pitcht we are readie if they scratch, wer will bring cattes if scolde, we will bring women if multiplie words, we will bring fooles if they floute, we will bring quippes if dispute the matter, we will bring schollers if they buffet, we will bring fists Deus bone, what a number of we will brings be here! Nay, we will bring Bull to hang them good note and signe of good lucke, three times motion of Bull Motion of Bull? Why, next olde Rosses motion of Bridewell, Buls motion fits them best sequentur tria, in reckoning Bull thrise, methinkes it O bad application, Bad? should presage hanging I doo not thinke there can be a better, than to applie i I naves necke to an halter Martin cannot start, I am his shadowe, one parte of the day before him, another behinde him, I can chalke a knave on his backe thrice a weeke, He let him bloud in the combe

I alle heed, he will pistle thee. Pistle me? Then have I a pestle so to stampe his pistles, that I le beate all his wit to powder. What will the powder of Marins wit be good for? Marie, blose up a dram of it into the nostrels of a good Protestant, it will make him suddee, but if you minister it like Tobacco to a Paritane, it will make him as mad as a Mariin.

Thomas Lodge (15582-1625), poet, dramitist and romance writer, was the son of a Lord Lodge, their names being usually changed Mayor of London, studied at Trinity, Oxford, and i Shakespeare has been censured for anachronisms entered Lincoln's Inn, but took to literature and a wild and rollicking life. He published in 1580 a Defence of Stage Plays in Three Divisions, in reply to Stephen Gosson Gosson rejoined in Plays Confuted in Five Actions, and Lodge rejoined once more. Gosson, who was neither charitable nor careful about evidence, speaks of Lodge as 'hunted by the heavy hand of God, and become little better than a vagrant, looser than liberty,' and he is generally but not certainly identified with the Young Juvenal of Greene's Groats-worth of He tried the army, and joined in an expedition to the Canaries against the Spaniards about 1588, writing on the way his euphuistic romance, Rosalynde Euphues Golden Legacie Published in 1590, this culminating example of Elizabethan romance (see above at page 238) has very many points of resemblance to his friend Greene's Mena phon (of 1589) With Cavendish he sailed to South America in 1591 Glaucus and Scilla, or Scilla's Metamorphosis (1589), a volume of verse, seems to have given Shakespeare the plan of Venus and Adonis Euphues Shadow (1592) was another imitation of Lyly Robin the Divell and William Longbeard were historical romances Phillis (1593), his chief volume of verse, contained forty sonnets and short pieces, and one narra 1 Fig for Monius (1589) consists of tive poem Satyres, Eclogues, and Epistles He further wrote two second rate plays, The Wounds of Civill War (1594) and A Looking Glasse for London and England (1594, in conjunction with Greene), and he also translated Josephus, Seneca, and part of Du A Margarite of America (1596), another euphuistic romance, gives experiences from his second voyage, and was written, he says, 'in those straits christened by Magellan, in which place to the southward, many wondrous isles, many strange fishes, many monstrous Patagons, with drew my senses' From literature as a profession he turned about 1596 to physic, and became a He studied medicine, Wood says, at Catholic Avignon, and practised in London, being much patronised by Roman Catholic families, till his denth by the plague in 1625. Lodge was a very accomplished man. The prose of his romances is elaborate, and they are themselves mostly tedious, but some of his lyrics may fairly rank amongst the finest of the century Of the exquisite verses in Rosalynde Mr Gosse says, 'Nothing so fluent, so opulent, and so melodious had up to that time been known in English verse' It has been pointed out that many of the best closely follow French and Italian models, especially Ronsard and Desportes The Rosalinda contains passages of fine descrip tion, with verses interspersed. From this romantic little tale Shakespeare took the incidents of his As You Like II, following Lodge with remarkable closeness. Most of the personages, except Jacques, Touchstone, and Audrey, are taken strught from Lodge, their names being usually changed in this comedy—such as introducing a lioness and palm tree into his Forest of Arden, but he merely copied Lodge, who has the lion, the myrrh-tree, the fig, the citron, and pomegranate—consistency and credibility not being features of romantic tales of this kind. Rosalynde itself followed the Fale of Sir Gamelyn, sometimes printed as Chaucer's in the Canterbury Tales

Of Rosalynde, in some editions called only Euphues Golden Legacie, Lodge in his dedication to Lord Hunsdon says 'Having with Captaine Clarke made a voyage to the Ilands of Terceras and the Canaries, to beguile the time with Indour I writ this Booke rough and hatcht in the stormes of the Ocean and feathered in the surges of many perillous seas' But the artistic convention is that he had found the 'scrowle' signed by Euphues' own hand, and thus the work begins

There dwelt adioyning to the Cittie of Bourdeaux, a Knight of most honourable parentage whom Fortune had graced with many favours, and nature honoured with sundry exquisite qualities, so beautified with the excellence of both, as it was a question whether Fortune or Nature were more prodigall in disciphering the riches of their bounties Wise hee was, and holding in his head a supreme conceite of pollicie, reaching with Nestor into the depth of all civil government and to make his wise dome more gracious, he had that salem ingenii, and pleasant cloquence that was so highly commended in Ulysses his valour was no lesse then his wit, nor the stroke of his launce no lesse forcible then the sweetnes of his tongue was perswasive for hee was for his courage chosen the principall of all the Knights of Malta. This hardy Knight thus enricht with vertue and honour, sir named sir John of Bourdeaux, having passed the prime of his youth in soundry battels against the Turks, at last (as the day of time hath his course) grew aged his haires were silverhewed, and the map of his age was figured on his forehead Honour sate in the furrowes of his face, and many yeares were portrayd in his wrinckled linia ments, that all men might perceive his glasse was runne, and that nature of necessitie challenged her due. Sir John that with the Phenix knew the terme of his life was now expired, and could with the Swanne discover his end by her songs, having three sonnes by his wife Lineda, the very pride of his forepassed yeares, thought now, seeing death by constraint would compell him to leave them, to bestow upon them such a Legacie as might bewray his love, and increase their insuing amitie Calling therfore these yong Gentlemen before him in the presence of all his fellow Knights of Malta, hee resolved to leave them a memoriall of all his fatherly care, in setting downe a Methode of their brotherly duties. Having therefore death in his lookes to move them to pittie, and teares in his eyes to paint out the depth of his passions, taking his eldest sonne by the hand hee began.

Oh my sonnes, you see that Fate hath set a period of my yeares, and Destinus have determined a finall end of my dayes, the Holme tree wareth awaywarde, for he stoopeth in his height, and my plumes are full of sicke feathers touched with age. I must to my grave that dischargeth al cares, and leave you to the world that increaseth many sorrowes. My silver haires containe great experience, and the number of my yeares have pend downe the subtilities of fortune. Therfore as I leave you some fading pelfe to countercheck povertie, so I will bequeath you infallible precepts that shall leade you unto vertue. First therefore unto thee Saladine the eldest, and therefore the chiefest pillar of my house, wherin should be ingraved as well the excellencie of thy father's quali ties, as the essential forme of his proportion, to thee I give foureteene plough lands, with all my Manou houses and richest plate. Next, unto Fernandine, I bequeath twelve plough lands But unto Rosader the yongest, I give my horse, my armor, and my launce with sixteene plough lands for if the inward thoughts be discovered by outward shadowes, Rosader will exceede you all in bountie and honor Thus (my sonnes) have I parted in your portions the substance of my wealth, wherin if you be as prodigall to spend, as I have beene careful to get, your friends will grieve to see you more wastfull then I was bountifull, and your foes smile that my fall did begin at your excesse. Let mine honour be the glasse of your actions, and the fame of my vertues the load starre to direct the course of your pilgrimage. Time your deeds by my honorable indevors, and shew your selves siens [scions] worthy of so florishing a tree least as the birds Halcyones which exceed in whitenes, I hatch yong ones that exceed in blacknesse

Here we have the family skeleton reproduced in As You Like It And, as in Shakespeare, the rascally elder brother deprives the two younger of their inheritance, forcing the second to become a mere bookworm, and the youngest to be his own foot-boy Further, when the foot-boy becomes rebellious, the new head of the house suborns a 'champion' (Shakespeare's wrestler) to kill him in a pretended trial of skill. And so Rosader (i.e. Orlando) finds opportunity to distinguish himself in the eyes of Rosalynde (indifferently spelt also Rosalynd and Rosalind), the daughter (not of a banished duke, but) of a dispossessed king of France—the parallel being so far complete.

All but one of the following poems are from Rosalynde The love sick Rosader describes his 'sweetheart to the forester, pulling a paper forth of his bosome, wherein he read this'

Rosalinds Description.

Like to the cleare in highest sphere, Where all imperial glorie shines, Of selfe same colours is her haire, Whether unfolded or in twines

Heigh ho, faire Rosalind

Her eyes are Saphires set in snow, Refining heaven by every winke, The gods doe feare when as they glow, And I doe tremble when I thinke.

Heigh ho, would she were mine.

Her checkes are like the blushing cloude That beautifies Aurora's face, Or like the silver crimson shroud That Phabus smiling lookes doth gracu.

Heigh ho, faire Rosalind

Her lips are like to budded roses, Whom rinks of lillies neighbour nigh Within which bounds she balme incloses, Apt to entice a deitie.

Heigh ho, would she were mine.

Her necke is like a stately tower, Where Love himself imprisoned lies, Fo witch for glaunces every houre, From her divine and sacred eies Heigh ho for Kosalind

With orient pearle, with rubic red, With marble white, with saphire blew, Her bodie everyway is fed, Yet soft in touch, and sweete in view Heigh ho, faire Rosalind Nature her selfe her shape admires, The gods are wounded in her sight, And Love forsakes his heavenly fires, And at her eyes his brand doth light. Heigh ho, were she but mine.

Then muse not, nymphs, though I bemone
The absence of faire Rosalind,
Since for her faire there is a fairer none,
Nor for her vertues so divine
Heigh ho, faire Rosalind, Heigh ho, my heart, would God that she were mine

'Smiling to herselfe to thinke of her new entertained passion, and taking out her lute, she warbled out this ditty'

Rosalind's Madrigall.

Love in my bosome, like a bee,

Doth suck his sweete,

Now with his wings he plaies with me,

Now with his feete

Within mine eyes he makes his nest,

His bed amidst my tender breast,

My kisses are his daily feast,

And yet he robs me of my rest

Ah, wanton, will ye?

And if I sleepe, then pearcheth he
With prettie flight,
And make his pillow of my knee,
The live long night
Strike I my lute, he tunes the string,
He musicke plaies if so I sing,
He leads me every loving thing,
Yet cruell he my heart doth sting
Whist, wanton, still ye!

Else I with roses every day
Will whip you hence,
And bind you, when you long to play,
I or your offence.
He shut mine eyes to keepe you in,
He make you first it for your sinne,
He count your power not worth a pinne,
Alas! what hereby shall I winne
If he gainesay me?

What if I beate the wanton boy
With many a rod?
He will repay me with annoy,
Pecause a g xl
Then sit thou safely on my I nee,
And let thy bower my bosome be,
I urke in mine eyes, I like of thee,
O Cup d' so thou I the me,
Spare not, but play thee.

The next is

Rosader's Second Sonetto

Turn I my lookes unto the skies, Love with his arrows wounds mine eies. If so I looke upon the ground, Love then in every flower is found, Search I the shade to flie my paine. He meetes me in the shade again, Want I to walke in secret grove, Even there I meete with sacred love, If so I bathe me in the spring, E'en on the brink I heare him sing. If so I meditate along He will be partner of my mone, If so I mourne, he weepes with me, And where I am, there will be be When as I talke of Rosalind The god from coyness waxeth kind, And seemes in selfe same love to frie, Because he loves as well as I Sweete Rosalind, for pittic sue, For why then, love, I am more true, He if he speede will quickly flie, But in thy love I live and die

And Rosader, 'desirous to discover his woes to the woods, ingraved with his knife on the barke of a myrre tree, this pretie estimate of his mistris perfection'—a second 'sonetto' (of four quatrains, of which this is the first)

Of all chaste birds the phonix doth excell, Of all strong beasts the hon beares the bell, Of all sweet flowers the rose doth sweetest smell, Of all fure maides my Rosalind is fairest

This is from Phillis:

My Phillis hath the morning sunne At first to looke uppon her And Phillis hath morne waking birdes Her maings for to honour My Phillis bath prime feathered flowers That smile when she treades on them, And Phillis both a gallant flocke That leapes since she doth owne them. But Phillis bath so hard a heart (Ah las that she should have it), As yeeldes no mercie to desart Nor grace to those that crave it Sweet sunne when thou lookest on Pray her regard my moane. Sweet birdes when you sing to her To yeeld some pittie wood her Sweet flowers when as she treades on Tell her her beautie deades one. And if in life her love she nill a rec me, Pray her before I die she will come see me.

Lodge's trenchant pumphleteering style will be seen from a single paragraph of his reply to Gosson's Schoole of Abuse

There came to my hands lately a little (woulde God a vittye) pamphelet, baring a fayre face as though it were the schoole of abuse, but being by me advisedly wayed I fynd it the oftscome of imperfections, the writer fuller of wordes than judgement, the matter certainely as ridiculus as serious. Asuredly his mother witte wrought this wonder, the child to disprayse his father, the dogg to byte his mayster for his dainty morcell. But I see (with Senea) that the wrong is to be suffered, since he disprayseth who by costome hath left to speake well, but I meane to be short and teach the Maister what he knoweth not, partly that he may se his owne follie, and partly that I may discharge my promise, both binde me Therefore I would wish the good scholmayster to over looke his abuses againe with me, so shall he see an ocean of informities which begin in his first prinsiple in the disprayse of poetry

An edition of Lodge's works in five vols 4to was published in 1834 for the Hunterian Club, with an introduction by Mr Gosse. Rosalynde, A Fig for Momus, and others of the pieces have been reprinted separately

Thomas Kyd (1558-951), the son of a scrivener, was baptised in a City church on 6th November 1558, and was educated at Merchant Taylors' School Like so many of his contemporaries, he seems to have lived a life of hardship as a literary man. In 1590 he entered the service of a lord-possibly the Earl of Sussex. He was imprisoned in 1593 for sharing in the treasonable and atheistical views of Marlowe, but was appa rently soon released He translated The Housholders Philosophie (1588) from Tasso's Padre di Famiglia, he wrote pamphlet-broadsides describ ing sensational murders of the day, he seems to have written plays on a Seneçah model, and he translated Cornelia (1594) from Garnier, chief of the French Senecans, he probably produced in 1594 a play on Hamlet no longer extant, and possibly was author of the first draft of Titus Andronicus, which we have as Shakespeare remodelled it (see below at Shakespeare, page 360) But his credit depends mainly on his Spanish Fragedy, licensed and performed with much success in 1592, though probably written before 1588 And, as some think, the success of the Spanish Tragedy moved him-alone or with others—to produce a First Part of Jeronimo, a sort of introductory play vastly inferior to the earlier, others are confident this first part, which might be called The Wars of Portugal, is by a wholly different person The Spanish Tragedy was prodigiously popular-there were twelve editions, with alterations and additions, by 1633, and in Dutch and German translations it was It has many merits, it as popular abroad combines the Senecan rhetoric, the style of the Italian renaissance, and the English tradition, it has been called the first living tragedy on a great scale in English, its highly complicated plot being managed with no little dramatic skill, though there are incredibilities, obvious makeshifts, and wooden characters enough And it reeks with blood Besides jealousy, malignity, false accusation, treachery, revenge, and madness, there are two hangings, six other murders or assassinations by stabbing or shooting, and three suicides (two of ladies) enacted on the stage. Horrors and atrocities were largely the staple of the renaissance drama of Italy, and in Kyd's masterpiece we have a typical representation of the horrible that was in Shakespeare's hands to be superseded by the terrible. The Spanish Tragedy has, indeed, some considerable similarity to Titus Andronicus even as we know it, and has several points of resemblance to Shakespeare's Hamlet, as in the rôle of the murdered man's ghost, and the play within a play that brings home their guilt to the guilty and gives opportunity for revenge. On Kyd's share in developing English drama see above at page 241 Webster and Tourneur, later exponents of the Tragedy of Blood, forsook in some respects the Shakespearian mode, to return to Kyd's

The story is quite unhistorical, nor is it known to be based on any other play or tale. It tells of 'the love of Don Horatio for the Spanish princess Bellimperia', his murder by Bellimperia's brother, Don Lorenzo, and his own rival in love, the captive prince of Portugal, Don Balthazar, and the dreadful revenge of Horatio's father, Jeronimo, the Marshal of Spain, by means of a play where the murders supposed to be acted are carried out in reality'

The play is in blank verse, interrupted by irregular rhythms, occasional rhymed verse, and passages of prose, and amid the horrors are brief spells of comedy, grim jokes, and bid puns Jonson was engaged to make additions to the Spanish Tragedy, though he speaks disrespectfully of Kyd's art, and of the popular taste that hankered after plays such as his (see below at When, playing on Kyd's name, he page 406) spoke of 'sporting Kyd and Marlowe's mighty line,' the facetiously inappropriate epithet was unkindly meant. Lamb thought the additions were 'the salt of the old play,' and must have been by 'a more potent spirit than Ben, perhaps Webster' Coleridge thought the additions attributed (wrongly) to Ben were very like Shakespeare.

Thus the hero Jeronimo (or Hieronimo), 'run lunatic' for grief at the loss of his son, maintained method in his madness and mingled reason—and poetry—with his frenzy

Hier Where shall I runne to breath abroad my woes, My woes whose weight hath wearied the earth? Or mine exclaimes that have surcharg'd the Ayre With ceaselesse Plaints for my deceased Sonne The blustring Winds, conspiring with my words, At my lament have moov'd the leafelesse trees, Disroab'd the Meadowes of their flowred greene. Made Mountaines harsh with Spring tide of my teares, And broken through the Brazen gates of Hell. Yet still tormented is my tortured Soule With broken sighes and restelesse passions That winged mount and hovering in the ayre Beat at the windowes of the brightest Heavens Soliciting for justice and revenge But they are plac'd in their Imperiall heights Where countermured with walles of Diamond I find this place impregnable, and they Resist my woes and give my words no way

The following is part of a passage Lamb, on internal evidence alone, thinks must have been by Webster, though there is no evidence that it is not Kyd's own. Schick, on the other hand, says of the whole passage to which it belongs 'The original Spanish Tragedy has certainly many ridiculous passages, but here Kyd is outdone by the interpolator'. Hieronimo still raves

Hier My son! and what's a son? A lump bred up in darkness, and doth serve To balance those light creatures we call women, And at the nine months' end creeps forth to light. What is there yet in a son. To make a father dote, rave, or runne mad? Being borne, it pouts, cries, and breeds teeth What is there yet in a Sonne? He must be fed, be taught to go, and speak. Ay or yet Why might not a man love a Calte as well? Or melt in passion o'er a frisking kid, As for a sonne? Methinkes a young Bacon, Or a fine little smooth Horse colt. Should moove a man as much as doth a Son. For one of these in very little time Will grow to ome good use, whereas a sonne The more he growes in stature and in yeares, The more unsquar'd, unbevelled he appeares, Reckons his Parents among the ranke of Fooles, Strikes cares upon their heads with his mid Ryots, Mal es them looke old before they meet with age, This is a Son, and what a losse were this, Con idered truely! Oh, but my Horatio Grew out of reach of those Insatiate humours He love I his loving Parents He was my comfort, and his Mothers joy, The very arm that did hold up our house-Our hopes were stored up in him. Non- but a damned Murderer could hate him He had not seene the backe of nineteen yeers, When his strong arm unhorst the proud Prince Balthazar, And his great minde, too full of honour, took To mercy that valunt but ignoble Portingale, Well, Heaven is Heaven still! And there is Aemesis, and Furies, And things called whippes, And they sometimes do meet with Murderers They doe not alwayes scape—that's some comfort. Ay, ay, ay, and then time steales on, And stealer, and steales, till violence leapes forth, I ike thunder wrapped in a Ball of fire, And so doth bring confusion to them all.

The closely succeeding passage, also spoken by Hieronimo, and no doubt Kyd's own, has been universally praised, and essays have been written on the allegory contained in it

But if you be importunate to know. The way to him and where to finde him out, Then list to me and He resolve your doubt. There is a path upon your left hand side,. That leadeth from a guilty Conscience,. Unto a Forrest of distrust and feare. A darkesome place, and dangerous to passe,. There shall you meet with melancholy thoughts. Whose palefull humours if you but behold.

It will conduct you to dispaire and death, Whose rockie cliffes when you have once beheld Within a hugie dale of lasting night, That's kindled with the world's iniquities, Doth cast up filthy and detested fumes, Not far from thence where murtherers have built An habitation for their cursed soules. There is a brazen Caldron fixt by Jove In his fell wrath, upon a sulphire flame, Your selves shall find Lorenzo bathing him In boyling Lead and blood of Innocents.

(Also from Act III, sc. xi.)

This dialogue is also set down by Schick as part of a long interpolation

Isabella Deare Hieronimo, come in a doores, Oh seeke not meanes to increase thy sorrow Hier Indeed, Isabella, wee doe nothing here. I doe not crie, ask Pedro and Jaques Not I indeed, wee are very merry, very merry! Isa How? be merry here, be merry here? Is not this the place, and this the very tree. Where my Horatio died, where hee was murdered? Hier Was- Do not say what let her weep it out. This was the tree, I set it of a kirnell. And when our hote Spaine could not let it grow. But that the infant and the humane sappe Began to wither, duely twice a morning Would I be sprinkling it with fountaine water At last it grew and grew, and bore and bore Till at length it grew a gallows, and did bear our son It bore thy fruit and mine O wicked, wicked plant! One knocks within at the door See who knocks there. Ped It is a Painter, sir

Hier I id him come in, and paint some comfort,
For surely ther's none lives but painted comfort
Let him come in, one knowes not what may chance.
God's will that I should set this tree! but even so Masters ungrateful servants rear from nought,
And then they hate them that did bring them up

This is part of another soliloquy of Hicronimo's

But in extreames advantage hath no time, And therefore all times fit not for revenge, Thus therefore will I rest me in unrest, Dissembling quiet in unquietnesse Not seeming that I know their villanics, That my simplicity may make them thinke That ignorantly I will let it slip For Ignorance, I wot and well they know, Remedium malorum iners est Nor ought availes it me to menace them, Who as a wintry Storing upon a Plaine Will beare me downe with their Nobility No, no, Hieronimo, thou must enjoyne Thinceyes to observation and thy tongue To milder speeches than thy spirits affoord, Thy heart to patience and thy hands to rest, Thy cap to curtesic and thy knee to bow, Till to revenge thou know when, where and how

'Evil news fly faster still than good' is a blank verse rendering of the proverb, and 'They reck no laws that meditate revenge,' also from Act 1, might itself be a proverb

The first part of Jeronimo, the Spanick Trigidy, C richa and the Solymin and Persida will be found in Hashits Distilly, there is a separate edition of the Spanin Trigidy by Professor, Schick of Munich (1858) and in 1901 kyds works were edited for the Clarendon Press by Mr F S. Boas who in New Light on Marlowe and Kyd in Fortingally, February 1859, discussed kyds theological heresy—Unitarianism not Atheism. See also Symonds, Skakespeares Predecessors (1834). Our quotations follow the quarto of 1043.

George Peele, dramatist, was born probably about 1558, went up to Oxford in 1571, and By 1581 he took his master's degree in 1579 had removed to London, where he sought court appointments in vain, for seventeen years lived a roistering Bohemian life as actor, poct, and playwright, and died a discreditable death about 1597-98 He was one of those warned to repentance by Greene in his Groats worth of Wit (see page 326), but had little share in the bitter feuds of his friends and fellow authors. His best work, The Arraignment of Paris (1584), is a dramatic pastoral or masque containing some exquisite verse (in a variety of metres, including blank verse more musical than any yet written) and ingenious flatteries of Elizabeth The following passage, spoken by Diana in Act V, praises both Eliza and her 'Elyzium'-a hardly pardonable pun, yet less extravagant than the concluding compliment to Eliza (also called 'Zabeta') There wons within these pleasant shady woods,

Where neither storm nor sun's distemperature Have power to hurt by crucl heat or cold, Under the climate of the milder heaven, Where seldom lights Jove's angry thunderbolt, For favour of that sovereign earthly peer, Where whistling winds make music mong the trees, har from disturbance of our country gods limid the cypress springs, a gracious nymph, That honours Dian for her chastity, And likes the labours well of Phache's groves, The place Llyzium hight, and of the place Her name that governs there Eliza is, A kingdom that may well compare with mire, An auncient seat of kings, a second Troy, I compass d round with a commodious sea Her people are y cleped Angeli, Or, if I miss, a letter is the most She giveth laws of justice and of peace And on her head, as his her fortune best, She wears a wrenth of laurel, gold, and palm, Her robes of purple and of scarlet dye Her veil of white, is best behts a maid Her auncestors live in the House of Fame She siveth arms of happy victory, and flowers to duck her hous crown'd with gold This peerless nymph, whom heaven and earth beloves, This paragon, this only, this is she, In whom do meet so many gifts in one, On whom our country gods so often gue, In honour of whose name the Muses sing, In stite Queen Juno's peer, for power in arms And virtues of the mind Minerva's mate As the and forely as the Queen of Love, As claste as Dian in her chaste desires The same is she, if Phalae do no wrong To whom this ball in ment doth be on,

Another pastoral play, The Hunting of Cupid (1591), is lost His spirited Farewell to Sir John Norris on his expedition to Portugal (1589, cked out by A Tale of Troy), his Ecloque Gratulatory (1589) to the Earl of Essex, his Polynymma (1590) on the resignation of a Queen's champion, his Speeches for the reception of Queen Elizabeth (1591), and his Honour of the Garter (1593) for an installation of Knights are other occasional The historical play of Edward I (1593) is marred by its biseless slanders against Queen Eleanor, due to the then irrepressible English hatred of all that was Spanish The following noble and eloquent outburst in praise of England is put in the mouth of the Queen mother

Illustrious England, ancient seat of kings, Whose chivalry hath royalised thy fame, That sounding bravely through terrestrial vale, Proclaiming conquests, spoils, and victories, Rings glorious cchoes through the farthest world, What warlike nation, trained in feats of arms, What barbarous people, stubborn, or untained, What climate under the meridian signs, Or frozen zone under his brumal plage, shore Erst have not quaked and trembled at the name Of Britain and her mighty conquerors? Her neighbour realms, as Scotland, Denmark, I rance, Awed with their deeds and jealous of her arm, Have begged defensive and offensive leagues Thus Lurope, rich and mighty in her kings, Hath feared brave England, dreadful in her kings. And now, t' eternise. Albion's champions Equivalent with Trojans ancient same, Comes levely Edward from Jerusalem, Vecring before the wind, ploughing the sea, His stretched cails filled with the breath of men That through the world admires his manliness And, lo, at last arrived in Dover road, Long hanks, your king your glory, and our son With troops of conquering lords and warlike knights, I ike bloody-crested Mars, o'erlooks his host, Higher than all his army by the head Marching alon, as bright as Phobus' eyes!! And we, his mother, shall behold our son, And England's peers shall see their sovereign

The bombastic Battle of Alcazar (1594) was followed by another play now lost. His Old Il rees Tale (1595), a legendary story, part in prose and part in blank verse, afforded Milton a rude outline for his masque of Comus, it has been unkindly criticised by Mr Symonds and Professor Saintsbury, and defended by Mr Bullen, who thinks it the most attractive play after the Arraignment Peole's Scripture drama, The Loce of David and Fair Betnsave, with the Tragedy of Ibsalon, was not printed till 1599. It presents a curious contrast to most contemporary Flizabethan work in virtue of its subject, and though later Milton evidently studied it with interest, the suggestion that Pecle chose a Scripture theme to disarm Puritan pre judice would imply that the playwright wholly misunderstood the nature of that d supproval. For those who abhorred the stage as a frivolous and irreligious pastime, the representation of sacred characters for the public entertainment could only be a hemous aggravation of the offence, and the exhibition of the Shepherd King, the Psalmist who typified Christ, as an unlawful lover was an and scious defiance of a religious prejudice not con fined to the Puritans Some have thought that the play even contains covert allusions, in allegory, to Mary Queen of Scots and the politics of Elizabeth's A miracle play in more modern form, it is rather a dramatised story than a perfect drama, but it lends itself admirably to quotation It used to be highly praised. Campbell called it 'the carliest fountain of pathos and harmony that can be traced in our dramatic poetry,' Charles Lamb disrespectfully thought 'a surfeit' the inevitable consequence of reading much 'of the same stuff,' Mr Bullen condemns it as insipid and cloying, Professor Saintsbury, marvelling at Lamb's faint praise, thinks it 'crammed with beauties' But as Pecle's melodious blank verse lacks variety. so it may be said that his dramatic work, though not without eloquence, grace, and vivacity, lacks power and originality

From David and Bethsabe'

Of I-rael's sweetest singer now I sing, His holy style and happy victories, Whose Muse was dipt in that inspiring dew Archangels stilled from the breath of Jove, Decking her temples with the glorious flowers Heavens rained on tops of Sion and Mount Sinai Upon the bosom of his ivory lute The cherubins and angels had their breasts, And, when his consecrated fingers struck The golden wires of his ravishing harp, He gave alarum to the host of heaven, That, winged with lightning, brake the clouds, and cast Their crystal armour at his conquering feet Of this sweet poet, Jove's musician, And of his beautious son, I prease to sing press Then help, divine Adonu, to conduct Upon the wings of my well tempered verse The hearers' minds above the towers of heaven, And guide them so in this thrice haughty flight, Their mounting feathers scorch not with the fire That none can temper but thy holy hand To thee for succour flies my feeble Muse, And at thy feet her from pen doth use.

After this 'prologus,' Bethsabe and her maid in the bath are watched by David Bethsabe soliloquises after singing

Hot sun, cool fire, tempered with sweet air, Black shade, fair nurse, shadov my white hair Shine, sun, Lurn, fire, breathe, air, and case me, Black shade, fair nur o, shroud me, and please me Shado i, my si cet nurse, 'cep me from burning, Make not my glad cruse cau e of my mourning

Let not my beauty's fire Inflame unstand desire, Nor pierce any bright eye That wandcreth lightly

Come, gentle /cphyr, tricked with those perfumes That erst in Lden sweetened Adam's love,

And stroke my bosom with thy silken fan This shade, sun proof, is yet no proof for thee. Thy body, smoother than this waveless spring. And purer than the sub-tance of the same, Can creep through that his lances cannot pierce Thou and thy sister, soft and sacred Air. Goddess of life, and governess of health, Keeps every fount un fresh and arbour sweet. No brazen gate her passage can repulse. Nor bushy thiclet bar thy subtle breath, Then deck thee with thy loose delightsome robes. And on thy wings bring delicate perfumes, To play the wantons with us through the leaves

Then the king soliloquises

What tunes, what words, what looks, what wonders pierce My soul, incensed with a sudden fire? What tree, what shade, what spring, what paradise, Enjoys the beauty of so fair a dame? Fair Eva, placed in perfect happiness, Lending her praise notes to the liberal heavens, Struck with the accents of archangels' tunes, Wrought not more pleasure to her husband's thoughts Than this fair woman's words and notes to mine. May that sweet plain that bears her pleasant weight Be still enamelled with discoloured flowers, That precious fount bear sand of purest gold, And, for the pebble, let the silver streams That pierce earth's bowels to maintain the source, Play upon rubics, sapphires, chrysolites, The brims let be embraced with golden curls Of moss that sleeps with sound the waters make For joy to feed the fount with their recourse, Let all the grass that beautifics her bower Bear manna every morn instead of dew, Or let the dew be sweeter far than that That hangs, like chains of pearl, on Hermon hill, Or balm which trickled from old Aaron's beard

When Bethsabe is persuaded to come to the palace, David again says (to himself)

Now comes my lover tripping like the roe, And brings my longings tangled in her hair To joy her love I'll build a kingly bower, Seated in hearing of a hundred streams, That, for their homage to her sovereign joys, Shall, as the surpents fold into their nests In oblique turning, wind the nimble waves About the circles of her curious walks, And with their murmur summon easeful sleep To lay his golden sceptre on her brows.

Lamb and Pecle's least enthusiastic admirers agree in praising the verse 'Seated in hearing of a hundred streams,' and many other phrases or de-The following episode shows tached passages Peele dealing not unworthily, but in closer dependence on the Scriptural record, with the ethical and religious side of the story

Nathan and David.

Nathan Thus Nathan saith unto his lord the king There were two men both dwellers in one town The one was mighty, and exceeding rich In oven, sheep, and cattle of the field, The other poor, having nor ox, nor calf, Nor other cattle, save one little lamb

Which he had bought and nourshed by the hand, And it grew up, and fed with him and his, And eat and drank as he and his were wont, And in his bosom slept, and was to him As was his daughter or his dearest child. There came a stranger to this wealthy man, And he refused and spared to take his own, Or of his store to dress or make him meat, But took the poor man's sheep [text here is corrupt] And dressed it for this stranger in his house What, tell me, shall be done to him for this? David Now, as the Lord doth live, this wicked man Is judged and shall become the child of death, Fourfold to the poor man shall he restore, That without mercy took his lamb away Nath Thou art the man, and thou hast judged thyself David, thus saith the Lord thy God by me * I thee anointed king in Israel, And saved thee from the tyranny of Saul, Thy master's house I gave thee to possess, His wives unto thy bosom did I give, And Judah and Jerusalem withal, And might, thou know'st, if this had been too small, Have given thee more, Wherefore, then, hast thou gone so far astray, And hast done evil, and sinned in my sight? Urias thou hast killed with the sword, Yea, with the sword of the uncircumcised Thou hast him slain wherefore, from this day forth, The sword shall never go from thee and thine, For thou hast ta'en this Hethite's wife to thee Wherefore, behold, I will,' saith Jacob's God, 'In thine own house sur evil up to thee, Yea, I before thy face will take thy wives, And give them to thy neighbour to possess.' This shall be done to David in the day, That Israel openly may see thy shame Day Nathan, I have, against the Lord I have, Sinned, O, sinned grievously! and, lo, From heaven's throne doth David throw himself, And groan and grovel to the gates of hell. Nath David, stand up thus south the Lord by me 'David the king shall live' For he hath seen The true repentant sorrow of thy heart, But for thou hast in this misdeed of thine Stirred up the enemies of Israel To triumph, and blaspheme the God of Hosts, And say, he set a wicked man to reign

Song from 'The Arraignment of Paris,'

Cnone Fair and fair, and twice so fair,
As fair as any may be,
The fairest shephord on our green,
A love for any lady

The child shall surely die, that erst was born,

His mother's sin, his kingly father's scorn.

Over his loved people and his tribes,—

Paris Fair and fair, and twice so fair,
As fair as any may be,
Thy love is fair for thee alone,
And for no other lady

En. My love is fair, my love is gay, As fresh as bin the flowers in May, And of my love my roundelay, My merry merry merry roundelay, Concludes with Cupid's curse,—
They that do change old love for new,
Pray gods they change for worse!

Both Fair and fair, &c. ' (repeated)

My love can pipe, my love can sing,

My love can many a pretty thing,

And of his lovely praises ring

My merry merry roundelays,

Amen to Cupid's curse,—

They that do change old love for new,

Pray gods they change for worse!

Both Tair and fair, &c.

(repeated)

Mr Bullen believes the attribution to Peele of Str Clyomon and Str Clamydes to be unfounded (see above at page 240), and regards the Merry Jests of George Peele as not all fabulous, though they were, of course, not compiled by him, and are many of them from French originals Other plays, such as Jack Strawe and Chapman's Alphonsus, have been without evidence credited to him.

Polyhymnua describes the ceremonies connected with the retirement from office of an aged Queen's champion, and ends admirably with what is called—

'A Sonnet'

His golden locks Time hath to silver turned—O Time too swift, O swiftness never ceasing!
His youth 'gainst time and age hath ever spurned,
But spurned in vain, youth waneth by increasing!
Beauty, strength, youth, are flowers but fading seen,

His helmet now shall make an hive for bees,
And lovers' sonnets turned to holy psalms,
A man at arms must now serve on his knees,
And feed on prayers, which are Old Age his alms
But, though from court to cottage he depart,
His saint is sure of his unspotted heart

Duty, faith, love, are roots, and ever green

And when he saddest sits in homely cell,

He'll teach his swains this carol for a song—
'Blessed be the hearts that wish my sovereign well,

Cursed be souls that think her any wrong!'
Goddess, allow this aged man his right,
To be your bedesman now that was your knight!

His works were first collected by Dyco (3 vols. 1829-39, reissue with Greene, in 1861) The best edition is by A. H. Bullen (2 vols. 1888). See Symonds 5 Stakspere & Predecessors (1884)

Robert Greene, born at Norwich about 1560, took his B A from St John's College, Cambridge, in 1579 In his Repentance of Robert Greene (1592) he gives a sufficiently graphic sketch of an ill regulated life, about the events of which we know very little 'As there is no steele so stiffe but the stamp will pierce, no flint so harde but the drops of raine will hollowe, so there is no heart so voide of grace or given over to wilfull follie but the mercifull favour of God can modifie. An instance of the like chaunced to my selfe, being a man wholly addicted to all gracelesse indevors, given from my youth to wantonnes, brought up in riot, who as I grew in yeares so I waxed more ripe in ungodlines that I was the mirrour of mischiefe and the very patterne of all prejudiciall actions As early pricks the tree that will prove a thorne. so even in my first yeares I began to followe the filthings of mine owne desires and neither to listen to the wholesome advertisements of my parentes nor bee rulde by the carefull correction of my Mister For being at the Universitie of Cumbridge, I lighted among wags as lewd as myselfe, with whome I consumed the flower of my youth, who drew mee to travell into Italy and Spaine, in which places I sawe and practized such villainie as is abhominable to declare. Thus by their counsaile I sought to furnish myselfe with coine, which I procured by cunning sleights from my Father and my friends, and my Mother pampered me so long, and secretly helped mee to the Oyle of Angels, that I grew thereby prone to all mischiefe, so that becing then conversant with notable Braggarts, boon companions, and ordinary spend thrifts, that prictized sundry superficiall studies, I became as a Sich [scion] grafted into the same stocke, whereby I did absolutely participate of their nature and At my return into England, I ruffeled out in my silks, in the habit of Walcontent, and seemed so discontent that no place would please me to ibide in, nor no vocation cause mee to stay myselfe in, but after I had by degrees proceeded Muster of Arts, I left the Universitie, and away to London, where (after I had continued some short time, and driven myself out of credit with sundry of my freends) I became in Author of Playes and a penner of Love Pamphlets, so that I soone grew timous in that qualitic, that who for that trade browne so ordinary about London as Robin Greene? Yong yet in yeares, though olde in wickedness I began to resolve that there was nothing bad that was profitable, whereupon I grew so rooted in all mischiefe, that I had as great a delight in wickednesse as sundric hath in godlinesse, and as much felicitie I tooke in villainy as others had in honestie -i e thus was the libertic I got in my youth the cause of my licentious living in my age, and beeing the first steppe to hell, I find it now the first let from heaven? There is some ground for hoping that this sad picture, like Gabriel Harvey's malign int amplifications, is somewhat overdrawn. But there is no doubt his life was exceptionally irregular Thus, after squandering his wife's and shimcless tortune, he finally deserted her immediately after their first child was born. But whatever his dissipations, he lost nothing of his literary facility, and it should be noted that his extant works are singularly free from grossness. The significance of Greene and his friends of the 'academic set' is indicated above at page 238. His first 'lovepamphlet, Vamillia or Looking Glasses for the In lies of England, appeared in 1583, and before his death, on and September 1592, he had produced some forty plays, poems, and tales, which were highly popular with all classes. The most notable of his prose works are short tales and romances, interspersed with poetry—as Pandosto. the Trumbh of Time, or the History of Dorastus and Fawnia (1588), remarkable as having furnished Shakespeare with the plot of his Uinter's Tale (see below at Shakespeare), The History of Irbasto, King of Denmark, 1 Pair of Turtle Doves, or the Fragical History of Bellora and Fidelia, Penelope's Web, Menaphon or Camilla's Alarum to Slumbering Luphues, Euphues his Censure to Philautus, &c Most of these were written under the influence of Lyly in his own time Harvey called Greene 'the ape of Euphues' Menaphon (1589), in other respects also one of his most notable works, contains several of Greene's most perfect poems The group of works of which the Farewell to Follie, the Mourning Garment, and Never too Late are representative indicate a resolve to write no more mere loveand to aim at edification, but pamphlets Greene made no reform in his life, and he still carried on his dramatic libours, of which also in his final, more comprchensive, and probably sincere repentance on his deathbed he expressed his ibhorrence. In another scrics of pamphlets he utilised his peculiar and extensive knowledge of all town vices and villainies—as A Notable Discovery of Coosnage, Conny-catching, The Black Bookes Messenger, &c Greene's plays, all published posthumously, arc Orlando I nioso, 1 tragedy, Frier Bacon and Frier Bungay, The Scottish Historie of James the Fourth, slaine at Flodden, entermixed with a pleasant Comedie, pre sented by Oboram, King of Fayeries, Alphonsus, King of Aragon (partly an imitation of Marlowes Tamburlaine), George-a-Greene, the Pinner of Wakefield, and a sort of humorous satirical mystery-play, written in conjunction with Lodge, called A Looling Glass for London and England, but taking its keynote from Jonah's mission to The Tragical Reign of Selimus some-Ninevch time Emperor of the Turks was claimed for Greene by Dr Grosart in his monumental edition of the works, and republished separately in 1898 Amidst a good deal of bombast and extravagance, there is genuine poetry in these plays. The blank verse of Greene approaches that of Marlowe, though less energetic. His imagination was lively and discursive, fond of legendary lore, and filled with In Orlando he classical images and illustrations thus apostrophises the evening star

I airc queene of love, thou mistris of delight, fhou gladsome lampe that waitst on Phaebes traine, Spreading thy kindenes through the jarring Orbes, That in their union pray e thy lasting powers. The comedies have a good deal of boisterous merriment and fireieal humour George a Greene, the Pinner of Wakefield, is founded on in old prose History of George a Greene, of the Robin Hood type, and there was also an old black letter ballad, The Jolly Pinder of Wakefield, with Robin Hood, Searlet, and John, beginning

In Wakefield there lives a jolly pinder, In Wakefield all on a green

George is a shrewd Yorkshireman, who meets with the kings of Scotland and England, Robin Hood, Maid Marian, &c, and who, after various tricks, receives the pardon of King Edwird

And George a Greene, give me thy hand. There is none in Lingland that shall do thee wrong. I ven from my court. I came to see thy selfe,. And now I see that fame speakes nought but trueth.

The following specimen of the simple humour of the play is in a scene between George and his servant

Jenkin He spied Madge and I sit together, he leapt from his horse, laid his hand on his dagger, and began to sweare. Now seeing he had a dagger and I nothing but this twig in my hand, I gave him faire words, and said nothing. He comes to me, and takes me by the bosome. You whoreson slave, said he, hold my horse, and looke he take no colde in his feet. No, marie, shall he, sir, quoth I, He hy my cloake underneath him. I tooke my cloake, spread it all along, and [set] his horse on the midst of it.

Geors. Thou clowne, didst thou set his horse upon the cloake?

fenkin Ay, but mark how I served him. Madge and he were no sooner gone downe into the ditch, but I plucked out my knife cut foure holes in my cloak, ind made his horse stind on the bare ground

True Bacon and Frier Bungay is Greenc's most entertuning comedy. His friers are magicians, but the Brazen Head is destroyed by a mysterious power as soon as it has attained to speech. Bacon forswears magic, and the piece concludes with Broon's clownish man Miles being carried off to hell on the back of one of the devils heretofore wont to cirry out Breon's behests The play was acted in 1591, but may have been produced a year or two earlier. Alfaonius is obviously modelled on Marlowes Jamb irlaine, and, though Greene had at first rediculed the dramatic use of blank verse, very closely copies. Marlowe's style Here and elsewhere the style is visorous but over loaded with imagery. In many respects Greene deserves the title of "Shikespeares predecessor," though he is inferior to Muloue in power and I pression and majesty. Greene could and did combine the comic and the serious in a harmony unapproached by his predecessors, he greatly surpassed Marlowe in creating noble women types. His sympathies are truly English, and he happily utilises various homely English characters.

If Harvey's story is true, Greene's death was in keeping rather with the unrepentant side of his life. He not merely sink into poverty, but was deserted by his friends. Having, it a supper where Nish was a guest, indulged to excess in pickled herrings and Rhenish wine, he contracted a mortal illness, under which he suffered for a month, supported by a poor charitable cordwainer, and he was buried the day after his death (September 1592) in the New Churchyard near Bedlam, the cost of his funeral being 6s. 4d.

On his deathbod Greene wrote a most melancholy tract called A Grouts-worth of Wat, bought rotth a Million of Repentannes, in which he deplores his fate more feelingly than Nish (page 330), earnestly warns his comrades, and gives a mel incholy picture of Elizabethan literary Bohe-The plot of the story (not strictly minnism autobiographical, one must hope) is of in usurer with two sons The first, bred a scholar at the university, denounces usury with such high mighti ness in the presence of his fither's friends that the old money lender then and there cuts off his firstborn with the third of a shilling, bidding him buy a great's worth of wit, and at his death leaves all his wealth to the younger son, a vain fool. Koberto forms the unholy scheme of conspiring with a courtesan to plunder his brother Lucanio, the courtesan does reduce Lucamo to beggary, but Roberto is befooled, has to live by his wits, and by and by is 'famozed' as an 'arch plaimakingpoet'

His companie were lightly the lewdest persons in the land, apt for pillerie, perjurie, forgerie or any villanie. Of these lice knew the easts to cog at Cards, coosin at Dice by these he learned the legerdemaines of nips, foysters, connicatchers, crosbyters, lifts, high Lavvers, and all the rabble of that uncleane generation of vipers and pithily could be paint out their whole coarses of craft. So cunning he was in all critis, as nothing rested in him almost but crattine se. How often the Gentlewoman his wife laboured vaniely to recall him, a kinent able to note but as one given over to all lewdies, he communicated her sorrowful lines among he looke trul that jested at her booteles e laments.

For now when the number of deceites caused Roberts bee hatefull almost to all men his immeasurable drinking had made him the perfect Image of the drops e, as I the lotthsome scoarge of Lust tyrannized in his loves living in extreame poverty and having nothing to pay but chalke which now his Host accepted not for earthin this micerble man lay comfort's self-languishing having but one groat lett (the just proportion of his fathers but one groat lett (the just proportion of his fathers Imagesce), which lasking on he creed. One in it too late, too late to buy write with thee and therefore will I see it I can sell to catclesse youth what I me, I get the forgot to buy.

Here (Gentlemen) breale I off Robertos speech, a hose life in most parts agreeing with mine, found one elfe punishment as I have doone. Heereafter suppose me the said he will, and I will goe on with that hee fromised. Greene will send you now his groutsworth of it, that never showed a mitesworth in his life, and though no man now be by to doe me good, yet ere I die I will by my repentance indevor to doe all men good.

He adds ten moral rules for the guidance of his friends—to set God before their eyes, to oppress no man, to build no house to a neighbours hurt, and then renews his appeal to these, in which he refers specifically to Marlowe (as atheist), to young Juvenal (Lodge, as is usually assumed, though Mr Bullen and Mr Sidney Lee think Nash has a better claim to the distinction), and to a third (presumably Peele) The 'brother' of atheism (doubtless for brocher or broacher) was formerly assumed to be Kett, burnt for heresy at Norwich But as Kett was no atheist but a devout and mystical Unitarian, probably Machiavelli himself is meant. Greene then makes his famous assault on Shakespeare

To those Gentlemen his Quondam acquaintance, that spend their reits in making Plaies, R. G. wisheth a better exercise and wisdome to prevent his extremities.

If wofull experience may moove you (Gentlemen) to beware, or unheard of wretchednes intreate you to take heed, I doubt not but you will looke backe with sorrow on your time past, and endevour with repentance to spend that which is to come. Wonder not (for with thee wil I first begin), thou famous gracer of Tragedians, that Grane, who hath said with thee like the foole in his heart, There is no God, should now give glone unto his greatnesse for penitrating is his power, his hand hes heavie upon me, he hath spoken unto me with a voice of thunder, and I have felt he is a God that can punish chimies Why should thy excellent wit, his gift, be so blinded, that thou shouldst give no glory to the giver? Is it pestilent Machivilian pollicie that thou hast studied? O punish follie! What are his rules but meere confused mockeries, able to extirpate in small time the generation of mankinde For if Sie olo, sie jubio, hold in those that are able to command and if it be lawfull Fas & negas to doe anything that is beneficiall, onely Tyrants should possesse the earth, and they striving to exceeds in tyranny, should each to other bee a slaughter man, till the mightiest outliving all, one stroke were left for Death, that in one age man's life should ende. The I rother of this Diabolicall Atheisme is dead, and in his life had never the felicitie he aimed at but as he began in craft, lived in feare and ended in despaire. Quain inscrutalities sunt Des judicial This murderer of many brethren had his conscience seared like Caine this be trujer of him that gave his life for him inherited the portion of fidas this Apostata perished as ill as fulian and wilt thou, my friend, be his Disciple? Looke unto me, b him perswaded to that libertic, and thou shalt unde it in infernall bon lage. I know ethe least of my dements ment this miserable death, but wittill striving in unst knowne truth, exceedeth al the terrors of my could Deter not (with me) till this last point of extiennitie, for little knowest thou how in the end thou shalt be visited.

With thee I joyne young Jiea all, that byting Satyris, that lastlie with mee together writ a Comedie. Sweete boy, might I advise thee, be advised, and get not many enemies by bitter words inveigh against vaine men, for thou canst do it, no man better, no man so wel thou hast a libertie to reproove all, and none more, for one being spoken to, all are offended, none being blamed no man is injured. Stop shallow water still running, it will rage, tread on a worme and it will turne then blame not schollers vexed with sharpe lines, if they reprove thy too much libertie of reproofe

And thou no lesse deserving then the other two, in some things rarer, in nothing inferiour, driven (as my selfe) to extreame shifts, a little have I to say to thee and were it not an idolatrous oth, I would sweare by sweet S George, thou art unworthie better hap, sith thou dependest on so meane a stay Base minded men al three of you, if by my miserie ye be not warned for unto none of you (like me) sought those burres to cleave those Puppits (I meane) that speake from our mouths, those Anticks garnisht in our colours Is it not strange that I, to whom they all have beene beholding is it not like that you, to whome they all have beene beholding, shall (were ye in that case that I am now) be both at once of them forsaken? Yes, trust them not for there is an upstart Crow, beautified with our feathers, that with his Tygers heart wrapt in a Players hide, supposes he is as well able to bumbast out a blanke verse is the best of you and being an absolute Johannes factitum, is in his owne conceit the onely Shake scene in a countrie. O that I might intreate your rare wits to be imployed in more profitable courses & let those Apes imitate your past excellence, and never more acquaint them with your admired inventions I know the best husband of you all will never prove an Usurer, and the kindest of them all will never proove a kinde nurse yet whilst you may, seeke your better Maisters, for it is pittie men of such rare wits should be subject to the pleasures of such rude groomes.

In this I might insert two more, that both have writ against these buckram Gentlemen but let their owne works serve to witnesse against their owne wickednesse, if they persever to mainteine any more such peasants. For other new commers, I leave them to the mercue of these painted monsters, who (I doubt not) will drive the best minded to despise them for the rest, it skils not though they make a jeast at them

But now returne I agune to you three, knowing my miserie is to you no news and let me heartily intreate you to bee warned by my harmes Delight not (as I have done) in irreligious oaths, for from the blasphemers house a curse shall not depart. Despise drunkennes, which wasteth the wit, and maketh men all equal unto Flie lust, as the deathsman of the soulc, and defile not the Temple of the holy ghost Abhorre those Epicures, whose loose life hath made religion lothsome to your cares and when they sooth you with tearines of Mastership, remember Robert Greene, whome they have so often flattered, perishes now for want of comfort Re member, gentlemen, your lives are like so many lighted Tapers, that are with care delivered to all of you to muntaine these with wind pust wrath may be extin guisht, which drunkennes put out, which negligence let fall for mans time of itselfe is not so short, but it is more shortened by sin. The fire of my light is now at the last snuffe, and the want of wher with to sustaine it, there is no substance left for life to feede on. Trust not then (I beseech yeu) to such veake states for they are as changeable in minde as in many attires my hand is tired, and I am forst to leave where I would begin, for a whole booke cannot contains these wrongs, which I am forst to knit up in some few lines of words

Desirous that, on should live, though himselfe be dying, Robert Greene

The punning allusion to Shakespeare is palpable, the expressions 'tiger's heart,' &c., are a parody on the line in Henry VI, Part Third

O Tiger's heart wrapt in a woman's hide. The Winter's Tale is believed to be one of Shakespeare's late dramas, not written till long after Greene's death, consequently, if this be correct, the unhappy man could not be meaning to denounce the plagiarism of the plot from his tale of Pandosto Some forgotten play of Greene and his friend may have been alluded to, perhaps the old dramas on which Shakespeare constructed his Henry 17, for in one of these also the line 'O tiger's heart,' &c., Shakespeare was certainly indebted to occurs Marlowe. The Groats worth of Wit was published after Greene's death by a brother-dramatist, Henry Chettle, who, in the preface to a subsequent work, his Kind Hartes Dreame (1593), apologised indirectly for the allusion to Shakespeare, and does justice to Shakespearc's character as man and actor and play wright 'I am as sory,' he says, 'as if the originall fault had beene my fault, because myselfe have seene his demeanour no lesse civill than he is exelent in the qualitie he professes, besides divers of worship have reported his up rightnes of dealing, which argues his honesty, and his facetious grace in writing, that aprooves his art.' Another posthumously published tract, The Repentance of Robert Greene, Master of Artes, is probably authentic though it was doubtless 'edited,' and some have denied its genuineness altogether

Greene's plays are important to students of the drama, the pamphlets are full of interest of various kinds, but his literary rank depends mainly on the grace and tenderness of the poetry scattered through his romances

Content.

Sweet are the thoughts that savour of content, The quiet mind is richer than a browne, Sweet are the nights in carclesse slumber spent, The poor estate scorns Fortune's angrie from ne Such sweet content, such mindes, such sleep, such blis Beggers injoy, when princes oft do mis.

The homely house that harbors quiet rest, The cottage that affoords no pride nor care, The meane that 'grees with countrie musick best, The sweet consort of mirth and musicks fare, Obscured life sets downe a type of blis, A minde content both crowne and kingdonie is (From The Firen Il to Folly)

Sephestias Song to her Child.

Weepe not, my wanton, smile upon my knee, When thou art olde, ther's grief enough for thee.

Mother's wagge, pretic boy, Tather's sorrow, father's joy, When thy father first did see Such a boy by him and mee, He was glad, I was woe, Fortune changed made him so, When he left his prettie boy, Last his sorowe, first his joy

The wanton smiled, father went, Mother cried, babie lept, More he crowed, more we cried, Nature could not sorowe hide He must goe, he must kisse Child and mother, babic blisse. For he left his pretty boy, Father's sorowe, father's joy Weepe not, my wanton, smile upon my knee, When thou art olde, ther's grief inough for thee (From Menaphon)

The Shepherd and his Wife

It was neere a thicky shade

That broad leaves of beech had made, Joyning all their tops so me That scarce Phœbus in could pric Where sate the swaine and his wife Sporting in that pleasing life That Coridon commendeth so, All other lives to over go He and she did sit and keepe Flocks of kids and fouldes of sheepe He upon his pipe did play, She tun'd voice unto his lay, And for you might her huswife knowe, Voice did sing and fingers sew, He was young, his coat was greene, With welts of white, seam'd, betweene, Turned over with a flappe That breast and bosom in did wrappe. Skirts side and plighted free, pleated Seemely hanging to his knee A whittle with a silver chape, Cloak was russet and the cape Served for a bonnet oft Io shrowd him from the wet aloft. A leather semp of colour red, With a button on the head, A bottle full of country whigge By the shepherd's side did ligge And in a little bush hard by There the shepheard's dog did lye, Who while his master 'gan to sleepe, Well could watch both kiddes and sheepe, The shepheard was a frolicke swaine, For though his parell was but plaine, Yet doone the Authors soothly say His colour was both fresh and gay, And in their writtes plain discusse, Tairer was not Tityrus, Nor Menalcas, whom they call The alderleefest swaine of all dearest of all 'Secming him was his wife, Both in line and in life, Fair she was as faire might be, Like the ro es on the tree,

Buxsame, blithe, and young, I weene, Beaution, like a Summer's queen For her cheeks were ruddy hued As if lilies were imbrued With drops of bloud, to make the white Please the eye with more delight, Love did lye within her eyes In ambush for some wanton prize A leefer lasse than this had beenc Corydon had never seen Nor was Phillis that faire May Half so gawdy or so gay She wore a chaplet on her head, Her cassocke was of scarlet red, Long and large, as streight as bent, Her middle was both small and gent A necke as white as Whales bone, Compast with a lace of stone, Fine she was, and faire she was, Brighter than the brightest glasse, Such a shepheard's wife as she Was not more in Thessaly

The above description, from The Mourning Garment, is followed by the continuation

Philador, seeing this couple sitting thus lovingly, noted the concord of country amity, and began to conjecture with himself what a sweet kind of life those men use, who were by their birth too low for dignity, and by their fortunes too simple for envy, well, he thought to fall in prattle with them, had not the shepherd taken his pipe in hand, and begun to play, and his wife to sing out, this roundely,

The Shepheard's Wife's Song

Ah, what is love? It is a pretty,thing, As sweet unto a shepheard as a king And sweeter too

For king, have cares that waite upon a crowne, And cares can make the sweetest love to frowne Ah then, ah then,

If countric loves such sweet desires do gaine, What Irdy would not love a shepheard swaine?

His flocks are foulded, he comes home at night, As merry as a king in his delight, rry as a king in his delight,

And merrier too

For kings bethinke them what the State require, Where shepheards carelesse carroll by the fire Ah then, ah then,

If country loves such sweet desires do grine, What lady would not love a shepheard swaine?

He knowth first, then sits as blyth to eate His creame and curds as doth the king his meate, And blyther too

For lings have often feares when they do sup, Where shepheards dread no poyson in their cup

Ah then, ah then
If country lo es such sweet desires do game,
What lady would not love a shepheard swaine?

Upon his couch of straw he sleeps as sound As doth the king upon his hed of downe,

More sounder too For ever cau e kings full oft their sleepe to spill, Where veary sliepherds lie and snort their fill Ah then, ah then, If country loves such sweet desires do gaine, What lady would not love a shepheard swaine?

Thus with his wife he spends the yeare as blyth, As doth the king at every tide or sithe, And blyther too

For kings have warres and broyles to take in hand, When shepheards laugh and love upon the land Ah then, ah then,

If countrie loves such sweet desires do grine, What lady would not love a shepheard swaine?

On the title-page of the later editions of Pandosto we find the fine 'love passion,' of which this is the first part, as given by Dyce

Ah were she pitiful as she is fair,
Or but as mild as she is seeming so,
I hen were my hopes greater than my despair,
Then all the world were heaven, nothing woe
Ah, were her heart relenting as her hand,
That seems to mult even with the mildest touch,
Then knew I where to seat me in a land Under wide heavens, but yet [there is] not such
So as she shews, she seems the budding rose,
Yet sweeter far than is an earthly flower,
Sovereign of beauty, like the spray she grows,
Compass'd she is with thorns and canker'd bower,
Yet were she willing to be pluck'd and worn,
She would be gathered though she grew on thorn

Greene's plays and poems were edited by Alexander Dyce (2 vols. 1831, new ed with Peele in 1 vol 1861) his complete works, with a Life translated from the Russian of Storojenko are included in the Huth Library (15 vols. 1881-80) of Dr A. B Grosart, who also edited a selection from his works, Green Pistures (1894). There is an edition by Mr Churton Collins (2 vols. 1900). Prof A. W Ward reprinted Frier Bicon and Frier Bing 19 in his Old English Drima (1892). We have a (German) Life by Bern hardi (1874) and also a German dissertation on Greene and the Selimins by Hugo Gilbert (kiel, 1899).

Thomas Nash (1567-1601), a keen and copious satirist, was a native of Lowestoft, in Suffolk, and was of St John's College, Cambridge. He travelled in France and Italy, picked up a livelihood we know not how, and died in distress and debt, after a 'life spent in fantasticall satirisme in whose veines heretofore I misspent my spirit and prodi gally conspired against good houres' He became known by his savage denuncration of Puritans, the Marprelate pamphleteers, and in especial of Gabriel Harvey-work begun in the Anatomic of Absurdities (1589), continued in several pamphlets by 'Pasquill of England, Cavaliero,' and renewed from time to time till 1596, in Have with you to Saffron-Walden Pierce Pennilesse his Supplica tion to the Devill (1592) assails the tricks by which men secure wealth - It is an odd olla podrida (not without blasphemy) in which opportunity is found to denounce upstarts and politicians, niggards, prodigils, learned vanity, the pride of merchants' wives, of Spaniards, Italians, Frenchmen, Danes There is an invective against the enemies of poetry, and praise of the poets and authors—of 'immortal Sidney," Silver tongued Smith," Merry Sir Thomas Moore'-a defence of plays, and various more or less relevant 'wittie stories'. The versification of Nash is usually hard and monotonous, though sometimes his inspiration is happy. His masque or comedy of Summers Last Will and Testament (1600, Will Summers being a jester of Henry VIII) is partly in prose, partly in blank verse, but there are some songs in the true Elizabethan manner. Thence comes the line

Time from the brow doth wipe out every stain, and thence too the song beginning with this oftenquoted verse

Spring, the sweete spring, is the yeres pleasant King, Then bloomes eche thing, then maydes daunce in a ring, Cold doeth not sting, the pretty birds doe sing Cuckow, jugge, jugge, pu we, to witta woo

In Pierce Pennilesse, Nash (often spelt Nashe) draws a harrowing picture of the despair of a poor scholar, in verses such as these

Ah, worthlesse wit! to traine me to this woe
Deceitfull artes that nourish discontent!
Ill thrive the follie that bewitcht me so!
Vaine thoughts, adieu! for now I will repent,
And yet my wants perswade me to proceede,
Since none take pitte of a scholler's neede

Forgive me, God, although I curse my birth, And ban the aire wherein I breathe a wretch, Since misery hath daunted all my mirth,

And I am quite undone through promise breach, Oh frends! no frends that then ungently frowne When changing fortune casts us headlong downe

The Astrologicall Prognostication by Adam Fouleweather seems to have been levelled partly against Harvey's two brothers, who were interested in astrology, but makes game of astrology and astrological prognostications in general for their oracular but unmeaning truisms by iteration of such forecasts as that in consequence of an eclipse of the sun 'olde women that can live no longer shall dye for age, and yong men that have usurers to their father shall this yeer have great cause to laugh, for the Devill hath made a decree that after they are once in hell they shall never rise again to trouble their executors' The eclipse also 'foresheweth that manye shall goe soberer into tavernes than they shall come out, and he which drinkes hard and lyes cold shall never dye of the sweat!' On an eclipse of the moon it is to be greatly feared that 'the Danes shall this yeere be greatly given to drinke! Since great floudes are like to ensue through this hiemall distemperature, that diverse men shall be drowned on drie hilles, and fish if they could not swimme were utterly like to perish! and eeles are like to be deare if there are none taken, and plentie of poutes to bee had in all places, especiallie in those coastes and countries where weomen have not their owne willes' 'Sho makers shall prove so proud that they shall refuse the name of souters, and the tailer and the louse are like to fall at martial variance' 'Diverse persons for want of wine or strong drinke shall go to bedde sober against their willes' 'Sea-faring men shall have ill-lucke if either their shippes hit against rockes or sticke in the sandes? But it should be added that Nash's ingenious series of jokes is in idea and method a mere pastiche, with extensions and variations, of Rabelais's Certain, True, and Infallible Pantagruelian Prognostication for the Year that's to Come and Ever and Aye

Nash was an author by profession—careless, jovial, and dissipated—alternating between riotous excess and abject misery, but he was generally in want. In his Pierce Pennilesse he thus paints his situation in 1592

Having spent manie yeres in studying how to live, and lived a long time without money, having tyred my youth with follie, and surfeited my minde with vanitie, I began at length to look backe to repentaunce, and addresse my endeavors to prosperitie. But all in vaine I sate up late and rose early, contended with the colde and conversed with scarcitie, for all my labours turned to losse, my vulgar muse was despised and neglected, my paines not regarded, or slightly rewarded, and I myself (in prime of my best wit) laid open to povertie

Men of art must seek almes of cormorants, and those that deserve best, to be kept under by dunces, who count it a policie to keep them bare, because they should follow their books the better

Yet, though he has a sufficiently high opinion of his worth, he is apparently willing to let himself out to one of these wealthy dunces

Gentles, it is not your lay chronigraphers, that write of nothing but Mayors and sheriefs, and the Deare Yeere and the Great Frost, that can endowe your names with never-dated glory, for they want the wings of choice words to flie to heaven, which wee have, they cannot sweeten a discourse, or wrest admiration from mere reading, as we can, reporting the meanest accident Poetry is the hunny of all flowers, the quintessence of all scyences, the marrowe of witte, and the very phrase of angels how much better is it, then, to have an elegant lawyer to plead ones cause than a stutting townsman, who loseth himselfe in his tale, and dooth nothing but make legs, so much it is better for a nobleman or gentleman to have his honour's story related and his deedes emblazoned by a poet than a cittizen.

For my part, I do challenge no praise of learning to myselfe, yet have I worne a gowne in the university, but this I dare presume, that if any Mæcenas binde mee to him by his bounty, or extend some sound liberalitie to mee worth the speaking of, I will doe him as much honour as any poet of my beardlesse yeares shall in England. Not that I am so confident what I can doe. but that I attribute so much to my thankfull mind above others, which, I am perswaded, would enable me to work miracles. On the contrary side, if I be evill in treated, or sent away with a flea in mine eare, let him looke that I will rayle on him soundly, not for an houre or a day whiles the injury is fresh in my memory, but in some elaborate pollished poem, which I will leave to the world when I am dead, to be a living image to all ages of his beggerly parsimony and ignorant liberalitie and let him not (whatsoever he be) treasure the weight of my words by this book, where I write quicquid in buccam venurel, as fast as my hand can trot, but I have tearmes (if I be vext) laid in steepe in aqua fortis and gunpoy der, that shall rattle through the skyes, and make an earthquake in a pesant's cares

His surcastic temper and his bitter tongue made him quarrel with his friends and patrons, as well as with Puritins and opponents. He was a man of much culture, shows the influence of Aretino and Rabelais, and had a true enthusiasm for real poetic merit, as seen by what he says of Surrey, Spenser, He completed Marlowe's Dido Queen and Sidney of Carthage, and saw it through the press Christes Lares over ferusalim (1593) seemed to imply repentance for his own shortcomings as well as those of his neighbours The Terror of the Night, or a Discourse of Apparitions, is a hack piece of no importance But The Unfortunate Traveller, or the Life of Jack Wilton (1594), is a great departure in realistic fiction, and is regarded as having 'maugurated the novel of England' In 1597 he was imprisoned for the too free satire of affairs of State in a play, never published, called The Isle of Dogs (1597), and was confined for some months

M Jusscrand holds that Jack Wilton is the first notable English pictresque story, well worthy to be named as having anticipated Defoe. Jack Wilton, who had as page cozened many creditors at court, has followed Henry VIII's army to the Low Countries, and before Turney and Turwin (Tournay and Terouenne) leads a gay and dissolute life, se isoned with playful or malicious practical jokes M Jusscrand thinks Shakespeare may have been moved by Jack Wilton to compound in Falstaff characteristics of the hare-brained page and the untidy, boastful, dishonest, chicken livered campfollower described in the following passage

There was a Lord in the campe, let him be a Lord of misrule, if you wil, for he kept a plaine alchouse without welt or gard of anie Ivibush, and solde syder and cheese by pint and by pound to all that came (at that veric name of syder, I can but sigh, there is so much of it in renish wine now a dayes) Wel, Tendit ad sydera rirt is, there great vertue belongs (I can tell you) to a cup of syder, and verte good men have solde it, and at sea it is lqui calestis, but thats neither hecre nor there, if it had no other patrone but this peere of quart pots to authorize it, it were sufficient This great Lord, this worthing Lord, this noble Lord, thought no scorne (Lord have mercy upon us) to have his great velvet breeches larded with the droppings of this daintie liquor, a vet he was an olde servitor, a cavelier of an ancient house, as it might appeare by the armes of his ancestric, drawen very rimiably in chalke, on the in side' of his tent doore

He and no other was the man I cho e out to damne with a levid monyle se device for comming to him on a date, is he was counting his barrels, & setting the price in chalke on the head of everic one of them, I did my dutte veric devoutly, and tolde his alse honor. I had matters of one secrecie to impure unto him, if it pleased him to grant me private audience. With me, young Wilton, quoth he? marie and shalt. Bring us a pin of syder of a fresh tap into the three cups here, wash the pot. So into a back roome he lead mee, where after hee had spit on his finger, and piel t off two or three moats of his olde moth eaten velvet cap, and spunged and wrong all the rumatike drivell from his ill favoured Goates bearde, he budde me declare my minde, and there upon he dranke to me on the same. I up with a long circumstance, alias a cunning shift of the seven teens, & discourst unto him what entire affection I had borne him time out of mind, partly for the high descent and linage from whence he sprung, & partly for the tender care and provident respect he had of poore soldiers, that whereas the vastitie of that place (which afforded them no indifferent supplie of drinke or of victuals) might humble them to some extremity, and so weaken their hands, he youchsafed in his own person to be a victualer to the campe (a rare example of magnificence & honorable curtesie) and diligently provided, that without farre travel, every man might for his money have syder and cheese his bellyfull, nor flid he sell his cheese by the way onely, or his syder by the great, but abast him selfe with his own hands, to take a shoomakers knife (a homely instrument for such a high personage to touch) and cut it out equally like a true justiciarie, in little penny worthes, that it woulde doo a man good for to looke upon So likewise of his syder, the pore man might have his moderate draught of it (as there is a moderation in all things) as well for his doit or his dandiprit, as the rich man for his halfe souse or his denier. Not so much, quoth I, but this tapsters linnen apron, which you weare before you, to protect your apparell from the imperfections of the spigot, most amply bewrais your lowly minde. I speake it with teares, too fewe such humble spirited noble men have we, that will draw drinke in linen aprons. Why you are everie childs felow, any man that comes under the name of a souldier and a good fellowe, you will sitte and beare companie to the last pot, yea, and you take in as good part the homely phrase of mine host, Heeres to you, as if one saluted you by all the titles of your baronie considerations, I saie, which the world suffers to slippe by in the channell of carelesnes, have moved me in ardent zeale of your welfare to forewarne you of some dangers that have beset you & your barrels. name of dangers hee start up, and bounst with his fist on the boord so hard, that his Tapster overhearing him, cried. Anone anone sir, by and by, and came and made a low leg and askt him what he lickt Hee was readie to have striken his Tapster for Interrupting him in attention of this his so much desired relation, but for feare of displeasing me he moderated his furie, and onely sending him for the other fresh pint, wild him looke to the barre, and come when he is cald with a devilles Well, at his earnest importunitic, after I had moistned my lips, to make my lie runne glib to his jour neies end, forward I went as followeth It chrunced me the other night, amongst other pages, to attend where the king with his Lords and many chiefe leaders sate in council, there amongst sundrie serious matters that were debated, and intelligences from the enemy given up, it was privily informed (no villains to these privic in formers) that you, even you that I now speak to, had (O would I had no tongue to tell the rest, by this drink it gricues me so I am not able to repeate it) my dronken Lord redie to hang himself for the end of the ful point, and over my necke he throws himselfe vene lubberly, and intreated me as I was a proper young Gentleman, and ever looft for pleasure at his hands, soone to rid him out of this hell of suspense, & resolve him of the rest, then fell hee on his knees, wrong his handes, and I thinke, on my conscience, wept out all the syder that he had dronke in a weeke before, to move me to have pitic on him, he rose and put his rustic ring on my finger, gave me his greasie purse with that single money that was in it, promised to make mee his heire, & a thousand more favours, if I would expire the miserie of his unspeakable tormenting uncertaintie. I being by nature inclined to Mercie (for indeed I knew two or three good wenches of that name) bad him harden his eares, & not make his eyes abortive before their time, and he should have the inside of my brest turnd outward, heare such a tale as would tempt the utmost strength of life to attend it, and not die in the middest of it Why (quoth I) my selfe, that am but a poore childish welwiller of yours, with the verie thought, that a man of your desert and state, by a number of pesants and varlets should be so miuriously abused in hugger mugger, have [immoderately and lavishly wept] The wheele under our Citie bridge carries not so much water over the city, as my braine hath welled forth gushing streames My eies have bin dronk, outragiously dronke, with giving but ordinary entercourse through their sea circled Islands to my distilling dreamment

It is buzzed in the kings head that you are a secret friend to the enemy, & under pretence of getting a license to furnish the campe with syder and such like provant [provender], you have furnish the enemy, and in emptic barrells sent letters of discoverie, and come innumerable.

I might well have left here, for by this time his white liver had mixt it selfe with the white of his cie, & both were turned upwardes, as if they had offered themselves a fayre white for death to shoote at. The troth was, I was verie loth mine hoste and I should parte to heaven with dry lips, wherefore the best meanes that I could imagine to wake him out of his traunce, was to crie loude in his care, Hough host, whats to pay, will no man looke to the reckning heere? and in plaine veritie, it tooke expected effect, for with the noise he started and bustled, like a man that had beene scared with fyre out of his sleepe, and ranne hastily to his Tapster, and all to be laboured him about the eares, for letting gentlemen call so long and not looke into them.

Oh, quoth he, I am bought and solde for doing my Country such good service as I have done. They are afraid of mee, because my good deedes have brought me into such estimation with the communalty, I see, I see it is not for the lambe to live with the wolfe.

Answere me, quoth he, my wise young Wilton, is it true that I am thus underhand, dead, and buried by these bad tongues?

Nay, quoth I, you shall pardon me, for I have spoken too much alreadic, no definitive sentence of death shall march out of my wel meaning lips, they have but lately suckt milke, and shall they so sodainly change theyr food and seeke after bloud?

Oh but, quoth he, a mans friend is his friend. Fill the other pint Tapster. What sayd the king, did hee believe it when hee heard it? I pray thee say, I sweare to thee by my nobility, none in the worlde shall ever be made privie, that I received anic light of this matter from thee.

That tirme affiance, quoth I, had I in you before, or else I would never have gone so farre over the shooes, to plucke you out of the mire—Not to make many wordes (since you will needs know) the king saies flatly, you are a miser & a snudge, and he never hopt better of you. Nay then (quoth he) questionlesse some planet that loves not syder hath conspired against me. Moreover, which is worse, the king hath vowed to give Furum one hot breakfast, onely with the bungs that hee will plucke out of your barrells. I cannot state at this time to reporte each circumstance that passed, but the only counsell that my long cherished kinde inclination can possibly contrive, is now in your olde daies to be liberall, such victuals or provisions as you have, presently distribute it frankly amongst poore souldiers, I would let them burst their bellies with syder, and bathe in it, before I would runne into my Princes ill opinion for a whole sea The hunter pursuing the beaver for his stones, her bites them off, and leaves them behinde for him to gather up, whereby he lives quiet. If greedic hunters and hungry tel tales pursue you, it is for a little pelfe which you have, cast it behind you, neglect it, let them have it, lest it breed a further inconvenience. Credit my advice you shall finde it propheticall, and thus I have discharged the parte of a poore friend With some few like phrases of ceremonie, Your honors suppliant, & so forth, and Farewel my good youth, I thanke thee and will remember thee, we parted

But the next date I thinke we had a dole of syder, syder in boules, in scuppets, in helmets, & to conclude, if a man would have fild his bootes full, there her might have had it, provant thrust it selfe into poore souldiers pockets whether they would or no We made five peals of shot into the towne together, of nothing but spiggots and faussets of discarded emptie barrels evene underfoote soildiour had a distenanted tunne, as Diegene had his tub to sleepe in, I my selfe got as many con fiscated Tapsters aprons as made me 1 Tent, as bigge as any ordinarie commanders in the field. But in conclusion, my welbeloved Baron of double beere got him humbly on his marybones to the king, and complained hee was olde and striken in yeres, and had here an heire to cast at a dogge, wherefore if it might please his majesty to take his lands into his hands, and allowe him some reasonable pension to live on, hee shoulde bee mervailous wel pleased as for the warres, he was wearie of them, and yet as long as highnes shoulde venture his owne person, hee would not flinch a foot, but make his withered bodie a buckler, to beare off anie blow that should be advanced agaynst him

The king mervailing at this strange alteration of his great marchant of syder (for so hee woulde often plea santly tearme him), with a little further talke bolted out the whole complotment. Then was I pittifully whipt for my holy day lie, although they made themselves merrie with it many a faire winters evening after

The page finds his way to France, where there is war with the Switzers, to Munster, where Jack of Leyden and the Anabaptists are annihilated, and to Italy, where he moves in an atmosphere of poison, arson, intrigue, assassination, torture, execution by roasting and breaking on the wheel, and all manner of crimes of violence, and leads a quite unedifying life. In search of a runaway mistress, he runs into a Jew's shop, by whom he is arrested, and—in accordance with Roman law, we are told—is sold to another Jew, a doctor, to be anatomised at leisure, and the destined victim of this Burke and-Harc adventure describes at length his sensations in the anticipation of a death from which he is rescued by the cunning of an amorous Rom in Ind. of the papal court The story is very loosely put together, and is not wholly a picaresque The episode of the Earl of Surrey and the fair Geraldine is sheer cuphuistic romance (see page 159) there are passages where this odd defender of the Church of England reviles Calvinists and Scots in the style of the anti Puritan pamphlets And there is an enthusiastic panegyric of Aretino, who is thus apostrophised 'Aretino, as long as the world lives thou shalt live - Fully, Virgil, Ovid, Sencea were never such ornaments to Italy as thou hast beene! Throughout, the victims of crime utter at the crisis of their fate elaborate, overstruned, incredible, and unrealistic speeches

The story, so interesting in the history of English literature, was in its time so little of a success that Nash never tried this kind of fiction again last important piece was I enten Stuffe (1599), in praise of red herrings and of Yarmouth, where he had been well received Hc died in 1601

Gabriel Harvey (1545?-1630) was the son of a ropemaker at Saffron Walden-a fact dwelt on in a variety of offensive ways by Greene and Nash in a long and bitter controversy between them and He studied at Cambridge, became a fellow of Pembroke Hall, and subsequently held various posts at Trinity Hall, his election to the Mastership being set aside by a royal mandate From his undergraduate days a distinguished student, he became a fanatical and pedantic classicist, and sought to conform even English verse to Latin inctre, he boasts himself to be the inventor of English hexameters. Spenser's intimate friend-addressed in The Shepherd's Calendar as 'Hobbinol'—he persunded the author of the Taerie Oneone for a time to forbear rhyme in his poetry He was van, arrogant, cross grained, and censo rious, and a large part of his life was occupied with his controversics, especially that named above Greene resented Harvey's criticisms, Harvey re plied, and after Greene's miserable death published to the world all the unpleasant gossip he could and, and this brought Greene's friend Nash into the feud, in which Nash's power of invective ultimately silenced Harvey, who spent his last years in his native town. He printed a number of Latin orations and truitises on rhotono, letters, &c, and his English works, including the letters to ind from Spenser, Harvey's own (poor) sonnets, and his numerous pamphlets, fill three volumes (edited by Dr Grosart in 1884-85)

Martin Marprelate was the nom de guerre of a series of Puritan pamphleteers who bitterly atticked with trenchant historical argument and I

savage personal lampoons Episcopacy, the rites and doctrines disapproved by Puritans, and the official and non official defenders of the Church. Some of the replies were serious, but some of the self constituted defenders of the Church out Martined Martin in Billingsgitte, buffooners, and From 1572 there had been keen conscurrility troversy between the two parties in the Church, of whom Cartwright and Whitgift were the most conspicuous early champions, and Hooker's Eccli siastical Polity was the chief reply on the part of the Church But the form the controversy took in the Marprelate pamphlets-numbering between twenty and thirty-must have vesed and revolted all pious and reverent minds in every party authorship of the several pamphlets, usually anonymous or pseudonymous, remains more or less de-The chief authors on the Puritan side were apparently John Udıll (see page 155), who died in prison. Henry Barrow, a barrister (eve cuted), John Penry, a Welsh clergyman (executed), and Job Throckmorton, a well to do country gentle man, in whose house many of the tracts were printed, even if he did not himself write part of them Perhaps the most notable publication on this side was that called Hay [Have ye] any work for Cooper? named from a London street cry serious Admonition on behalf of the Church issued in his own name by Cooper (Bishop then of Lincoln, afterwards of Winchester) in 1589 should hardly be accounted one of the series, though it fell in the very midst of the controversy, at its height in 1588, 1589, and 1590 Amongst volunteers on the Episcopal side were Lyly and Nash, and the style of their handiwork may be seen from the extract at page 316 from Lyly's Pap with a Hatchett Richard Stanyhurst (1547-1618), one of Holinshed's collaborators, was by Gabriel Harvey praised as his own aptest scholar, in virtue of his rendering (1582) of the first four books of the Encid into English hexameters, on Harvey's pedantic principles. But few save Harvey's set thought Stanyhurst an improvement on Phaer (see page 265) Nash and other contemporary critics had too ample reason for ridiculing and parodying this preposterous achievement, which is not merely awkward, uncouth, and lumbering, but prosaic, and here and there grotesquely mept, and adorned with many monstrous word forms invented for the occasion He also translated some of the Psalms into classical metres, with equal Yet Stanyhurst, who was born in unsuccess Dublin and educated at Oxford, was a really learned man, who wrote much on Irish history, produced a profound Latin commentary on Porphyry, the Neoplatonic mystic, and left some Latin dictional works He was a devout Catholic, and in 1580 settled on the Continent holy orders and died a priest at Brussels

A short specimen of Stanyhurst's Virgil his Eners (the beginning of Book ii) will justify his most uncomplimentary critics

With tentive listning eache wight was setled in harckning

Thus father Æneas chronicled from loftic bed hautie You bid me, O Princesse, to scarrisse a sestered old soare How that the Trojans wear prest by Grecian armie Whose fatal miserie my sight hath witnesed heavie In which sharp bickring my self, as partie, remained What ruter of Dolopans weare so cruel harted in harckning, What curst Myrmidones, what karne of canchred Ulysses, What void of al weeping could eare so mortal an hazard? And now with moisture the night from welkin is hastning And stars too slumber dooe stur mens natural humours. How be it (Princely Regent) if that thy affection earnest Thy mind enflameth too learne our fatal aventures, Thee toyls of Trojans, and last infortunat affray Though my queazy stomack that bloodie recital abhorreth, And tears with trilling shall baine my phisnomie deepely Yet thine hoat affected desire shall gain the rehersal

The Greekish captains with wars and destinie mated, Fetching from Pallas soom wise celestial engin, Fram'd a steede of timber, steaming like mounten in hudgnesse

A vow for passadge they fainde and brute so reported In this hudge ambry they ram'd a number of hardie Tough knights, thick farcing thee ribs with clustered armour

Though at first sight it may seem impossible it will be found that a little violence in misplacing accents makes the lines scan as hideous hexameters. And if readers have difficulty in following the Figlish, the easiest interpretation will be got by looking up the original Latin! But it may be hinted that ruler is Dutch ruler (Ger, reiter, ritter) a horse soldier, karne is kerne, an (Irish) foot soldier baine, the French baigner bathe enginess ingening con trivance, steaming is apparently an odd misprint for seeming brule is bruit, rumour and that the doubling of the ein time for the and of the o in too for to, &c, is to mark quantity.

Captain Baruabe Rich (C.1540-c 1620), soldier and romance writer, was of good Essex stock, served in the Low Country wars, and from 1573 spent most of his life in Ireland, latterly in In his romances he was a government post. inspired by Lyly's Luphues, but one of them, The Straunge and Wonderfull Adventures of Don Simonides, a Gentilman Spaniard, has claims to rank as the earliest of modern romances (see From another Shakespeare above, page 238) undoubtedly took the plot of Twelfth Night He wrote also largely on the distressful condition of his adopted country, denounced the rebellious spirit of the Irish, popery, tobacco smoking, and feminine His verses are very poor and the extravagance trinslations from Herodotus ascribed to him is by another hand -Reginald Scot (c. 1538-99), a Kentish man who studied at Oxford, deserves remembrance for his bold impeachment of the witchcraft superstition in his Discoverie of Witcheraft (1584)

the play of Promos and Cassandra, on which Shidespeare founded his Measure for Measure He rioted a while at court, served in the Low Countries, engaged in Sir Humphrev Gilbert's unsuccessful expedition to Newfoundland (1578-79), and fought at the battle of Zutphen, where Sir Philip Sidney got his death-wound (1586) He contended for a kind of play intermediate between the monotonous classical Senegan type and the absurd kind beloved of the vulgar, full of extravagances and impossibilities, see his criticism of the early Elizabethan dramatists above at page 240 His Promos and Cassandra was a translation, with pieces of poetry interspersed, of one of the Heea tommuths of the Italian, Giraldo Cinthio

Another minor dramatist of this period is Thomas Hughes, who had the chief share in The Misfortunes of Arthur (1588) He was a Cheshire man, who passed from Cambridge to Gray's Inn

Anthony Munday (1553-1633), the son of a London draper, was a pamphleteer, translator, chivalry romancer, playwright, balladmaker, and poet, as also actor, stationer, and spy on the English Catholics at Rome In the latter capacity he went abroad in 1578, in 1579, on his return, he was reproving sin in the Mirrour of Mutabilitie, partly in rhyme, partly in blank verse. He was concerned in eighteen plays, of which only four are extant Francis Meres, in 1598, calls him the 'best plotter' among the writers for the stage, but he showed little originality, and his style is rather poor, both in prose and verse. John a Kent (1595) is based on an old humorous ballad best of his extant plays, The Downfall of Robert Earle of Huntington, afterward called Robin Hood of Verrie Sherwolde (1598), was reproduced, with additions by Chettle, in 1599. It was reprinted (modernised) both by Dodsley and by Collier Robin thus addresses Much, the clown, and Marian

Wind once more, jolly huntsmen, all your horns, Whose shrill sound, with the echoing woods' assist, Shall ring a sad knell for the fearful deer, Before our feathered shafts, death s winged darts, Bring sudden summons for their fatal ends. Give me thy hand now God's curse on me light, If I forsake not grief in grief's despite Much, make a cry, and yeomen, stand ye round I charge ye, never more let woful sound Be heard among ye, but whatever fall, Laugh grief to scorn, and so make sorrow small Marian, thou seest, though courtly pleasures want, Yet country sport in Sherwood is not scant For the soul ravishing delicious sound Of instrumental music, we have found The winged quiristers, with divers notes, Sent from their quaint recording pretty throats, On every branch that compasseth our bower, Without command contenting us each hour For arras hangings and rich tapestry, We have sweet nature's best embroidery For thy steel glass, wherein thou wont st to look. Thy crystal eyes gaze in a crystal brook At court a flower or two did deck thy head, Now with whole garlands it is circled. For what in wealth we want, we have in flower, And what we lose in halls, we find in bowers.

In the Dictionary of Vitional Bio riphy Munday i credited with the translation of nine romances (Pillatino of England Inviduo le Giule, Co.) the writing of seven pascants, and the production of twenty four miscellaneous pieces—some of them edifying but tedious, as The Pefence of Prierite and The Pine of Prieries.

Henry Chattle (1565-1607) was a pamphleteer and dramatist who edited Greene's Groats-worth of 11't (1592, see above at page 327), wrote thirteen plays of considerable merit (one of which, Hoffmann, was reprinted in 1851), and was partauthor (1th Dekker, Ben Jonson, Day, Webster, and others) of thirty five others, including Robin Heal, Patient Grissill, The Blind Beggar of Beth tal Green, and Jane Shore Patient Grissill, apparently by Chettle, Dekker, and Haughton, is bised on an English prose version of Boccaccio's story, and on a ballad founded on that, but there are marked alterations and great additions for drimitic effect. Many of the characters are Welsh, and speak the broken English we know from some of Shakespeare's plays. Besides the ordcal to which Grissill is subjected, there is a subordinate experiment (unsuccessful) by Sir Owen to subduc the spirit of Gwenthian. It has been argued (as by Hubsch in his edition of the play in the Erlanger Butrage, w, 1893) that both plots, as well as the phrase, 'To tame a shrew,' which occurs four times in this piece, may have influenced Shakespeare in his Taming of the Shrew, though, on the other hand, Shakespeare may have been first in the field—the dates of both plays are doubtful, and the too plentiful Welsh English jargon in Patient Grissill, as well as single phrases like 'pribles and prables,' would, if we knew Grissill to be the earlier play, almost prove that it had helped to mould the talk of Sir Hugh Evans in Inc Merry II eves of Il indsor

The marquis lover thus describes the perfections of Grissill, the poor basketmaker's daughter

See where my Grissill and her father is,
Me thinkes her beautic, shining through those weedes, Seemes hill a bright starre in the sullen night
How lovely povertie dwels on her backe!
Did but the proud world note her as I doc,
She would east off rich robes, forswere rich state,
To clothe them in such poore abiliments

And later he complacently records the result of his experiments thus

I tried my Grissills patience v hen twas greene, Like a young osier, and I moulded it I ike waxe to all impressions. Married men That long to tame their v ives must curbe them in, Lefore they need a bridle, then they'll proove All Grissills, full of patience, full of love

His picaresque novel, Pierce Plannes Seaven Veres Prentiship (1595), came but a year after Nash's Jack Wilton

Philip Henslowe (d. 1616) it appears that between 1591 and 1597 upwards of a hundred different plays were performed by four of the ten or eleven heatrical companies which then existed. Henslove, successively a dyer, money lender, pawn broker (who idvanced money and dresses to the players), and owner of house property, had much to do with the building and management of theatres. Chapman, Drayton, Dekler, and other well known dramatists had works of theirs produced under his management, but not Shakespeare, who was mainly connected with other management Most of the plays named by him are lost, but several good dramas of this golden age have descended to us, the authors of which are unknown or only guessed at. Several there were, without authority, attributed to Shakespeare, a few possess ment chough to have by serious critics been considered first sketches by Shake Most of them were republished in spcare. Dodsley's Old Plays Among the most notable are The Merry Devil of Edmonton, The London Prodigal, The Yorkshire Tragedy, Lord Cromwell, The Birth of Merlin, The Widow of Watling-Street, Mucedorus, Locrine, Arden of Teversham, The Misfortunes of Arthur, Edward III, The Two Noble Kinsmen, &c The latter two have scenes in which versification and dialogue are wonderfully Shakespearian in the Noble Kinsmen Mr Lee thinks there are frequent and unmistakable signs of Shakespearian work comedies the Nerry Devil of Edmonton is the best (edited by Warnke and Proescholdt, Halle, 1884, and by Walker for Dent, 1897) thought it was 'assuredly not unworthy of Shake speare' (though the 'Merry Devil,' a magician called Fabell, has no real share in the plot), and Charles Lamb thought it 'written to make the reader happy' The Birth of Merlin is probably an old play worked up by Rowley, possibly with help from Middleton, the Misfortunes of Arthur seems to be mainly by Thomas Hughes (page 333)

trien of Feversham (printed 1592), the most important of a scries of what Mi Bullen calls murder plays, is founded on the story, told at length by Holinshed, of a murder which took place in Alice, the unfaithful wife of Arden, a Kentish gentleman, joined with her paramour Mosbie and two assassins in murdering her hus Alice was a step daughter of Sir Edward North, father of the translator, Mosbie, a tailor by trade, was a servant of Lord North In 1770 a local Faversham editor of the plays argued strongly that it was Shal espeare's Treck translated it into German as a genuine production of Shakespeare Mr Swinburne inclines to the belief that it may have been the work of Shakespeare's youth, and Mr Bullen (who edited Arden in 1887) thinks Shakespeare may have revised and improved an older version into this shape (adding single lines and longer passages in the extract given below), though there is no evidence that he did Symonds, who values the piece almost as highly as does Mr Swanburne, thought it safer meanwhile to be content to rank it amongst anonymous works We subjoin one touching scene between Alice and her paramour-a scene of mutual recrimination, guilt, and tenderness

Mostre How no v, Alice? What, sad and passionat? Make me particler of thy pensivenes byte divided burnes with lesser force.

That Kiot's child must needs be Beggary Ire these the virtues that his youth did promise? Dice and voluptuous meetings, midnight revels, Taking his bed with surfaits, ill beseeming The ancient honour of his house and name? And this not all, but that which kills me most-When he recounts his losses and falle fortunes, The weakness of his state so much dejected, Not as a man repentant, but half mad His fortunes cannot answer his expense, He sits and sullenly locks up his arms, Forgetting Heaven, looks downward, which makes him Appear so dreadful that he frights my heart Walks heavily, as if his soul were earth, Not penitent for those his sins are past, But vexed his money cannot make them last. A fearful melancholy, ungodly sorrow!

On Arten f Ferentim and the 1 r's are Trageay, see the compter on 'Donesic Tragedy in Mr J. A. Symonds's Stake stetres Pricess rs (1874) and Mr L. H. Bullen's introduction to his edition of Irden (1887). The first is given from the old text the latter from the modernised version edited by Collier with the punctuation altered.

William Warner, born apparently in Yorkshire about 1558, studied at Oxford and became an attorney of the Common Pleas, but from 1585 was known as an author, and died in 1609. He published a series of prose tales called Pan his Syring in 1585, he translated from Plautus, and in 1586 came before the public with his famous Albion's England, a kind of rhyming history with interludes and disquisitions, but the history is not exactly history, and the poetry very seldom what it nevertheless seems to have been taken for, though here and there are pithy lines and phrases and episodes well thought out The work, written in long couplets of fourteen syllable lines, is managed with some devicerity, but on the whole is shambling, tedious, ind monotonous Yet, though prohibited at first—on the ground of the indelicacy of certain passages, it is said—it was wonderfully well received, quite surprisingly so, since by the time it appeared Sir Philip Sidney's work was done ethough not published), the I derte Queene was being written, and Shakespeare was at work in Meres, one of the most often quoted of contemporary critics, expressly says Spenser and Warner 'be our chief heroical makers,' and tells us the best wits of Oxford and Cambridge call Warner our 'English Homer,' and compare him with Euripides! Nash felt confident that Warner had 'in no whit disparaged' English Before 1612 there had been six editions of Album's England, every new issue having additions bringing the work down to date, or introducing foreign matters, so that, whereas the first edition had but four books, the sixth had sixteen dedication explains the name of the work and its 'This our whole Hand, anciently called br 1'41 te, but more anciently Albion, presently containing two Kingdomes, England and Scotland, is cause (right Honourable) that to distinguish the former, whose onely occurrents I abridge from our Historic, I entitle this my book Albion's]

England' It begins, nevertheless, with the division of the world after the Flood, takes in some classical mythology, and so reaches the fabulous history of Geoffrey of Monmouth and Brute (whence the spelling Brutaine), the grandson of Æncas and founder of the British monarchy Arbitrary and elliptical selections from actual history appear from the fifth book on, with curious episodes Thus Curan, a Dansk prince, falls in love with Argentile, a princess of Northumberland, dispos sessed by a cruel uncle, turns 'kitchin drudge' that he may woo her, but is rejected, loses sight of her when she flees from court, and, becoming a shepherd, makes love to her (successfully) under the impression that he is making suit to a 'countrie The story, given as part of the history of Northumbria, occupies five out of the twenty pages devoted to the whole history of the Hep tarchy and of the Anglo-Saxon kings of England. It seems impossible to believe that Warner is not here giving a rechauffe of some version of the old English poem Havelok the Dane (sec page 44) The cruel uncle, the Danish prince who becomes a kitchen drudge, and other elements - even the parallel between Argentile and Goldburgh, though Curan rather suggests Horn—seem to put out of court Mr Sidney Lce's belief that the coincidence is accidental. This episode has been specially priised and reprinted or imitated William Webster pla giarised it in 1617, it was used for the plot of a play attributed to John Webster and Rowley, and for another by William Mason, it was made into a ballad, and it was included by Percy in his Reliques, as was also the episode of 'the Patient Countess' In Warner's account of the reign of Henry VII, the unfortunate daughter of the Earl of Huntly who was married to Perkin Warbeck is permitted to tell, to the length of six pages, the sad tale how a Scottish knight became distraught through his wife's disloyalty, and to record the distriught conversation of the poor man Hercon follow the loves, jerlousies, and feuds of the Owl, the Cuckoo, the Swallow, and the Bat, with arguments between them and adventures that to them bcfcll This again is so foreign to Warner's native turn of mind that it seems he was working up relics of some old allegorical poem of the Owl and Nightingah type. There is a good deal about the King of Spain and the Pope, the Inquisition, and the Civil Wars in France, the adventures of Sir John Mandeville fill a long series of chapters, and the first part of the work winds up with a disqui sition against atheists, and a summary of physics, ethics, and natural theology The Continuance of 1606 wandered away from England to the Picts and Scots, Macbeth and Fleance, and to the history of Wales, but returns to contemporary English history in the Gunpowder Plot Occasional 'merric jestes' are of unconventional broadness sometimes introduces a story in the words of a northerner, and wields the Yorkshire dialect with good effect. The story of the execution of Mary

[ryme,

Queen of Scots (in the first part) has interest as being practically a contemporary account. Thomas Campbell called this extraordinary pot pourn 'an enormous ballad.' Of its critics Charles Lamb is the most generous, he read Albion 'with great pleasure, largely for the skill shown in overcoming the difficulties of alliteration and versification.'

Robert Southwell, Jesuit martyr and poet, was born at Horsham St Faith's, near Norwich, about 1561, his father's family being still represented by Lord Southwell, while his maternal grandmother was a Shelley of the house whence the poet spring. He was educated at Doury, at Paris, at Tournay, and at Rome, being received into the Society of Jesus as one of the 'children' in 1578, and took the yours of a scholastic in 1580. He distinguished himself so highly in philosophy and theology as to be appointed prefect of the English He was ordained priest in 1584, and two years later, arriving in England with Garnet, was sheltered by Lord Vaux, and became chaplain to the Countess of Arundel, whose husband was an imprisoned Catholic. The savage laws of 1584 declared it treason for any native born subject of the queen who had been orduned a Roman Catholic priest since her accession to reside in England forty days, the penalty being death and disembowelment. For six years he ministered secretly but zealously to the scattered adherents of his creed, meanwhile he wrote his Consolation for Catholics and most of his poems. In 1592 he was betrayed, and imprisoned at Westminster and in the Tower After three years' captivity, and after having been agonisingly tortured no less than thirteen times without betraying any of his fellow labourers, he was put on trial, the inevitable sentence followed, and on 22nd February 1595 he suffered bravely at Tyburn, frankly declaring himself, as he had done throughout, 'a priest of the Catholic and Roman Church, and of the Society of Jesus' His longest poem is St Peter's Conplaint, his most famous, Inc birn ng Babe, a singular piece of spiritualised fancy, of which Ben Jonson said to Drummond of Hawthornden, that if he had written that piece, he would have been content to burn many of his own poems' St Peter's Complaint, Maonia, and a third volume of verse all appeared after South well's death, and were repeatedly reprinted, but spite of Ben Jonson's praise fell into ilmost complete oblivion Waldron, a Catholic actor, reprinted a few of Southwell's poems, Walter edited the poems in 1816, and furnbull in 1856, but the most complete edition is Grosart's Opinion is divided is to his merits. Mr Sewell, the harshest of his critics, said St Peter's Complaint was a 'drawl' of thirty pages of 'maudin repentance in which the distinctions between the north and north east sides of a sentimentality are worthy of Duns Scotus' But Archbishop Trench and Dr George Macdonald have given him high praise, though everybody must admit that many of his conceits are extravagant, his hunt after alliteration and antithesis strained. His wording is often odd and it times grotesque-'Day full of dumps' sounds far from solemn. But many of his images are striking, and many of his lines terse and impressive, while, in spite of oversentimentality, the devotional feeling is sincere and the utterance genuinely poetic. His prose papers, some six in number, are of less interest As a poet he ex pressly designed to show that virtue and piety were as suitable subjects for poetry as worldly ambitions and sensual joys. He was at pains to write, in contrast to Dyer's 'Fancy' dealing with the torments of love, a more edifying Dyer's Phancy turned to a Sinner's Complainte

The Image of Death

Before my face the picture hangs, That daily should put me in mind Of those cold names and bitter pangs That shortly I am like to find . But yet, alas ! full little I Do thinke hereon that I must die I often looke upon a face Most vgly, grisly, bare, and thinne, I often view the hollow place Where eyes and nose had sometime oin, I see the bones acrosse that he, Yet little think that I must die I read the labell underneath, That telleth me whereto I must, I see the sentence eake that saith, 'Remember, man, that thou art dust ' But vet, alas ' but seldome I Do- thinke indeede that I must die Continually at my bed's head A hearse doth hang, which doth me tel That I ere morning may be dead, Though now I feele my selfe ful well. But yet, alas! for all this, I Hane little minde that I must die The gowne which I do vee to weare,

The knie wherewith I cut inv mea e,

And eke that old and ancient chair,

Which is my onely variall seat

All these do tel me I must die.

And yet my life amend not I

My ancestors are turnd to clay, And many of my mates are gone, My yongers daily drop away, And can I thinke to 'scape alone? No, no, I know that I must die, And yet my life amend not l If none can 'scape Death's dreadfull dart, If rich and poore his becke obey, If strong, if wise, if all do smart, Then I to 'scape shall have no way Then grant me grace, O God! that I My life may mend, sith I must die.

The Burning Babe.

As I in hoary Winter's night Stood shiveringe in the snowe, Surpris'd I was with sodayne heat, Which made my hart to glow, And liftinge upp a fear-full eye To vewe what fire was nere, A prety Babe all burninge bright, Did in the ayre appeare. Who, scorched with excessive heate, Such floodes of teares did shedd, As though His floodes should quench His flames, Which with His teares were fedd 'Alas ' quoth He, 'but newly borne, In fierv heates I frie, I et none approch to warm their hartes. Or feele my fire, but I, My faultles brest the fornace is, The fuell, woundinge thornes, Love is the fire, and sighes the smoke, The ashes, shames and scornes, The fuell Justice Injeth on, And Mercy blowes the coalcs, The metall in this fornace wrought \re men s defiled soules, For which, as nowe on fire I am, To worke them to their good, So will I melt into a bath, To washe them in my bloode.' With this He vanisht out of sight, And swiftly shroncke awaye, And straight I called unto mynde That it was Christmas daye

Tymes goe by Turnes

The lopped tree in tyme may grow againe, Most naked plants renewe both frute and floure The soriest wight may finde release of payne, The dryest soile sucke in some moystning shourd Tymes go by turnes, and chaunces change by course, From foule to fayre, from better happ to worse. The sea of Fortune doth not ever flor, She drawes her favours to the lowest ebb, Her tide hath equall tymes to come and goe, Her loome doth weave the fine and coarsest webb, No joy so great but runneth to an ende,

No happ so harde but may in fine amende Not allwaves fall of leaf, nor ever springe, No endlesse night, yet not eternall daye The saddest birdes a season finde to singe, The roughest storme a calme may soone alaye Thus with succeding turnes God tempereth all, That man may hope to rise, yet fear to fall

A chaunce may wynne that by mischance was lost,

The nett that houldes no greate, takes little fishe,
In so ne thinges all, in all thinges none are croste,

Fewe all they neede, but none have all they wishe.

I minigled joyes here to no man befall,
Who least, hath some, who most, hath never all

The following is a stanza on Sleepe from St Peter's Complaint

Shape, Death's alive, oblimon of teares, Silence of passion, baline of angry sore, Suspence of lones, securitie of feares, Wrath's lentine, heart's ease, storme's calmest shore, Sense's and soulc's reprival from all cumbers, Benumning sense of ill with quiet slumbers.

Another poem, Life is but Losse, begins thus
By force I hue, in will I wish to dye,
In playnte I passe the length of lingring dayes,
I ree would my soule from mortall body five
And tredd the track of death's desyred wates,
I ffe is but losse where death is deemed gaine,
And loathed pleasures breed displeasinge payne

Samuel Daniel, son of a music master, was born in 1562 near Faunton, in Somerset, and seems to have been educated under the patronage of the Pembroke fimily. In 1579 he was entered 1 commoner of Magdalen Hall, Oxford, where he devoted himself to poetry and history, at the end of three years he quitted the university without taking a degree. Before 1590 he visited Italy, and soon after became tutor at Wilton to William Herbert (later Shakespeare's friend), son of the Earl of Pembroke and Sir Philip Sidney's sister Later he was tutor to Anne Clifford, daughter of the Eurl of Cumberland After the death of Spenser, Daniel became 'voluntary laure ite' to the court, but was superseded by Ben Jonson the reign of James he was appointed to 'allow' or act as censor of new plays, for a time had charge of a company of young players at Bristol, ind in 1607 was preferred to be gentleman extraordinity and groom of the queen's chamber He lived in a garden house in Old Street, St Luke's, where, according to Fuller he would 'lie hid for some months together, the more retiredly to enjoy the company of the Muses, and then would appear in public to converse with his friends." Dimich is said to have enjoyed the friendship of Shakespeare, Marlowe, and Chapman icter was irreproachable, and his society appears to have been much courted. Towards the close of his life he retired to a farm he rented at Beeking ton, in Somerset, where he died 14th October 1619.

The works of Daniel include sonnets, epistles, misques, and drain is, but his principal production is a History of the Civil Hars tetrocan York and Invaster, a poem in eight books, published in 1604. Musophilis, containing a General Deforce of Learning, is an elaborate and thoughtful work by Diniel, In. Difence of Rhy e (1602).

against Campion, is admirable prose. His tragedy of Chapatra (1593), dedicated to his patroness, Lidy Pembroke, was modelled on Sencer, and is not one of his most successful efforts, nor was his second tragedy, Philotas, on the story in Plutarch's Life of Alexander the Great, which provoked suspicion it court that Daniel was satirising the tyranny of princes. Both plays are Schecan rather than Elizabethan, and are influenced by French The Queen's Arcadia and Hymen's models Iriumph are 'pistoril tragi comedies' Daniel was extolled by his contemporaries, as Spenser, Lodge, Carew, Drummond of Hawthornden, although Ben Jonson described him is 'a good but no poct,' and Drayton quotes honest man the opinion of some wise men that he was 'too much historian in verse,' besides saying for him self that 'his manner better fitted prose' modern critics, Coleridge I imb, and Hazlitt unite in praising him. As a sonneteer Daniel is altogether admirable, some of the 'Deha' series rank near the best examples of this form in English Daniel is an elegant if hot a great poet. His writings are pervaded by tenderness and dignity, by thoughtfulness and purity of taste remarkable indeed, but licking vital energy of movement and memorableness of expression. His tragedies and masques fail in dramatic interest Southey called D micl 'the tenderest of the tender poets'

'The well languaged Daniel' (it was William Browne who gave the epithet, now a vox signata) is strangely modern in style, Coloridge said 'The style and linguise are just such as any very pure and manly writer of the present day-Wordsworth, for example-would use, it seems quite modern in comparison with the style of Shakespeare' For this reason it is the more desirable that we should adhere throughout to his own spelling also (though the merely typographical archaisms of long is v for u and i for parc disregarded) The whole epistle from which our first extract is made Wordsworth pronounced very beautiful. Daniel's thoughtful equable verse flows on unintermittingly, and with a wealth of sound and dignified reflection, and never offends, but it becomes tedious and uninteresting from its sameness and the absence of salient points--the Civil II ais is especially fatiguing to read. Yet in a letter to Lamb, Coleridge notes that Daniel chught and recommunicated the spirit of the prent Countess of Pembroke the glory of the north, he formed her mind, and her mind inspirited him Gravely sober on all ordinary affors, and not easily excited by any, yet there is one on which his blood boils-whenever he speaks of English valour exerted against a foreign enemy?

From the Epistle to the Countess of Cumberland.

And vith how free an eve doth he looke downe Upon these lover regions of turmovle. Where all the stormes of passions mainly beat. On itesh and bloud where honour, pow'r, renowne, Are only pay afflictions, golden toyle, Where greatnesse stands upon as feeble feet. As frailty doth, and onely great doth seeme. To little minds who doe it so esteeme.

He lookes upon the mightiest Monarch's warres. But only as on stately robberies, Where evermore the fortune that prevails. Must be the right of the ill succeeding marres. The fairest and the best fac't enterprize. Great pirat Poinpey lesser pirats qualles. Justice, he sees, as if seduced, still. Conspires with power, whose cause must not be ill.

He sees the face of right t' appeare as manifolde As are the passions of uncertaine man, Who puts it in all colours, all attires, To serve his ends, and make his courses holde. He sees that, let Deceit worke what it can, Plot and contrive base waves to high desires, That the all guiding Providence doth yet All disappoint and mocks this smoake of wit.

Nor is he mov'd with all the thunder cracks
Of Tyrants threats, or with the surly brov
Of power, that proudly sits on others crimes,
Charg'd with more crying sinnes than those he checks.
The tornes of sad confusion, that may grow
Up in the pie ent for the comming times,
Appall not him, that hath no side at all,
But of himselfe, and knows the vorst can fall

The next extract was specially praised by Coleridge, who, speaking of the first of the quoted standars, said 'What is there in description superior even in Shalespeare? Only that Shakespeare vould have gi en one of his glows to the first line, and flattered the mountain-top with his sovran eye, instead of this poor 'A mervailous advantage of his yeares'?

Ulisses and the Syren.

Syren Come, worthy Greeke, Ulisses come,
Possesse these shores with me,
The windes and Seas are troublesome,
And heere we may be free.
Here may we sit and view their toile
That travaile in the deepe,
And joy the day in mirth the while,
And spend the night in sleepe.

Ultsses Tair Nimph, if fame or honor were
To be atteynd with ease,
Then would I come and rest with thee,
And leave such toyles as these But here it dwels, and here must I
With danger seeke it forth,
To spend the time luxuriously
Becomes not men of worth.

Syren Ulisses, oh, be not deceiv'd
With that unreall name
This honour is a thing conceiv'd,
And rests on others fame
Begotten onely to molest
Our peace, and to beguile
(The best thing of our life) our rest,
And give us up to toil!

Ulisses Delicious Nimph, suppose there were No honour, or report,
Yet manlines would scorne to weare
The time in idle sport
For toyle doth give a better touche
To make us feele our joy,
And case finds tediousnesse as much
As labour yeelds annoy

Syrin Then pleasure likewise seems the shore, Whereto tends all your toyle, Which you forgo to make it more, And perish oft the while. Who may disporte them diversly, Finde never tedious day,

And ease may have varietie, As well as action may

Ulustes But natures of the noblest frame
These toyles and dangers please,
And they take comfort in the same,
As much as you in ease
And with the thoughts of actions past
Are recreated still When pleasure leaves a touch at last
To show that it was ill

Syren That doth opinion onely cause,
That's out of custome bred,
Which makes us many other lawes
Than ever nature did
No widdowes with for our delights,
Our sportes are without bloud,
The world we see by warlike wights
Receives more hurt than good

Ulisses Dut yet the state of things require These motions of unrest,
And these great spirits of high desire Seem borne to turne them best
To purge the inischiefes that increase And all good order mar
For oft we see a wicked peace,
To be well chang'd for war

Syren Well, well, Ulisse, then I see I shall not have thee heare, And therefore I will come to thee, And take my fortunes there I must be wonne that cannot win, Yet lost were I not wonne For beauty hath created bin, T' undoo or be undonne.

See Dr Grosart's edition of Daniel's works in the Huth Library (5 vols. 1885-87), and H. C. Beeching's Selections from the Poetry of S. Daniel and M. Drayton (1899).

Michael Drayton, born in 1563 at Hartshill, near Atherstone in Warwickshire, at the age of ten was made page to a person of qualitypossibly Sir Henry Goodere, to whom he says he owed the most of his education There is nothing to prove whether he went to a univer-His first work, The Harmonie of the Sity Church (1591), was a metrical translation of parts of the Scriptures, but gave offence to the authorities and was destroyed. In 1593 Drayton published a collection of his pastorals or 'eglogs', in 1594, a collection of sonnets or 'quatorzains' (which helped to fix the specific English form of the sonnet), and in 1596, the first form of what, much altered, appeared as The Barons' Wars, originally in a seven line stanza, finally in 'ottava rima.' It has fine passages, but is not everywhere England's Heroicall Epistles (1597), interesting on the model of Ovid's Heroides, is polished but unequal On the accession of James I in 1603, Drayton acted as esquire to Sir Walter Aston at his investiture as Knight of the Bath. The poet expected patronage from the new sovereign, but was disappointed. The Poems Lyric and Heroic (1606) contain the famous martial lyric, The Ballad of Agincourt He published the first part of his most elaborate work, the Polyolbion, in 1612, and the second in 1622, the whole forming a poetical 'chorographicall' description of England, in thirty songs or books The Polyolbion, unlike any other work in English poetry, is full of topographical and antiquarian details, allusions to remarkable events and persons, local sports and customs, yet the inevitable prolivity and monotony of such a scheme is atoned for by the beauty of Drayton's descriptions, the skill of his treatment the brightness of his fancy, and the delightfulness of his melody, as well as by the multifulness of his information—information in general so accurate that the poem is quoted as in authority by Wood and Hearne.

In 1619 Driyton collected all his poems (but Polyolbion) that he winted preserved, and in 1627 published a new volume containing the whimsical and delightful Aymphidia, The Quest of Cynthia, and The Battaile of Igincourt (distinct from the Ballad) In conjunction with Chettle, Dekker, Munday, Webster, and others he had a share in many plays, notably Sir John Oldeastle. His last work, The Muses Elizium (1630), deals with Noah's dood, the birth of Moses, David and Goliuth, and the great sonnet, 'Since there's no help,' first

Of all the beasts which we for our veneriall name,
The Hart among the rest, the Hunters noblest game
Of which most princely chase sith none did e'er report
Or by description touch t' express that wondrous sport (Yet might have well besceined the ancients' nobler songs)
To our old Arden heere most fifly it belongs
Act shall shee not invoke the mises to her ayde,
But thee, Diana bright, a goddesse and a mayd,
In many a huge growne Wood and many a shady Grove,
Which oft hast borne thy Bowe, great huntresse, used to

At many a cruell beast, and with thy darts to pierce The lion, panther, ounce the bear, and tiger fierce, And following thy fleet game, chaste mighty Forrests queen,

With thy disheveld nymphs attyred in youthful greene, About the Launds hast scowred, and wastes both farre and neere,

Brave huntress, but no beast shall prove thy quarries heere

Save those the best of chase, the tall and lusty Red,
The Stag for goodly shape, and statelinesse of head Is fitt'st to hunt at force. For whom when with his hounds

The laboring hunter tufts the thick unbarbed grounds, Where harbor'd is the Hart, there often from his feed. The dogs of him doe find, or thorough skilfull heed, The Huntsman by his slot, or breaking earth, perceaves, Or entring of the thicke by preising of the greaves. Where he had gone to lodge. Now when the Hart doth hear.

The of en bellowing hounds to vent his secret lair,
He rouzing rusheth out, and through the brakes doth drive,

As though up by the roots the bushes he would rive.

And through the combrous thicks as fearefully he makes,
He with his branched head the tender saplings shakes,
That sprinkling their moyst pearle doe seems for him to weepe.

When after goes the Cry, with yellings lowd and deepe, That all the forrest rings and every neighbouring place. And there is not a bound but falleth to the chase. Rechating with his horne, which then the hunter cheeres, Whilst's ill the lustic Stag his high palmed head upbeares, His body she ving state, with unbent I nees upright, Fxpressing (from all beasts) his courage in his flight, But when th' approaching foes still following he perceives, That hee his speed must trust, his usuall walke he leaves, And o'er the Champaine flies, which when the assembly find.

Lach followes, as his horse were footed with the wind But beeing then imbost, the noble stately Decre, When he hath gotten ground (the kennel cast arere) Doth beat the brooks and ponds for sweet refreshing sovle,

That serving not, then proves if he his secut can foyle And makes amongst the heards and flocks of shag wool'd sheep,

Them frighting from the guard of those who had their keepe

But when as all his shifts his safety still denies, Put quite out of his walke, the wayes and fallowes tries, Whom when the Plowman meets, his teame he letteth stand.

T' assaile him with his goad—so with his hooke in hand, The Shepheard him pursues, and to his dog doth halow When, with tempestuous speed, the hounds and huntsmen follow.

Until the noble Deere, through toil bereaved of strength, His long and sinewy legs then fayling him at length, The Villages attempts, enraged, not giving way to anything hee meets now at his sad decay. The cruell ravenous hounds and bloody hunters near, This noblest beast of chase, that vainly doth but feare, Some banke or quick set finds, to which his hanch oppos'd,

He turnes upon his foes, that soone have him inclos'd. The churlish throated hounds then holding him at bay, And as their cruell fangs on his harsh skin they lay,

With his sharp poynted head he dealeth deadly wounds. The Hunter, comming in to help his wearied hounds, He desperatly assayles, untill opprest by force, He who the Mourner is to his owne dying corse, Upon the ruthlesse earth his precious teares let fall.

Ballad of Agincourt

I aire stood the wind for France, When we our Sayles advance, Nor now to prove our chance Longer will tarry, But putting to the Mayne At Kaux, the mouth of Seine, With all his martial trayne, Landed King Harry

And taking many a fort,
Furnish'd in warlike sort,
Marcheth tow'rds Agincourt
In happy howre,
Skirmishing day by day
With those that stop'd his way,
Where the I rench gen rall lay
With all his power

Which in his hight of pride king Henry to deride, His ransome to provide To the King sending Which he neglects the while, As from a Nation vile, Yet with an angry smile, Their fall portending

And turning to his men,
Quoth our brave Henry then,
Though they to one be ten,
Be not amazed
Yet have we well begun,
Battels so bravely wonne
Have ever to the sunne
By I ame beene raysed.

And for myselfe (quoth he),
This my full rest shall be,
England ne'r mourne for Me,
Nor more esteeme me
Victor I will remaine,
Or on this earth he slaine,
Never shall shee sustaine
Losse to redeeme me

Most famous of Drayton's short poems is the Valediction.

Since ther's no helpe, come let us kiss and part!
Nay, I have done, You get no more of Me,
And I am glad, yea glad with all my heart,
That thus so cleanly I my selfe can free
Shake hands for ever, Cancell all our Vowes,
And when we meet at any time againe,
Be it not seen in either of our browes
That we one jot of former Love reteyne
Now at the last gaspe of Loves latest Breath,
When, his Pulse fayling, Passion speechlesse lies,
When Faith is kneeling by his bed of Death,
And Innocence is closing up his Eyes,
Now if thou wouldst, when all have given him over.

The following (modernised in spelling) describes the setting out of Mab, Queen of the Fairies, to visit Pigwiggin, 'a fairy knight'

From Death to Life thou might'st him yet recover

From the 'Nymphidia,

Her chariot ready straight is made, Each thing therein is fitting laid, That she by nothing might be stay'd, For nought must be her letting, Four nimble gnats the horses were, Their harnesses of gossamere, Fly Cranion, her charioteer, Upon the coach box getting

Her chariot of a snail's fine shell,
Which for the colours did excell,
The fair Queen Mab becoming well,
So lively was the limning,
The seat the soft wool of the bee,
The cover (gallantly to see)
The wing of a pied butterflie,
I trow 'twas simple trimming

The wheels composed of crickets' bones,
And daintily made for the nones,
For fear of rattling on the stones
With thistle down they shod it,
For all her maidens much did fear
If Oberon had chanced to hear
That Mab his queen should have been there,
He would not have abode it

She mounts her chanot with a trice,
Nor would she stay for no advice
Until her maids, that were so nice,
To wait on her were fitted,
But ran herself away alone,
Which when they heard, there was not one
But hasted after to be gone,
As she had been diswitted

Hop and Mop, and Drab so clear, Pip and Trip, and Skip, that were To Mab their sovereign dear, Her special maids of honour, Fib and Tib, and Pink and Pin, Tick and Quick, and Jill and Jin, It and Nit, and Wap and Win, The train that wait upon her

Upon a grasshopper they got,
And, what with amble and with trot,
For hedge nor ditch they spared not,
But after her they hie them
A cobweb over them they throw,
To shield the wind if it should blow,
Themselves they wisely could bestow
Lest any should espy them

There is a memoir by Payne Collier in his volume of poems by Drayton for the Roxburghe Club (1856) in 1876 the Rev R. Hooper edited the Polyobon A. H. Bullen published Selections from the poems in 1893 the Rev C. Beeching Selections from Daniel vail Drayton in 1899 and since 1885 the Spenser Society has issued the Polyobon in 3 vols. folio and also four quarto volumes of his poems

Josua Sylvester (1563-1618), translator of Du Bartas, was the son of a Kentish clothier, was put to trade against his will, wrote numberless poems and dedications, was groom of the chamber to, Prince Henry, and in 1613 became secretary to the English merchants at Middelburg in Holland, where he died He is now only remembered in a shadowy way as the translator of the Divine Weeks and Works of the French poet Du Bartas translation — or rather paraphrase — was highly popular, and earned for him among his contemporaries the epithet of 'silver-tongued Sylvester' Drayton, Drummond, Bishop Hall, Izaak Walton, and others praise the work, and Milton has been credited with copying some of its expressions Charles Dunster even said (in 1800) that Sylvester's Du Bartas contains the prima stamina of Paradise Lost, but this is much too unqualified a statement, though no doubt Milton read Sylvester's poem in his youth, and may have got suggestions therein. Dryden in youth preferred Sylvester to Spenser, but by and-by came to look on his yerse as 'abominable fustian'

Satan's Temptation of Eve

As a false Lover that thick snares hath laid T' intrap the honour of a fair young Maid, When she (though little) listing ear affords To his sweet, courting, deep affected words, Feels some asswaging of his freezing flame, And sooths himselfe with hope to gain his game, And, rapt with joy, upon this point persists, That parleying Citic never long resists

Ev'n so the Serpent, that doth counterfeit All guilefull Call to allure us to his net Perceiving E e his flattering gloze digest, His prosecutes, and, jocund, doth not rest Till he have try'd foot, hand, and head, and all, Upon the breach of his new battered will.

No, fair (quoth he) believe not that the care God hathe. Mankinde from spoyling death to spare, Makes him forbid you (on so strict condition) This purest, fairest, rarest Fruit's fruition I double fear, an envice and a hate. The compound epithets of Sylvester are some times happy and picturesque. Campbell cited with high commendation these lines on morning

Arise betimes, while th' Opal colour'd Morn, In gol len pomp doth May day, 's door adorn

On the other hand, some of his images are in ludicrously bad taste. Dryden says when he was a boy he was rapt into cestasy—afterwards repented of—yath this notable passage (from the 'First Day of the H. Weeke')

But, when the Winter's keener breath began To crystallize the Baltire Ocean Fo glace the Lakes, and bridle up the I louds, And perriving with wool the balde pate Woods

Two happier specimens may be added

Of the parallels between Sylvester and Milton that have been pointed out, we quote two Milton in his version of Psalm exxxvi has

The rule, was so he dy' in twin Of the Try his in main. Now, Sylvester had in his Du Bartas given His dreadful voice to save his ancient sheep Did eleate the bottom of the Erythrean deep, and in Bethulia's Rescue

Where th' Erythraan ruddy billows four Wilton, again, in the same psalm wrote But full soon this did devour The tawny king with all his power.

cchoing Sylvester's-

But contrary the Red Sea did devour The barbarous tyrant with his mighty power

This certainly does seem to argue Milton's familiarity with Sylvester's works and the fact that Sylvester's words had impressed themselves on Milton's memory But the parallels, of whichthese are perhaps as observable as any, mainly affect mere incidental expression. And, unlike the one legged William Lauder (1680 ?-1771), who tried by parallels real and garbled to prove Milton a deliberate copier of other men's ideas and phrases and lines, Dunster expressly says 'Nothing can be further from my intention than to insinuate that Milton was a plagiarist or servile imitator, but I conceive that, having read these sacred poems of very high ment, at the immediate age when his own mind was beginning to teem with poetry, he retained numberless thoughts, passages, and ev pressions therein so deeply in his mind that they hung inherently in his imagination, and became as it were naturalised there'

Sylvester's translation of Du Baitas began to appear in 1592, but was not completed till 1611. Some of his original pieces have quaint titles such as were then affected by many authors for example. Lachrymae Lachryman or the Spirit of Teares distilled for the outymely Devik of the incomparable I rince P in tretus (Henry son of King Junes I) 1612. Tobac o Batteria and the I ifes Shattered about their Eves that idlely Idolae so have and burbarous a lead or it less aire or love so leathsome I antie by a Volley of Holy Sho tunidered from Volunt Helicon (1615). Dunster's book was called Consider 1 was on Millon's Farly Reading (1800.) Grossit reprinted Sylvester's works (2 vols. 400. 'Chertsey Worthies serie) in 1330.

Christopher Warlowe was by far the greatest of Shakespeare's precursors in the dram i-a fiery spirit, who gave character and energy to the stage (see above at page 241), and was the first English writer who had perfect command of sonorous and varied blank verse. Born at Canterbury, and baptised on the 26th of February 1564, he was the son of a shoemaker, but through the ud of a local patron he was admitted into the King's School of his native town. Thence he proceeded in 1581 to Benet or Corpus College, Cambridge, where he graduated BA in 1583, and MA in 1587. How he occupied himself after taking his buchelor's degree is not known, he may have served as a soldier in the Low Countries Tamburlaine the Great was successfully brought out on the stage in 1587, was printed in 1590, and long continued a favourite. Shakespeare makes ancient Pistol quote jestingly the a vkward line

Holla, ye pampered jades of Asia !

But amidst the rant and fustian of Tamburlaine there are passages of great beauty and grandeur, and the versification justifies Ben Jonson's compliment to 'Marlowe's mighty line' Marlowe 'and his hero had in them something of the audacity, the overreaching ambition and self-confidence, of the Renaissance, illustrated in the lofty lines (leading up, however, to an anti-climax ')

Our souls whose faculties can comprehend The wondrous architecture of the world And measure every wandering planet's course, Still climbing after knowledge infinite And always moving as the restless spheres, Will us to wear ourselves and never rest Until we reach the ripest fruit of all—That perfect bliss and sole felicity, The sweet fruition of an earthly crown

It was Marlowe who revolutionised the diction of the popular drama, adopting in place of rhymed couplets the blank verse heretofore associated with classical dramas of the Senecan type. And of blank verse, till now conventional and monotonous, he fashioned a new and powerful instrument of dramatic expression, not merely by shifting the accent freely, but by substituting trochees, ductyls, tribrachs, and spondees for the inevitable iambi of his predecessors, yet Nash and Greene both affected to think slightingly of blank verse as managed by him The following specimen of Marlowe's sonorous exaggeration is a description of Tamburlaine, who, at first spoken of at the royal court as a 'sturdy Scythian thief' and 'a paltry Scythian with his Turtarian rout,' is to be easily taken captive, but looms larger and larger on the historic canvas

Of stature tall and straightly fashioned, Like his desire lift upwards and divine lifted So large of limbs his joints so strongly knit, Such breadth of shoulders, as might mainly bear Old Atlas' burthen. 'Twixt his manly pitch A pearl more worth than all the world is placed Wherein by curious sovereignty of art Are fixed his piercing instruments of sight, Whose fiery circles bear encompassed A heaven of heavenly bodies in their spheres, That guides his steps and actions to the throne Where Honour sits invested royally Pale of complexion, wrought in him with passion, Thirsting with sovereignty and love of arms, His lofty brows in folds do figure death, And in their smoothness amity and life About them hangs a knot of amber hair, Wrapped in curls, as fierce Achilles' was, On which the breath of heaven delights to play, Making it dance with wanton majesty His arms and fingers, long and sinewy, Betokening valour and excess of strength, In every part proportioned like the man Should make the world subdued to Tamburlaine,

Tamburlaine at the close of the first part thus addresses his queen

Then sit thou down, divine Zenocrate, And here we crown thee Queen of Persia,

And all the kingdoms and dominions
That late the power of Tamburlaine subdued
As Juno, when the giants were suppressed,
That darted mountains at her brother Jove
So looks my love, shadowing in her brows
Triumphs and trophies for my victories,
Or, as Latona's daughters, bent to arms,
Adding more courage to my conquering mind

His second play, The Tragical History of Dr Faustus (1604, 2nd ed 1616), based on the familiar folk-tale, exhibits a far wider range of dramatic power than his first The hero studies necro mancy, and makes a solemn disposal of his soul to Lucifer, on condition of having a familiar spirit at his command and unlimited enjoyment for twenty-four years, during which period Faustus visits different countries, 'calls up spirits from the vasty deep,' and revels in luxury and splendour At length the time expires, the bond becomes due, and evil spirits enter, amidst thunder and lightning, to claim his forfeit life. From this plot Marlowe constructed a powerful though irregular Passages of terrific grandeur and thrilling agony are intermixed with low humour and preternatural machinery, sometimes grotesque or The play is, indeed, rather a series of detached scenes than a complete drama, and some of the scenes (especially the comic parts in the second edition) are obviously not Marlowe's The ambition of Faustus is a sensual, not a lofty ambition A feeling of curiosity and wonder is excited by his necromancy and his compact with Lucifer, but we do not fairly sympathise with him till all his disguises are stripped off and his meretricious splendour is succeeded by horror and Then when he stands on the brink of everlasting ruin, waiting for the fatal moment, imploring yet distrusting repentance, a scene of entrancing interest, fervid passion, and overwhelming pathos carries captive the sternest heart and proclaims the triumph of the tragic poet. Bullen holds that the greater part of the matter added in the 1616 edition (that used by Charles Lamb, for example) is certainly not Marlowe's workmanship, and that only an insane critic would maintain that the comic scenes even of the 1604 edition are from his pen Marlowe knew he had not the gift of humour, and probably, Mr Bullen thinks, never attempted to write a comic scene We follow the text of 1604 as given by Bullen The first extract is a part of Faustus's soliloguy and conversation with Valdes and Cornelius 'German Valdes' is doubtless a slip or misprint for Juan de Valdes (1500–44), a Spanish heretic, often confused with his twin-brother Alfonso, whó died at Vienna Latin secretary to Charles V Juan's 'Dialogue between Mercury and Charon' roused the Inquisition, so that he had to flee to Italy, he was an influential mystic, probably anti-Trinitarian, not a magician Cornelius Agrippa (1486-1535), a great German occult philosopher, had also the repute of being a magician

The conversation of the Master with his scholars in the last (sixteenth) scene—there is no division into acco—when I austes a time has come, is much allorter and better in the 1604 edition.

Fa ist \h. gentlemen!

1st Scholar What ails Faustus?

Fa at Ah, my sweet chamber fellow, had I lived with thee, then had I lived still, but now I die eternally Look, comes he not, comes he not?

1st Sch Oh my dear Paustus, what imports this fear?
2nd Scholar Is all our pleasure turned to inclancholy?
3rd Scholar He is not well with being over solitary 2nd Sch If it be so, we will have physicians, and Taustus shall be cured

1st Sch "Tis but a surfeit, sir, fear nothing

Faust A surfeit of deadly sin that both damned both body and soul

2nd Sch Yet, Faustus, look up to Heaven, remember God's mercies are infinite.

Faust But Faustus's offences can never be pardoued the scrpent that tempted Eve may be saved, but not Faustus. O gentlemen, hear me with patience, and tremble not at my speeches. I hough my heart pants and quivers to remember that I have been a student here these thirty years, oh, would I had ne'er seen Werten berg, never read book ' and what wonders have I done, all Germany can witness, yea, all the world for which Faustus hath lost both Germany and the world, yea, Heaven itself, Heaven the seat of God, the throne of the blessed, the kingdom of joy—and must remain in Hell for ever, Hell, ah Hell, for ever! Sweet friends, what shall become of Faustus being in Hell for ever?

2nd Sch 1ct, Faustus, call on God

Faust On God, whom l'austus hath abjured! on God, whom I austus hath blasphemed! Ah my God, I would weep, but the devil draws in my tears. Gush forth blood instead of tears. Yea, life and soul! Oh, he stays my tongue. I would lift up my hands, but see, they hold them, they hold them!

Scholars Who, Faustus?

Faust Lucifer and Mephistophilis Ah gentlemen, I gave them my soul for cunning!

Scholars God forbid 1

Faust God forbade it indeed, but Faustus hath done it for the vain pleasure of four and twenty years hath Faustus lost eternal joy and felicity. I writ them a bill with mine own blood, the date is expired the time is come, and he will fetch me.

1st Sch Why did not Faustus tell of this before, that divines might have prayed for thee?

Faust Oft have I thought to have done so, but the devil threatened to tear me in pieces if I named God, to fetch me body and soul if I once gave ear to divinity, and now 'tis too late. Gentlemen, away' lest you perish with me

2nd Sch Oh, what shall we do to save Faustus?

Faust Ialk not of me, but save yourselves, and depart 3rd Sch God will strengthen me, I will stay with I austus

1st Sch Tempt not God, sweet friend, but let us into the next room and there pray for him

Faust Ay, pray for me, pray for me, and what noise soever you hear, come not unto me, for nothing can rescue me.

Fasted II is, is a play, greatly superior to the too mimed with it though it has not the majestic polar; of Inisius and the first two acts of the few of Matte, it is a noble drama, with ablydrawn characters and splendid scenes. Another tripedy, I ists Dominio i, was published long after Marlowe's death, with his name is author on the tile play. Collier showed that this play, is printed, was a much later production, and was probably written by Dekker and others, but it contains passages and characters characteristic of Marlowe's style, and he may have written the original outline The old play of Faming of a Shrew, printed in 1594 (a precursor of Shakespeare's), contains numerous passages manifestly borrowed from Marlowe's acknowledged works, and hence it has been quite unreasonably argued that he was its author. Great uncertainty lings over many of the old dramas, from the common practice of managers of theatres employing different authors, at subsequent periods, to furnish additional matter for established plays Even Faustus was dressed up in this manner. In 1507-four years after Marlowe's death-Dekker was paid 20s for making additions to this tragedy. and in other five years. Birde and Rowley were paid £4 for further additions to it. Another source of uncertainty as to the paternity of old plays was the unscrupulous manner in which booksellers appropriated any popular name of the day and affixed it to their publications Marlowe joined with Nash in writing Dido, Queen of Carthage, a tragedy of small value, though it contains some and there is little doubt that he true poetry had a hand in the three parts of Shikespeare's Henry II, probably also in Titus Anaronicus His translation of the Eligies of Ovid was burnt as licentious by order of the Archbishop of Cin terbury, yet it was often reprinted in defiance of the ecclesiastical interdict

His influence on Shakespeare is marked, especially in the early plays (see the article on Shakespeare) Marlowc never tried comedy—fortunately, for he seems to have had no humour He had no conception of true love or of a noble woman's character. And the sweetness, light, sympathy, and morality (not in a precisian but yet very indefeasible sense) of his great successor, Shakespeare, were foreign to Marlowe's usual mood.

Marlowe lived a wild life, and came to an early and unhappy end, at twenty nine he was stabbed in in affriy in a tavern at Deptford on the 1st of June 1593 Marlowe had raised his poniard against his antagonist-according to Meres and Anthony Wood, 'a baudy serving man, a rival of his lewd love'-when the other seized him by the wrist and turned the dagger, so that it entered Marlowe's own head, 'in such sort that, notwithstanding all the means of surgery that could be brought, he shortly after died of his wound! His freethinking ways were notorious Greene, writing the Groatsworth of 11 it in the preceding autumn, charged him with utter atheism (see above at page 326) Whether his unbelief was dogmatic atheism or not, it was sufficiently pronounced to attract the notice of the authorities, who were taking proceedings against him and others it the time of his death, and had issued a warrant for his arrest. The last words of Greene's address to him are ominous Defer not with me till this last point of extremitic, for little knowest thou how in the end thou shalt be visited' A noble compliment was paid to the genius of this unfortunate poet by his fellow-dramatist, Michael Drayton

Next Marlowe, bathed in the Thespian springs, Had in him those brave translunary things. That the first poets had his raptures were. All air and fire, which made his verses clear, For that fine madness still he did retain, Which rightly should possess a poet's brain

Mr Sidney Lee thinks Marlowe was probably associated with Shakespeare in bringing the second and third parts of Henry VI into final shape, and that he may have had a share in writing the anonymous Edward III (see below at Shakespeare) Originality, first attribute of genius, belongs in an eminent degree to the ill fated Marlowe Mr Swinburne thinks there is greater discrimination of character, and figures more lifelike, in Marlowe's Edward II than in Shakespeare's Richard II Gaveston, reading a letter, is thus introduced

Gav 'My father is deceased! Come, Gaveston, And share the kingdom with thy dearest friend ' Ah! words that make me surfeit with delight ' What greater bliss can hap to Gaveston Than live and be the favourite of a king! Sweet prince, I come, these, these thy amorous lines Might have enforced me to have swum from France, And, like Leander, gasped upon the sand, So thou would'st smile, and take me in thine arms. The sight of London to my exiled eyes Is as Elysium to a new come soul, Not that I love the city, or the men, But that it harbours him I hold so dear -The king, upon whose bosom let me lie, And with the world be still at enmity What need the arctic people love starlight, To whom the sun shines both by day and night? Farewell base stooping to the lordly peers! My knee shall bow to none but to the king As for the multitude, that are but sparks, Raked up in embers of their poverty,-Tanti, I'll fawn first on the wind That glanceth at my lips, and flieth away But how now, what are these?

In Charles Lamb's judgment, the death scene of Edward II, at Berkeley Castle, when the king is left alone with Lightborn, the murderer, 'moves pity and terror beyond any scene, ancient or modern,' and may indeed challenge comparison with Shakespeare's death of Richard II

Edward Who's there? what light is that? wherefore com'st thou?

Lightborn Fo comfort you, and bring you joyful news Edv Small comfort finds poor Edward in thy looks! Villain, I know thou com st to murder me.

Light To murder you, my most gracious lord!

Far is it from my heart to do you harm.

The queen sent me to see how you were used,

For she relents at this your misery

And what eyes can refrain from shedding tears,

To see a king in this most pitcous state.

Edw Weep'st thou already? list a while to me,

And then thy heart, were it as Gurney's 1 is, Or as Matrevis', 1 hewn from the Caucasus, Yet will it melt, ere I have done my tale. This dungeon where they keep me is a sink Wherein the filth of all the castle falls.

Light O villains!

Edw And there, in mire and puddle, have I stood This ten days' space, and lest that I should sleep, One plays continually upon a druin They give me bread and water, being a king, So that, for want of sleep and sustenance, My mind's distempered, and my body's numbed, And whether I have limbs or no, I know not O would my blood drop out from every vein, As doth this water from my tattered robes! Fell Isabel, the queen, I looked not thus, When for her sake I ran at tilt in France, And there unhorsed the Duke of Cleremont

Light O speak no more, my lord! this breaks my heart Lie on this bed, and rest yourself a while

Edw These looks of thine can harbour nought but death

I see my traged, written in thy brows
Yet stay a while, forbear thy bloody hand,
And let me see the stroke before it comes,
That even then, when I shall lose my life,
My mind may be more steadfast on my God
Light What means your highness to mistrust me thus?

Light What means your highness to mistrust me thus?
Light. These hands were never stained with innocent blood,

Nor shall they now be tainted with a king's

Edw Forgive my thought, for having such a thought
One jewel have I left, receive thou this Still fear I, and I know not what's the cause,
But every joint shakes as I give it thee
Oh, if thou harbour'st murder in thy heart,
Let the gift change thy mind, and save thy soul
Know that I am a king Oh, at that name
I feel a hell of grief Where is my crown?
Gone, gone, and do I still remain alive?

Light You're overwatched, my lord, he down and rest

Edw But that grief keeps me waken, I should sleep, For not these ten days have these eyelids closed Now as I speak they fall, and yet with fear Open again O wherefore sitt'st thou here?

Light If thou mistrust me, I'll be gone, my lord

Edw No, no, for if thou mean'st to murder me, Thou wilt return again, and therefore stay

Light He sleeps

£dw O let me not die, yet stay, O stay a while Light How now, my lord?

Edw Something still buzzeth in mine ears,
And tells me if I sleep, I never wake,
This fear is that which makes me tremble thus.
And therefore tell me wherefore art thou come?
Light To rid thee of thy life. Matrevis, come.

Ldw I am too weak and feeble to resist Assist me, sweet God, and receive my soul

1 Gurney and Matrevis were Edward a keepers.

The following scene, in which the nobles remon strate with Edward II, has also something of the Shakespearian manner

Edward How now? What noise is this? Who have we here? Is't you?

The concluding ditty is that quoted by Fabyan as Laving been sung by the Scots after Bannock burn (see above at page 171).

Detrehed lines and passages in Edward II pursues much poetical beauty or imaginative poetic four, in ansver to Leicester, the king siva

Leicester, if gentle words might comfort me,
Thy speeches long aso had eased my sorrows,
For kind and loving hast thou always been.
The griefs of private men are soon allayed,
But not of kings. The forest deer being struck,
Runs to an herb that closeth up the wounds
But when the imperial libra's flesh is gored,
He rends and tears it with his wrathful paw,
And highly scorning that the lowly earth
Should drink his blood, mounts up to the air

Young Mortimer's device for the royal pageant was

A lofty cedar tree fair flourishing, On whose top branches kingly eagles perch, And by the bark a canker creeps me up, And gets into the highest bough of all

For the story Marlowe follows not so much Fabyan as the chronicles of Stow, Holinshed, and Baker

Marlowe's unfinished poem of Hero and Leander, founded on the classic story of the sixth century Museus, was first published in 1598 Marlowe completed the first and second Sestiads of his paraphrase, and they were reprinted with a completion (four sestiads) by Chapman in 1600 A few lines will show his command of the heroic couplet

It his not in our power to love or hate,
For will in us is overruled by fite.
When two are stripped, long ere the race begin,
We wish that one should lose, the other win
And one especially do we affect.
Of two gold ingots, like in each respect.
The reason no man knows—let it suffice.
What we behold is censured by our eyes.
Where both delikerate, the love is slight.
Who ever loved, that loved not at first sight?

The last memorable line was quoted from the 'Dead Shepherd' by Shakespeare in As You Like It 'Blood is the god of war's rich livery,' 'Above our life we love an absent friend,' 'More childish valorous than worldly wise,' are pregnant single lines, 'Things past recovery are hardly cured with exclaimations' has a modern ring

Of the following pieces which first appeared in the Passionale Pilgi in (see page 257), the first is in England's Helicon given as by Marlowe, and the second by 'Ignoto' But in one copy the initials of Sir Walter Raleigh are attached, and we have the explicit statement of Izaak Walton that the pieces were really by Marlowe and Raleigh respectively—an attribution now generally accepted Posterity also agrees with Walton that Mirlove's poem is 'choicely good'

The Passionate Shepherd to his Love

Come live with me and be my love And we will all the pleasures prove That hills and valles, dales and fields, Woods or steepy mountain yields

And we will sit upon the rocks, Seeing the shepherd, fee I their flocks, Ly hallow rivers, to whose falls Melodious birds sing madrigals And I will make thee beds of roses, And a thousand fragrant posses, A cap of flowers and a kirtle Laibroidered all with leaves of myrtle,

A gown made of the finest wooll, Which from our pretty lambs we pull, Fair lined slippers for the cold With buckles of the purest gold,

A belt of straw and my buds, With cord clasps and amber studs And if these pleasures may thee move, Come live with me, and be my love.

The shepherd swains shall dance and sing, For thy delight, each May morning If these delights thy mind may move, Then live with me, and be my love

The Nymph's Reply

(By Sir Walter Raleigh.)

If all the world and love were voung, And truth in every shepher I's tongue, These pretty pleasures might me move To live with the., and be thy love

But Time drives flocks from field to fold, When rivers rage and rocks grow cold, And Philomel becometh dumb, The rest complains of cares to come.

The flowers do fade, and wan on fields Fo wayward winter reckoning yields, A honey tongue, a heart of gall, Is fancy's spring, but sorrows fall

Thy gowns, thy shoes, thy beds of roses, Thy cup, thy kirtle, and thy posses, Soon break, soon wither, soon forgotten, In folly ripe, in reason rotten

Thy belt of straw and my buds, Thy coral clasps and amber stude, All these in me no means can move To come to thee, and be thy love

But could youth last, and love still breed, Had joys no date, nor age no need, Then those delights my mind might move To live with thee, and be thy love

Richard Carew (1555-1620), of Antony House in East Cornwill, was bred at Christ Church, Oxford, but spent most of his life as in ictive and cultured country gentleman on his own estate. He was the first to essay in English rendering of Fisso, but of his translation—Godfrey of Lullergue or the Recoverie of Hierasalem—only five cantos appeared (1594). Carew kept much closer to his one in it thin I urfix did, was often correct where Fairfix blundered, and was sometimes (though seldom) is rhythmical. The apostrophe in the first book will serve for comparison with Fairfix's version (given below at page 445).

O Muse! thou that thy head not compase of With fading bayes which Helicon doth heare, But bove in skyes, amids the Quyers blest, Dost golden crowne of starres immortal werre, Celestiall flames breath thou into my brest, I nlighten thou my song, and pardon where I fainings weave with truth, and verse with art Of pleasings deckt, wherein thou hast no part

His entertaining Survey of Corn vall (1602) describes the minners and customs of the people, and gives a pretty full account, with specimens, of the Cornish language, then still spoken. He does not omit the 'common byword—By Irc, Pol, and Pen, you shall know the Cornishmen,' and then goes on to record a sad fact.

But the principall love and knowledge of this language lived in Doctor Kennall the civilian, and with him lyeth buryed for the English speach doth still encrocke upon it, and hath driven the same into the uttermost skirts of the shire. Most of the inhabitants can no word of Cornish, but very few are ignorant of the English and yet some so affect their owne as to a stranger they will not speake it for if meeting them by chance you enquire the way or any such matter, your answere shal be, Meea natidoa cowaasavaneek, 'I can speake no Saxonage. The English which they speake is good and pure as receiving it from the best hands of their owne gentry and the easterne marchants but they disgrace it in part with a broad and rude accent, and eclipsing (somewhat like the Somersetshire men) specially in pronouncing names.

His Epistle concerning the I xiellencies of the English Fongue (1605) is slight but interesting. He argues that in the four main points-significance, easiness, copiousness, and sweetness-'English is comparable if not preferable to any other in use at this day? The ground language 'appertameth to the old Saxon, and our having borrowed from the Dutch, the Britaine, the Roman, the Dane, the French, the Italian, the Spaniard,' so far from 'making Littletons hotch potch of our tongue or a Babelish confusion' is imply warranted by the results, especially by the copiousness secured (Littleton's Tenures, reproduced in 'Cole upon Littleton,' was long the standard authority on the branch of English Inw called Hotchpot) conclusion is

Moreover, the Copiousnesse of our Language appeareth in the diversitie of our Dialects for we have Court and we have Countrie English, we have Northerne and Southerne, grosse and ordinarie, which differ each from the other not onely in the Terminations, but also in many words, termes and phrases, and expresse the same thinges in divers sorts, yet all right English alike. Fulke Greville, Lord Brooke (1554-1628), born at Beauchamp Court, Warwickshire, from Shrewsbury passed to Jesus College, Cambridge, with his school friend Philip Sidney visited Heidelberg (1577), sat in parliament and held various offices under Elizabeth and James I, in 1603 was made a Knight of the Bath, and in 1620 Lord Brooke. He was stabbed by an old servant who had found he was not mentioned in his master's will, the man, struck with remorse, then slew himself Greville's tomb may still be seen in St Mary's Church at Warwick, with the em phatic epitaph written by himself 'Fulke Grevill. servant to Queene Elizabeth, conceller to King James, frend to Sir Philip Sidney' He was a thoughtful, sententious author both in prose and verse, though nearly all his productions were unpublished till after his death. Among them were a Life of Sidney, verse treatises on such subjects as learning, fame, war, monarchy, and religion, two tragedies, and Calica (109 sonnets) lyxiv, 'Farewell sweet boy, complaine not of my truth,' was reconstructed by Coleridge in his 'Farewell to Love' The whole works of Lord Brooke have been collected and edited by Dr A B Grosart (4 vols 1870), who has also published The Triend of Sir Philip Sidney (1895) stanzas from the Treatise on Monarchy describing the prehistoric age will show the dignified style of Fulke Greville's verse

There was a time before the times of Story
When Nature raign'd instead of Laws or Arts,
And mortal gods, with men made up the glory
Of one Republick by united hearts
Earth was the common seat, their conversation
In saving love, and our's in adoration

For in those golden days, with Nature's chains Both King and People seem'd conjoyn'd in one, Both nurst alike, with mutual feeding veins, Transcendency of either side unknown, Princes with men using no other arts But by good dealing to obtain good hearts

Power then maintaind it self even by those arts By which it grew as Justice, Labor, Love, keserved sweetness did it self impart Even unto slaves, yet kept it self above, And by a meck descending to the least, Enviless sway'd and govern'd all the rest.

Order there equal was, Time courts ordain'd To hear to judge, to execute, and make Few and good rules, for all griefs that complain'd Such care did princes of their people take Before this art of Power allay'd the Fruth So glorious of Man's greatness is the youth

What wonder was it then if those thrones found Thanks as exorbitant as v as their ment? Wit to give highest tributes, being bound And wound up by a princely ruling spirit. To worship them for their gods after death. Who in their life exceeded humane faith?

William Shakespeare.

Shakespeare, the greatest poet and drunatist not merely of the Elizabethan and Jacobean eras, but of any age or country, was born nearly six years after the accession of Queen Elizabeth. His life extended over fifty-two years, and when he died James I had occupied the throne of England for Of his elder literary contempo thirteen years. raries, Sir Walter Raleigh was his senior by tucke years, John Lyly and Richard Hooker each by ten years, Robert Greene by four, Francis Bacon by three, and Christopher Mirlowe, his tutor in tragedy, by only two months Of his younger contemporaries, Ben Jonson was his junior by nine years, John Fletcher by cleven Massinger by ninetecn, and Francis Beaumont by twenty Milton, who, from both chronological and critical points of vici, was next Shakespeare the greatest English poet, was born when Shakespeare was fort,-four years old, and was only contemporary with him for the first eight years of life

I The obscurity with which Shikespeare's biography has been long credited is greatly exaggerated 1 The mere biographical information accessible is far more definite and more abundant than that concorning any other dramatist of the day Shakespeares father, John Shakespeare, was a dealer in agricultural produce at Stratford on-Avon, a prosperous country town in the heart of England John Shakespeare was himself son of a small farmer residing in the neighbouring village of Snitterfield. The family was of good yeoman stock. Shakespeare's mother, Mary Arden, was also drughter of a local farmer who enjoyed somewhat greater wealth and social standing than the poet's father and his kindred. William Shakespeare, the cldest child that survived infancy, was baptised in the parish church of Stratford on-Avon on 26th April 1564

The poet was educated with a younger brother, Gilbert, at the public grammar-school of Stritfordan institution re established by Edward VI on a meditival foundation. The course of study was mainly confined to the Laun classics, and Shakespeare proved his familiarity with the Latin school books in use at Elizabethan grammar-schools by quoting many phrases from them in his earliest play, Love's Labour's Lost Until Shal espeare was thirteen years old his father's fortunes prospered Within that period John Shakespeare took a promment part in the municipal affairs of Stratford. After holding many inferior offices, he was elected an alderman in 1565, and in 1568 he became bailiff or mayor But about 1577 his business declined, and he was involved for many years afterwards in a series of pecuniary difficulties. As a consequence his eldest son was removed from school at the early age of thirteen or thereabouts, and was brought into the paternal business to buy and sell agricultural produce. But he was not destined to render his family much assistance in that capacity In 1582, when eighteen years old, he increased his father's anxieties by marrying wife Anne was daughter of Richard Hathaway, a farmer residing in the adjoining hamlet of Shottery She was no less than eight years her lover's senior There is good reason to believe that Shakespeare was a reluctant party to the marriage, to which he was driven by the lady's friends in order to protect her reputation The ceremony took place in November 1582, and a daughter, Susanna, was born in the following May A year later twins were born, a son and daughter, named respectively Hamnet and Judith. Shakespeare had no more children, and it is probable that in 1585 he left his family at Stratford to seek a livelihood elsewhere, and for some twelve years saw little or nothing of his wife and children

A credible tradition assigns the immediate cause of Shakespeare's abandonment of his country home to a poaching adventure in Sir Thomas Lucy's park at Charlecote, which is situated within five miles of Stratford It is related that he was caught there in the act of stealing deer and rabbits, and was ordered to be whipped and imprisoned by the owner, Sir Thomas Lucy Shakespeare is reported to have penned bitter verses (which have not survived) on his prosecutor, and Lucy's threat of further punishment is said to have finally driven Shakespeare from Stratford He subsequently avenged himself on Sir Thomas Lucy by caricaturing him as Justice Shallow in the Second Part of Henry IV and The Warry Wives of Winasor

There is a further tradition that Shakespeare on leaving Stratford served as schoolmaster in an adjacent village. But there is little doubt that at an early date in 1586, when twenty-two years old, he travelled on foot to London, passing through Oxford on the way. It was with the capital city of the country that the flower of his literary life was to be identified. London was chiefly his home during the twenty-three years that elapsed between 1586 and 1609, between the twenty-third and forty-sixth years of his age.

Probably only one resident in London was already known to him on his arrival—Richard Field, who some seven years before had left Stratford to be bound apprentice to the London printer Vautrollier Field subsequently printed for Shakespeare the earliest work that he sent to press. On his settlement in the metropolis Shakespeare sought a living at the theatre. It is said that at first he tended visitors' horses outside a playhouse. In a very short time he was employed inside the playhouse, probably as call-boy, but opportunity of trying his skill as an actor was given him, and he stood the test sufficiently well to gain speeds admission to one of the chief acting companies of the day The acting company to which Shakespeare was admitted may with safety be identified with that under the patronage of Queen Elizabeth's favourite, the Larl of Leicester, on Leicesters death in 1588 the patronage of the company, which implied a nicrely nominal relationship, passed in succession to Lord Strange, afterwards Earl of Derby (d 1594), to Lord Hunsdon, Lord Chamberluin (d 1596), to Lord Hunsdon's son, also Lord Chamberlain, and finally, on Queen Elizabeth's death in 1603, to the new king, James I Shakespeare's company, which at the time he joined it was known is Lord Leicester's players, afterwards bore the successive titles of Lord Strange's company (1588-92), the Lord Cham berlun's company (1592-96, Lord Hunsdon's company (1596-97), again the Lord Chamberlain's company (1597-1603), and finally of the King's company from the accession of James I in 1603. When he joined the company it was doubtless performing at The Theatre, the earliest play house built in England, it was erected in Shoreditch in 1576 by James Burbage, father of the great actor, Richard Burbage. While the compiny was under Lord Strange's patronage it found new quarters in the Rosc, a theatre built in 1592 on the Bankside, Southwark. This was the earliest scene of Shakespeare's conspicuous successes alike as actor and dramatist. During 1594 Shakespeare frequented for a short time the stage of mother new theatre at Newington Butts, ind between 1595 and 1599 the stages of the oldest playhouses in the kingdom—the Curtain and The Theatre in Shoreditch In 1599 yet another new thertre was built on the Bankside, Southwark. this was the famous Globe Theatre, an octagonal With that theatre Shakewooden structure speare's professional career was almost exclusively identified for the rest of his life, and in its profits he acquired an important share. At the close of 1609, when his theatrical career was nearing its end, Shakespeare's company occupied a second stage in addition to that of the Globe-the stage of the Blackfriars Theatre

Acting companies in Shakespeare's day soldom remained in London during the summer or early autumn. They toured in the provinces, and it is reasonable to suppose that Shakespeare visited many English towns in his capacity of a travelling actor. There is small foundation for the conjecture that he extended his journeys to Scotland, and practically none for the view that he visited the Continent, although several companies of Finglish actors are known to have performed at foreign courts.

Little information survives of the exact roles which Shakespeare undertook. Few extant documents refer directly to performances by him. But it Christmas 1594, it is important to note, he joined William Kemp, the chief comedian of the day, and Richard Burbage, the greatest tragic actor, in 'two several coincides or interludes' which were played on St Stephen's Day and on Innocents' Day (December 27 and 28) at Greenwich Palace before the queen Shakespeare's appearance at court for the first time on this occasion in 1594 sufficiently indicates his growing fame in the worlds alike of fashion and the theatre Subsequently his name heads the list of original performers in Ben Jonson's Every Van in his Humour (1598), and he was one of the original performers in Jonson's Sejanus (1603) dramatist's early biographer, Nicholas Rowe, recorded the performance by Shikespeare of 'the Ghost in his own Hamlet, and John Davies of Hereford noted that 'he played some kingly parts in sport.' One of Shakespeare's younger brothers, presumably Gilbert, recalled at a long subsequent date his brother's performance of Adam in As You In the 1623 folio edition of Shakespearc's 'Works,' his own name headed the prefatory list of 'the principall actors in these playes'

II But it is not his histrionic activity that lends real interest to Shakespeare's name or history, it is his unmatchable achievement in dramatic His earliest experience as a dramatic writer was gained in the way of revising plays by other writers who had sold their works to the minnager of his company. Much that thus came from his pen in his early days has possibly remained concealed in plays attributed to other In a few cases, however, his labours as authors revisor were publicly acknowledged or have been detected by critics, they have usually proved to be so thorough that the revised compositions are entitled to rank among original efforts difficult to fix precisely the date at which his dramatic writing, whether as reviser or independent author, began It is probable that the whole of it was done between 1591 and 1611 that time he apparently produced on the average two new or adapted plays each year

The exact order in which Shakespeare's Plays were written cannot be given with any cert unty Only sixteen of the thirty-seven plays commonly assigned to him were published in his lifetime, and the date of publication rarely indicates the date of composition a piece was often published many years after it was written. But the subject matter and metre both afford rough clues to the period in the dramatist's lifetime to which the play may be referred. Although Shakespeare's songs and poems prove him a master of lyric verse of varied metres, all but a small fragment of his dramatic work is in blank verse, and Shikespeare's blank verse underwent much change in construction in the course of his career his earlier years he strictly adhered to formal rules of pruse and stress, the lines are clearly marked off from one another by an inevitable rest after the fifth accented syllable. same time rhyming couplets are frequent tastic conceits and puns or plays upon words constantly recur In Shakespeare's matured work few of these features find a place. The poet ignores the artificial restrictions imposed by the He varies the pauses of his laws of prosody blank-verse lines indefinitely, in order that they may respond to every call of human feeling Unemphatic syllables often end the lines, and The flexibility or render stress there impossible pliancy is increased by the introduction of extrametrical syllables at the end of lines or occasionally in the middle. In later plays rhyme almost entirely disappears

The following passages illustrate the main differences in the character of Shakespeare's early and late blank-verse. The first extract is from Love's Labour's Lost (Act II. sc. 1. ll 9-19)

Boyd Be now as produgal of all dear grace, As Nature was in making graces dear, When she did starve the general world beside, And produgally gave them all to you.

Princess Good Lord Boyet, my beauty, though but mean,

Needs not the painted flourish of your praise Beauty is bought by judgement of the eye, Not uttered by base sale of chapmen's tongues I am less proud to hear you tell my worth Than you much willing to be counted wise In spending your wit in the praise of mine.

The next extract is from one of the very latest plays, The lempest (Act v sc 1. ll 153-171)

Prospero I perceive, these lords At this encounter do so much admire, That they devour their reason, and scarce think Their eyes do offices of truth, their words Are natural breath but, howsoe'er you have Been justled from your senses, know for certain That I am Prospero, and that very duke Which was thrust forth of Milan, who most strangely Upon this shore, where you were wreck'd, was landed, To be the lord on 't. No more yet of this, For 'tis a chronicle of day by day, Not a relation for a breakfast, nor Befitting this first meeting Welcome, sir, This cell's my court here have I few attendants, And subjects none abroad pray you, look in. My dukedom since you have given me again, I will requite you with as good a thing, At least bring forth a wonder, to content ye, As much as me my dukedom

At the same time it is noticeable that nearly a third of Shakespeare's dramatic work is in proce, which, commonly lucid and pointed and free from diffusences or ornament, shows no radical change in character at any period of his career. A study of Shakespeare's prose does not materially help the student in determining the chronology of the plays. The only fact about his use of prose that is of much importance in this connection is that prose figures to a larger extent in the work of middle life than in that of his early or late years. It is not always easy to determine the principles which governed Shakespeare's employment of prose in place of metre, but in the writings of his middle life he almost invariably placed it in the mouths of the humorous or 'low-comedy' characters (e.g. Falstaff), of the spokesmen of mobs, of clowns, fools, and of ladies when they are speaking confidentially to one another, letters and quoted documents are usually in prose. How admirably terse and direct could be Shakespeare's epistolary style may be judged from Macbeth's letter to his wife (Macbeth, Act I sc v l. 1)

They met me in the day of success, and I have learned by the perfectest report, they have more in them than mortal knowledge. When I burned in desire to question them further, they made themselves air, into which they vanished. Whiles I stood rapt in the wonder of it, came missives from the king who all hailed me 'Thane of Cawdor,' by which title, before, these weird sisters saluted me, and referred me to the coming on of time, with 'Hail, king that shalt be!' This have I thought good to deliver thee, my dearest partner of greatness, that thou mightst not lose the dues of rejoicing, by being ignorant of what greatness is promised thee. Lay it to thy heart, and farewell

As in his treatment of metre, so in his choice and handling of subject-matter, differences are discern ible in Shakespeare's plays which clearly suggest the gradual but steady development of dramatic power and temper, and separate with some defi niteness early from late work. The comedles of Shakespeare's younger days often trench upon the domains of farce, those of his middle and later life approach the domain of tragedy Tragedy in his hands markedly grew, as his years advanced, in subtlety and intensity His tragic themes became more and more compley and betrayed deeper and deeper knowledge of the workings of human passion In one respect only was Shakespeare's method unchangeable From first to last it wis his habit to borrow his plots, though he freely altered and adapted them to suit his growing sense of artistic fitness The range of literature which he studied in his search for tales whereon to build his dramas was extraordinarily wide He con sulted not merely chronicles of English history (Ralph Holinshed's, for example), on which he based his English historical plays, but he was widely read in the romances of Italy (mainly in French or English translations), in the biogra phies of Plutarch, and in the plays and romances of English contemporaries His Roman plays of Julius Cæsar, Antony and Cleopatra, and Corrolanus closely follow the narratives of the Greek biographer A romance by his contemporary, Thomas Lodge, suggested the fable of As You Like It Novels by Bandello are the ultimate sources of the stories of Romeo and Juliet, Much Ado about Nothing, and Twelfth Night All's Well that Ends Well and Cymbeline largely rest on foundations laid by Boccaccio, the tales of Othello and Measure for Measure are traceable to Giraldi Cinthio Belleforest's Histoires Tragiques, a collection of French versions of the Italian romances of Bandello, was often in Shakespeare's hands. But although Shalespeare's borrowings were large and open handed, his debt was greater in appearance than reality. His power of assimilation was exceptionally strong, and the books that he read can only be likened to base ore on which he brought to bear the magic of his genius, with the result that he transmuted it into gold.

Loca's Labour's Lost, to which may be assigned priority in point of time of all Shakespeare's dr im itie productions, mily, from internal cyidence, be illotted to 1501. It contains 1028 five measure rhyming lines out of a total of 2789, and puns The names of the chief arc ver numerous characters are drawn from the leaders in the civil war in Irance, which was in progress between 1509 and 1594, and many matters that were then occupying the minds of those who moved in fashionable and political circles are touched upon picci is conceived in an airy vein of good-humoured satire, but genuine poetic feeling breaks forth in the speeches of the hero, Biron (cf. Act IV sc. iii 11. 289-365) The play was revised in 1597, probibly for a performance at court, and was first published in the following year Shakespeare's name there first appeared on a title-page as that of author of a play

The Two Gertlemen of Verona, a comedy of love and friendship, belongs to the same period. The story resembles one in the Spanish pastoral romance of Diana, by George de Montemayor There is much fascinating poetry in the serious portions of the play, but the note is often lyric rather than dramatic—a sure sign of youthful composition. There is a lyrical irrelevancy, for example, in much of Julia's ingentious plea in favour of letting her love for Proteus have full play (Act II se vii Il 24-38)

The more thou damm'st it up, the more it burns. The current that with gentle murmur glides, Thou know'st, being stopp d, impatiently doth rage, But when his fair course is not hindered, He makes sweet music with the enamell'd stones, Or ing a gentle 1 is to every sedge. He overtaketh in his pillgrimage, And so by many winding nooks he strays, With willing sport, to the wild ocean then let me go, and hinder not my course. I il he as patient as a gentle stream, And male a pastime of each weary step, fill the list step have brought me to my love, An I there I'll rest, as after much turmoil A b'e sed soul doth in Elysium.

The Pro Gentlemen was first published in the first tolio edition of the vorks in 1023.

Shikespeare's next play, The Comedy of Trrois, doo in a published in 1623, was for the most part a hoisterous farce, resembling in subject-matter the Meracum of Plantus. But the impressive de outment that a see, if in which the shrewish a fee Adrian's confesses her sine against her husband, and is solumnly rebuked by the Abbess, is in the finest spirit of sober and restrained comedy. The speech of the Abbess is especially noteworthy (Act V sc. 1 ll. 68-86)

Albert The venom clamours of a realous woman Poisons more deadly than a mad dog's tooth. It seems his sleeps were hinder'd by thy ruling And thereof comes it that his head is light Thou say'st his meat was sauced with thy upbraidings Unquiet meals make ill digestions, Thereof the raging fire of fever bred, And what's a fever but a fit of madness? Thou say st his sports were hinder'd by thy brawls Sweet recreation barr'd, what doth ensue But moody [moping] and dull melancholy, Kinsman to grim and comfortless despair, And at her heels a huge infectious troop Of pale distemperatures and focs to life? In food, in sport, and life preserving rest To be disturb'd, would mad or man or beast The consequence is, then, thy jealous fits Have scared thy husband from the use of wits.

It was after the production of these plays, which show great but not unparalleled ability, that Shake speare produced his first tragedy, Romeo and Juliet The work gave conclusive evidence of a poetic and dramatic instinct of unprecedented quality trigic poem on the theme of love it has no rival in any literature. It was based upon a tragic romance of Italian origin, which was already popular in English versions (see pages 262, 263) The date of composition may, perhaps, be gathered from the Nurse's speech, "Tis since the earthquake now eleven years' No earthquake had been experienced in England in the sixtcenth century after 1580, and a few parallelisms with Daniel's Complainte of Rosamond, published in 1501, seem to point to its completion in that year An anonymous and surreptitious quarto edition was published in 1597 and an authentic quarto appeared in 1599. The speech of Romeo at the tomb of Julict before he drinks the poison illustrates the intensity of Shakespeare's dramatic feeling and insight at this early stage in his career (Act V sc iii ll 91-120)

O my love! my wife! Death, that hath suck'd the honey of thy breath, Hath had no power yet upon thy beauty Thou art not conquer d, beauty's ensign yet Is crimson in thy lips and in thy checks, And death's pale flag is not advanced there Lybalt, hest thou there in thy bloody sheet? O, what more favour can I do to thee Than with that hand that cut thy youth in twain To sunder his that was thing enemy? Forgisc me, cousin! Ah, dear Juliet, Why art thou yet so fur? shall I believe That unsubstantial death is amorous, And that the lean abhorred monster keeps Thee here in dark to be his paramour? For fear of that, I still will stay with thee, And never from this palace of dim night Depart again here, here will I remain

With worms that are thy chambermaids, O, here Will I set up my everlasting rest,
And shake the yoke of inauspicious stars.

From this world wearied flesh. Eyes, look your last!

Arms, take your last embrace! and, lips, O you The doors of breath, seal with a righteous kiss.

A dateless bargain to engrossing death!

Come, bitter conduct, come, unsavoury guide!

Thou desperate pilot, now at once run on The dashing rocks thy sea sick weary bark.

Here's to my love! [Drinks] O true apothecary!

Thy drugs are quick. Thus with a kiss I dies.

With characteristic versatility Shakespeare soon turned his attention to a very different species of dramatic v ork-the dramatisation of episodes in The first efforts in this kind English history with which his name can be associated—the three parts of Henry VI -were versions of other men's works which he had revised. They mainly treat of the civil wars in progress during the reign of the politically weak and superstitious king, On March 3, 1592, Henry VI, the Henry VI piece subsequently known as The First Part of Henry VI., was acted at the Rose Theatre by Lord Strange's company of actors A second piece in continuation of the theme quickly followed, and a third, treating of the concluding incidents of Henry VI's reign, was played in the early The first of the three plays, which autumn was originally published in the collected edition of Shakespeare's works, shows sparse marks of Shakespeare's workmanship It was probably a hasty revision by Marlowe and Shakespeare of a crude and clumsy piece of independent origin Shakespearc's genuine thought and expression arc visible in such a brilliant passage as (I Henry VI, Act 1 sc 11. 11 133-5)

> Glory is like a circle in the water, Which never ceaseth to enlarge itself Lill by broad spreading it disperse to nought

But very few scenes bear the impress of his style, the rest, including the barbarous handling of the story of Joan of Arc, are from a far inferior pen. The second and third parts of Henry VI, which were first connected with Shakespeare's name on their publication in the First Folio, had been printed previously under other titles, and in forms very different from that which they subsequently assumed in the First Folio The second part of Shakesperre's Henry VI was first published in 1594 with the title The first part of the contention b trust the two famous houses of Yorke and Lineas'er, and the third part was printed in 1595 as Ine true tragedie of Richard, Duke of Yorke There seems little doubt that The first part of the contention and The True Tragedie were by Marlowe aided by Shakespeare, but were not themselves original compositions, being liberally constructed out of older pieces now lost The second and third parts of Henry 11, as they figure in the First Folio, were doubtless the outcome of a further revision of the Contention and True Tragedie, for which Shakespeare may be held to have been mainly responsible. One of the most notable amplifications of the True Tragedie is the touching soliloquy, while the battle of Towton is raging, of Henry VI, who there pathetically contrasts the happiness of a shepherd's life with that of a king (3 Henry VI, Act II see, v II 21-54)

O God ' methinks it were a happy life, To be no better than a homely swam, To sit upon a hill, as I do now, To carse out dials quaintly, point by point, Thereby to see the initutes how they run, How many make the hour full complete, How many hours bring about the day, How many days will finish up the year, How many years a mortal man may live. When this is known, then to divide the times So many hours must I tend my flock, So many hours must I take my rest. So many hours must I contemplate, So many hours must I sport myself, So many days m, ewes have been with young, So many weeks cre the poor fools will ean, So many years ere I shall shear the fleece So minutes, hours, days, months, and years, Pass d over to the end they were created, Would bring white hairs unto a quiet grave. Ah, what a life were this ' how sweet ' how lovely ! Gives not the hawthorn bush a sweeter shade To shepherds looking on their silly sheep, Than doth a rich embroider d canopy To king, that fear their subjects' treachery? O, yes, it doth, a thousand fold it doth. And to conclude, the shepherd's homely curds, His cold thin drink out of his leather bottle, His wonted sleep under a fresh tree's shade, All which secure and sweetly he enjoys, Is far beyond a prince's delicates, His viands sparkling in a golden cup. His body couched in a curious bed. When care, mistrust, and treason waits on him

Shakespeare's final revision of the trilogy of plays dealing with the reign of Henry VI met with a triumphant reception on the stage. older dramatists grew jealous, and in the autumn of 1592 one of them, Robert Greene, denounced the younger dramatist in A Groats worth of Wit as 'an upstart crow beautified with our feathers, that with his Tygers heart wrapt in a players hide supposes he is as well able to bumbast out a blanke verse as the best of you, and being an absolute Johannes factotum is, in his own con ceit, the only Shake scene in a countrie.' The italicised words parody a line in 3 Henry VI (Act 1 sc. iv L 137), 'Oh Tigers heart wrapped in The publisher of Greene's illa woman's hide' natured attack on Shakespeare, Henry Chettle, it the end of the year apologised to the young vriter for the rancour of Greenes pen in the prefice to a tract called Kird Hartes Dreame. Chettle frankly acknowledged Shakespeare's civility of demeanour, excellence in his quality of actor, uprightness of dealing, and facetious grace in writing'

Shakespeare pursued the path which he first essayed in the plays of Henry VI in the two tragedies that succeeded them—Richard III and Richard III and Richard III for Richard III Shakespeare plainly shows a conscious resolve to follow in Marlowe's footsteps. The tragedy takes up the history near the point at which the third part of Henry VI left it. The hero's hypoerisy is pictured with much from The study of victous ambition is rarely relieved by poetic passages, but a peculiarly Shakespearean outburst of poetic sentiment characterises the description by Tyrrel of the murder of the princes in the lower 'Act IV so in 11 4-22)

Dishton and Forrest, whom I did suborn To do this ruthless piece of butchers Although they were flesh d villams, bloody dogs, Melting with tenderness and kind compassion Wept like two children in their deaths, sad stories, Lo, thus, quoth Dighton, 'lay those tender babes' 'Thus thu,' quoth Forrest 'girdling one another Within their innocent alabaster arms Their lips were four red to es on a stalk, Which in their summer beauty kiss'd each other A bool of prayers on their pillow lay Which once,' quoth Forrest, 'almost changed my mind But O! the devil -there the villain stopp'd, Whilst Dighton thus told on "We smothered The most replenished sweet work of nature That from the prime creation c'er she framed Thus both are gone with conscience and remorse, They could not speak, and so I left them both, To bring this tidings to the bloody king

Richard II seems to have followed Richard III is ithout delay, and here again the influence of Marlowe is strongly marked. Marlowe's Educard II clearly inspired Richard II. The sober note of patriotism and of reverence for the best traditions of the country, which was characteristic of all Shakespeare's historical plays, was sounded with exceptional effect in John of Gaunt's dying speech (Act II see all 31-68)

Methinks I am a prophet new in pired And thus expuring do foretell of him His rash fierce bluze of riot cannot last, Lor violent fires soon burn out themselves Small showers last long but sudden storms are short, He tires betimes that spurs too fast betimes, With easer feeding food doth choke the feeder Light vinity, in-attate cormorant, Consuming means, soon preys upon itself This royal throne of kings, this scepter d isle, Time earth of majesty, this seat of Mars, This other Eden, demi paradisc This fertre's built by Nature for herself Against infection and the hand of war, This I zopy breed of men, this little world, This precious is one set in the silver sen, Which serves it in the office of a wall Or is a most defense a to a host Against if e easy of less happ or lands

This blessed plot, this earth, this realm, this England, This nurse, this teening womb of royal kings, Fear'd by their breed and famous by their birth, Renowned for their deeds as far from home, For Christian Lervice and true chivalry, As is the sepulchre in stubborn Jewry Of the world's ransom, blessed Mary's Son, This land of such dear souls, this dear dear land, Dear for her reputation through the world, Is now leased out-I die pronouncing it-Like to a tenement or pelting farm Lugland, bound in with the triumphant sea, Whose rocky shore beats back the envious siege Of watery Neptune, is now bound in with shane, With inky blots and rotten parchment bonds That England, that was wont to conquer others, Hath made a shameful conquest of itself Ah, would the scandal vanish with my life, How happy then were my ensuing death '

Both Richard III and Richard II were published anonymously in 1597. Between February 1593 and the end of the year the London theatres were closed owing to the plague, but Shake speare's pen was busily employed, and 1594 probably proved more prolific than any other year of his life. Fo it may be assigned the greater part of three plays—Titus Andronicus, The Merchant of Venice, and King John

Titus Andronicus, a sanguinary and revolting picture of the decadence of imperial Rome, was probably only in part Shakespeare's work was suggested by a piece called Ittus and Vespasian, which was acted by Lord Stringe's men in 1592, and is now only extant in a German version published in 1620 Titus Andronicus was acted by the Earl of Sussey's men on January 23, 1593-4, as a 'new' piece It was subsequently performed by Shakespeare's company Internal evidence suggests that Kyd wrote much of But there are many powerful passages for which Shakespeare alone could have been re-The heart rending speech in which the hero laments the ruin that overtakes his children contains such lines as these (Act III sc. 1 ll 93-97)

For now I stand as one upon a rock, Environ'd with a wilderness of sea Who marks the waxing tide grow wave by wave, Expecting ever when some envious surge Will in his brinish bowels swallow him.

Then, turning to his tongueless daughter, he adds (161d, ll 111-113)

When I did name her brothers, then fresh tears Stood on her cheeks, as doth the honey-dew Upon a gather'd hij almost wither'd

In The Merchant of Lenice Shakespeare showed to splendid advantage his power of investing ancient legends with genuinely dramatic point and poetry. See Giovanni's Il Pecorone, a four-teenth-century collection of Italian novels, supplied him with the main plot of the pound of flesh.

Stephen Gosson, in his Schoole of Abuse (1579), mentions a lost play called The Jew, in which apparently the tales of the pound of flesh and the casl ets were combined. Robert Wilson's extent play of the Three Ladies of London roughly inticipated some of Shakespeare's scenes between the Jewish creditor Shylock and his debtor Antonio Shakespeare's Jew is a far subtler study of Jewish character than Marlowe achieved in his few of Malta, and the delicate comedy which relieves the serious interest attaching to Shylock's fate lay wholly out of Marlowe's reach Shakespeare, in the Merchant of Vinice, betrayed the last definible traces of his discipleship to Marlowe. Marlowe's few of Malta was the forerunner of Shylock, although the topic was doubtless immediately suggested to Shakespeare by the popular excitement iroused in London by the recent execution of the queen's Jewish physici in, Roderigo Lopez. Passages notable for high poetic feeling and for eloquent ratiocination abound in the Herchant of Venice Shylock's clum to be treated as a man, Portin's plea for mercy, Lorenzo's speech on the power of music, and Bassanio's exposure of the deceitfulness of appearances illustrate the play's wealth of thought and beauty of language. One of the most beautiful passages is the speech in which Portia accepts the suit of her lover Bassanio (Act III sc. ii 11 149-175)

You see me, Lord Bassanio, where I stand, Such as I am though for myself alone I would not be ambitious in my wish To wish myself much better, yet, for you I would be trobled twenty times myself, A thousand times more fair, ten thousand times More rich , That only to stand high in your account, I might in virtues, beauties, livings, friends, Exceed account, but the full sum of me Is sum of something, which, to term in gross Is an unlesson'd girl, unschool'd, unpractised, Happy in this, she is not yet so old But she may learn, happier than this, She is not bred so dull but she can learn, Happiest of all is that her gentle spirit Commits itself to yours to be directed, As from her lord, her governor, her king Myself and what is mine to you and yours Is now converted but now I was the lord Of this fair mansion, master of my servants, Queen o er myself, and even now, but now, This house, these servants, and this same myself Are yours, my lord I give them with this ring, Which when you part from, lose, or give away, Let it presage the min of your love, And be my vantage to exclaim on you.

The Merchant of Lence may have been first produced under the name of the Venesyon Comeds, on August 25, 1594. It was revised later, and was not published until 1600, when two editions appeared, each printed from a different stage copy

Lurning once again to English history, Shake speare, also in 1594, adapted his drama of King John from a worthless play called The Troublesome Raigne of King John (1591) old piece was fraudulently reissued in 1611 as 'written by W Sh,' and in 1622 as by 'W Shike speare.' The three chief characters in Shakespeare's King John-the mean and cruel king, the desperately wronged and passionate Constance, and the soldierly humorist Fulconbridge-are in all essentials Shakespeare's own invention Arthur boyish emotion is portrayed with a freshness and truthfulness that are scarcely known clscwhere in dramitic literature As in other of Shakespeare's historical plays, the general citect of the tragic history of King John is to instil a reasonable and honourable patriotism, to which the Bastard's concluding lines give very cloquent expression (Act v sc vii 1 112-end)

This I rigland never did, nor ever shall,
Lie at the proud foot of a conqueror,
But when it first did help to wound itself
Now these her princes are come home again,
Come the three corners of the world in arms,
And we shall shock them—Nought shall make us rue
If Lugland to itself do rest but true.

III At the same epoch in his career (1591-4) as saw those remarkable efforts in the drama, Shakespeare also wrote and published two Narrative Poems, both of which paraphrased with inclodious fluency Ovidian themes of somewhat laservious tendency. In May 1593 Richard Field, Shake speare's fellow-townsman, published the first poem, I caus and Adons. The character of the verse may be illustrated by Venus's lament over the body of the dead Adons (Il 1075-1080)

Alas, poor world, what treasure hast thou lost!
What face remains alive that's worth the viewing?
Whose tongue is music now? what canst thou boast
Of things long since or any thing ensuing?
The flowers are sweet, their colours fresh and trim
But true sweet beauty lived and died with him

No name appeared on the title page, but there was a fully-signed dedication addressed to a brilliant voung nobleman, Henry Wriothesley, third Earl of Southampton. A year later Shake-speare's poem of Luciece appeared, and it too was dedicated to the Earl of Southampton. A more serious note is often sounded here than in the earlier poem, and there are many reflections on human affairs which embody convictions cherished by Shakespeare through life, for example (Il 1240-1246)

For men have marble, women waxen, mind, And therefore are they formed as marble will, The weak oppress'd, the impression of strange kinds. Is formed in them by force, by fraud, or skill. Then call them not the authors of their ill. No more than wax shall be accounted exil. Wherein is stamp'd the semblance of a devil.

Fiese two volumes constituted Shakespeare's first appeal to the reading public, and they were welcomed with unqualified enthusiasm. Spenser and other contemporary men of letters panegyrised the genus which the poems betrayed. The general reader showed himself no less appreciative. No fewer than seven editions of Venus appeared between 1594 and 1602, and an eighth followed in 1607. Lucrece ichieved a fifth edition in the veir of Shal espeare's death

In other directions Shall espeare was strengthening his position and reputation. He was gaining personal esteem in influential quarters outside the circles of actors and men of letters Lid of Southampton, as the dedicatory addresses before his narrative poems show, had become his acknowledged patron. His 'civil demeanour' recommended him to the habitues of the court, and his summons to act before Queen Elizabeth at Christmas 1594 indicated the courtiers' personal Thenceforth his plays were interest in him frequently performed before the queen by himself and his fellow ictors it her palaces of Whitehall, Richmond, and Greenwich, and his recognition is the greatest poet and dramatist of the day stendily grev

The bulk of Shakespeare's sounces were, doubtless, written in 1594, soon after he had sought and won the patronage of the Earl of At that date the sonnet enjoyed Southampton a popularity among poets in England that has never been equalled. Shakespeare characteristically tried his hand on the popular poetic instrument when its vogue was at its height. metrical form of his sonnets is that peculiar to the Inglish sonneteers (three decasyllabic quatrains, each rhyming ilternately, and a concluding rhyming couplet). In literary value the estant collection is notably unequal, but the best examples reach leacls of lyric melody and meditative energy that ire not matched elsewhere in poetry Among the finest of 5h il espeare's sonnets are these

When to the sessions of sweet silent thought
I summon up remembrance of things past,
I sight the lack of many a thing I sought,
And with old woes new wail my dear time s waste.
Then can I drown an eye, unused to flow,
I or precious friends hid in death's dateless night,
And weep afresh love's long since cancelled woe,
And moan the expense of many a vanish'd sight.
If on can I grieve at grievances foregone,
And heavily from woe to voe tell o'er.
The sad account of fore bemouned moan,
Which I new pay as if not paid before.
But if the while I think on thee, dear friend,

I all man, a glonous morning have I seen.

Flatter the mountain tops with covereign eye,

Fig. 11 a with 50 fen face the meado vs green,

Gilding pale streams vith heavenly alchemy,

All loses are retored and sorrous end.

Anon permit the basest clouds to ride.

With ugly rack on his celestial face,
And from the forlorn world his visage hide,
Stealing unseen to west with this disgrace.

Liven so my sun one early morn did shine.

With all triumphant splendour on my brow,
But, out, alack he was but one hour mine,
The region cloud both mask'd him from me now
Yet him for this my love no whit disdaineth.

What is your substance, whereof are you made,
That millions of strange shadows on you tend?
Since every one hath, every one, one shade,
And you, but one, can every shadow lend.
Describe Adonis, and the counterfeit
Is poorly imitated after you,
On Helen's check all art of beauty set,
And you in Greeian tires are painted new Speak of the spring and foison of the year,
The one doth shadow of your beauty show,
The other as your bounty doth appear,
And you in every blessed shape we know
In all external grace you have some part,
But you like none, none you, for constant heart.

CZVI

Let me not to the marriage of true minds
Admit impediments Love is not love
Which alters when it alteration finds,
Or bends with the remover to remove
O, no! it is an ever fixed mark,
That looks on tempests and is never shaken,
It is the star to every wandering bark,
Whose worth's unknown, although his height betaken
Love's not Time's fool, though rosy lips and cheeks
Within his bending sickle's compass come,
Love alters not with his brief hours and weeks,
But bears it out even to the edge of doom
If this be error and upon me proved,
I never writ, nor no man ever loved.

On the other hand, some of Shakespeare's sonnets sink almost into mainty beneath the burden of quibbles and conceits. Take, for example

LVI

Mine eye and heart are at a mortal war,

How to divide the conquest of thy sight,

Mine eye my heart thy picture's sight would bar,

My heart mine eye the freedom of that right

My heart doth plead, that thou in him dost lie,

A closet never pierced with crystal eyes,

But the defendant doth that plea deny,

And says in him thy fair appearance lies

To 'cide this title is impanneled

A quest of thoughts, all tenants to the heart,

And by their verdict is determined

The clear eye's mosety and the dear heart's part As thus, mine eye's due is thine outward part, And my heart's right thine inward love of heart

There is no evidence that the order in which the sonnets vere first printed followed the order in which they were written. The same train of thought is at times pursued continuously through two or more sonnets, and thus the collection resembles a series of independent poems, some in a varying number of fourteen-line stanzas. But, beyond the fact that the vein throughout is more or less amorous, there is no close logical continuity in the arrangement of the whole. The majority of the sonnets, numbered 1 to cxxvi, are addressed to a young man, and most of the remaining twenty-six poems are addressed to a woman, but both groups include meditative soliloquies in the sonnet-form which are addressed to no person at all.

The sonnets of Shakespeare's contemporaries were for the most part literary exercises, reflecting the influence of French and Italian sonneteers Genuine emotion or the virter's personal expenence very rarely inspired them At a first glance a far larger proportion of Shakespeare's sonnets give the reader the illusion of personal confessions than those of any contemporary, but when allowance has been made for the current conventions of Elizabethan sonneteering, as well as for Shakespeare's unapproached affluence in dramatic instinct and invention-which enabled him to identify himself with every phase of human emotion-the autobiographic element in his sonnets, although it may not be dismissed altogether, is seen to shrink to comparatively slender proportions He borrows very many contemporary sonneteers' words and thoughts, although he so fused them with his fancy as often to transfigure them A personal note may have escaped him in the sonnets in which he gives voice to a sense of melancholy and self remorse, but his dramatic instinct never slept, and there is no positive proof that he is doing more, even in those sonnets, than to produce dramatically the illusion of a personal confession For example, in the numerous sonnets in which Shakespeare boasted that his verse was so certain of immortality that it was capable of immortalising the person to whom it was addressed, he gave voice to no involuntary evaluation of his own spirit or spontaneous ebullition of his own feeling was merely handling a theme that Ronsard and Desportes, emulating Pindar, Horace, Ovid, and other classical poets, had lately made a commonplace of the poetry of Europe, and a formal topic among all English sonneteers The imitative element is hardly less conspicuous in most of the sonnets that Shakespeare distinctly addresses to a woman

Only in one group, composed of six sonnets scattered through the collection, is there traceable a strand of wholly original sentiment, boldly projecting from the web into which it is wrought. This series of six sonnets deals with a love adventure of no normal type. Sonnet cally opens with the lines

Two loves I have of comfort and despair, Which like two spirits do suggest [i.e. prompt] me still The better angel is a man right fair, The worser spirit a woman colour d ill. The woman, the sonneteer continues, has corrupted the man and drawn him from his side other sonnets treat the same theme addressed to the man (l, xli, and lii) the poet mildly reproaches his youthful friend for having sought and won favours of a woman whom he himself loved 'dearly,' but the trespass is forgiven on account of the friend's youth and beauty the two remaining sonnets (cxxxiii. and cxxxii) the poet addresses the woman, and rebukes her for having enslaved not himself but 'his next self'his friend It is conceivable that these six sonnets rest on a genuine experience of the poet, although a half jesting reference to the amorous adventure, which would deprive it of very serious import, was possibly made to it at the time by a literary comrade A poem that was licensed for publication on September 3, 1594, was published immediately under the title of IVillobie his Avisa, or the True Picture of a Modest Maid and of a Chaste and Constant Wife There, a character, described as 'the old player W S,' doubtless Shakespeare himself, mocks a rejected lover because, he evplains at length, he has just recovered his own equanimity after much suffering from feminine caprice

But if few of Shakespeare's sonnets can safely be regarded as autobiographical revelations of sentiment, many of them offer evidence of the relations in which he stood to a patron, and of the position that he sought to fill in the circle of that patron's literary clients There is no difficulty in detecting the lineaments of the Earl of Southampton in those of the man who is distinctively greeted in the sonnets as the poet's sole patron. That the Earl of Southampton was Shakespeare's only patron is not merely suggested by the terms in which the poet dedicated to him each of his two narrative poems, Venus and Adoms and Lucrece, but by the tradition handed down by Sir William D'Avenant that the earl treated Shakespeare with exceptional munificence, and once gave him a thousand pounds to enable him to go through with a purchase which he heard he had a mind to' Twenty sonnets are couched in the phraseology habitual at the time to authors when penning dedications of their works to patrons Three of these (xxvi, wxii, and wxvi) merely translate into the language of poetry the expressions of devotion which had already done duty in the prose dedicatory epistle to the Earl of Southampton that prefaces Lucrece That epistle to Southampton runs

The love I dedicate to your lordship is without end whereof this pamphlet, without beginning, is but a super fluous moiety. The warrant I have of your honourable disposition, not the worth of my untutored lines, makes it assured of acceptance. What I have done is yours, what I have to do is yours, being part in all I have, devoted yours. Were my worth greater, my duty would show greater, meanwhile, as it is, it is bound to your lord hip, to whom I wish long life, still lengthened with all happine x-Your lordship's in all duty,

Sonnet (xv) is a gorgeous rendering of these sentences

I old of my love to whom in vassalage
The ment hath my duty strongly knit,
To thee I send this written ambassage,
To vitness duty, not to show my wit
Duty so great, which wit so poor as mine

May male ecm bare, in wanting words to show it, But that I hope some good concert of thine

In the soul's thought, all not ed, will bestow it, fill batsoever star that guides my moving,
Points on me graciously with fur aspect,
And puts apparel on my tatter d loving,

Fo show me worthy of thy sweet respect
Then may I date to local how I do love thee,
I'll then not show my head where thou mayst prove me

In several sonnets, the poet confesses to a sense of jealousy of one or more rival poets who, by dint of 'richly compiled 'comments' of his patron's 'pruse,' threaten to divert to themselves his patron's fivours. The rival poets with their *precious praise by all the muses filed' (laxxi 4) must be sought among the writers who eulogised Southampton and are known to have shared his Such writers were very numerous but the poet whom Shakespeare depicts as his chief rival is with much probability identified with the young poet and scholar Barnabe Barnes, a poetic panegorist of Southampton and a prolific sonneteer. whose promise, widely acknowledged at the time that Shakespeare was writing his sonnets, was not destined for conspicuous fulfilment in the future

Besides the twenty 'dedicatory' sonnets, which specifically address a young man as the poet's pitron, many avow wholly disinterested 'love,' in the Elizabethan sense of friendship, for a handsome youth of wealth and rank There is good ground for the conclusion that the sonnets of disinterested friendship also have South impton for their subject The sincerity of the poet's sentiment is often open to doubt in these poems, but they seem inspired by a genuine intimacy subsisting between Shakepeare and a young Macenas Extravagant comphment-'gross printing' Shakespeare calls itwas more conspicuous in the intercourse of patron and client during the last years of Elizabeth's reign than in any other epoch. There is nothing in the vocabulary of affection which Shakespeare employed in his sonnets of 'love' or friendship to conflict with the theory that they were inscribed to his literar, patron Southampton, with whom he was it the moment on the terms of close intimacy that normally subsisted between the literary clients and their patrons. Every compliment, in fict, paid by Shakespeare to the youth applies to South impton. In real life, beauty, birth, wealth, and wit sat crowned! in the earl, whom poets ucl used the handsomest of Elizabethan courtiers, is plainly as in the hero of the poet's verse

Southampton has left in his correspondence ample proofs of his literary learning and cultured taste. and, like the hero of the sonnets, was 'as fair in knowledge as in hue' The opening sequence of seventeen sonnets, in which a youth of rank and wealth is admonished to marry and beget a son so that his fur house' may not fall into decay, cin only have been addressed to a young peer like Southampton, who was as yet unmarried, had vast possessions, and was the sole male representative of his family. To no other peer of the day are the poet's words so exactly applicable. Striking evidence of the identity of the youth of the sonnets of 'friendship' with Southampton is found in the like ness of feature and complexion which characterises the poet's description of the youth's 'fair' outward appearance and the extant pictures of Southampton as a young man which are now at Welbeck ternal evidence thus agrees with internal evidence in identifying the lauded patron of the sonnets with the Earl of Southampton, and they suggest that Shakespeare when his fame was in the making stood to the earl in much the same relation as Ariosto to the Duke Alfonso d'Este, or Ronsard to Margaret, Duchess of Savoy

Shakespeare's sonnets were first circulated in manuscript A line from one of them—

Lilies that fester smell far worse than weeds-

was quoted in the play of Edward III, which was probably written before 1595. Meres, writing in 1598, enthusiastically commends Shakespeare's sugred sonnets among his private friends,' ind mentions them in close conjunction with his two narrative poems. William Jaggard piratically inserted in 1599 two of the most mature of the series (Nos cannot and caliv) in his Passionate Pilgrim. In 1609 Shakespeare's sonnets were surreptitiously published by a publisher of small reputation, Thomas Thorpe

Thorpe dedicated the volume to 'Mr W H' in these terms

TO THE ONLIE, BPGETTER OF THESE INVING SONNETS
MR W H ALL HAPPINESSE, AND THAT ETERNITIE PROMISED
BY
OUR EVER LIVING FOFF
WISHETH
THE, WELL WISHING ADVENTURER IN SET TING

ТТ

The dedication, although, according to Thorpe's habitual style of writing, bombastic in expression and wilfully intricate in the arrangement of the words, follows a common dedicatory formula in numerous books of the day the dedicator 'wisheth' his patron 'all happiness and eternitic'. In this in stance 'the well-vision, adventurer in setting forth'

-i.e. the publisher, Thomas Thorpe-'wisheth,' in the conventional language of contemporary dedications, 'all happinesse and that eternitie promised by our ever-living poet'-ie such eternity as Shakespeare in the text of his sonnets foretold for his own verse-'to Mr W H the onlie begetter of these ensuing sonnets'-i.e. to the man who had, by his sole efforts, gotten or procured ('beget' in Elizabethan English was frequently used in the sense of 'get' or 'procure') a copy of the manuscript of Shakespeare's sonnets, and had thereby given Thorpe his opportunity of printing and publishing them In 1600 Thorpe had under similar circum stances dedicated a hitherto unpublished work by Marlowe-The First Book of Lucan-to Edward Blount, a friend in the trade. 'Mr W H.,' whom Thorpe made the patron of the original edition of Shakespeare's sonnets in 1609, was probably William Hall, a publisher's assistant, who for some years occupied himself in procuring unprinted manuscripts for disposal among stationers in the position of Thorpe.

The common practice of publishers of the day of the type of Thorpe in choosing uninfluential patrons for the publication of manuscripts that fell surreptitiously into their hands renders impossible the popular identification of 'Mr W H' with the influential young man to whom many of the sonnets were anonymously addressed by By an irresponsible guess, which Shakespeare is vitiated by an obvious error, the initials of Thorpe's patron have been identified with those of William Herbert, third Earl of Pembroke. The Earl of Pembroke succeeded to his title in 1601, and it was contrary to law and custom for a dependent in the position of a publisher to employ any other than the formal designation in addressing a noble patron The letters 'W H,' moreover, at no time in the Earl of Pembroke's life represented the initials of his name. From his birth until his succession to his father's title he was known solely as Lord Herbert. No evidence exists to show that Shakespeare was in personal relations with the Earl of Pembroke at any period. After Shakespeare's death the First Folio (1623) was dedicated to Pembroke and his brother, the Earl of Montgomery, by Shakespeare's friends and theatrical colleagues. It was the fashion of the moment for authors and publishers to dedicate to these patrons jointly publications of importance. Pembroke, too, was in 1623 Lord Chamberlain and ex officio controller of the stage. The words and tone in which Shakespeare's posthumous editors addressed the brothers plainly show that the poet was in his lifetime solely known to the brother earls-was solely the object of their favourin his capacity of popular dramatist and of 'servant' of the king-ie. of member of the king's company of players

the literary labours to which the best years of his life were consecrated. His industry never drooped To the winter season of 1595 probably belonged A Midsummer Night's Dream, which may vell have been written to celebrate a marriage in the circles of the court. Hints for the plot and characters have been traced to many sources, but the final scheme of the beautiful and delicate fairy comedy is of Shakespeare's freshest invention. Titania's directions when bidding the fairies attend on the 'translated' Bottom are instinct with the finest conceivable play of fancy (Act III sc. 1 ll 150–160)

Be kind and courteous to this gentleman, Hop in his walks and gambol in his eyes, I eed him with apricocks and dewberries, With purple grapes, green figs, and mulberries, The honey bags steal from the humble bees, And for night tapers crop their waxen thighs, And light them at the fiery glow worm's eyes, To have my love to bed and to arise, And pluck the wings from painted butterflies, To fan the moonbeams from his sleeping eyes Nod to him, elves, and do him courtesies.

All's Well that Ends Well belongs to the same period. Its plot is a sombre and somewhat offensive story traceable to Boccaccio Shake speare's treatment of it is mainly remarkable for his development of the character of the heroine, Helena, who, despite the immodesty of her actions, ranks with the greatest of Shakespeare's female creations. Her secret attachment for the worth less Bertram, whose rank places him beyond her reach, is touchingly expressed in her soliloquy (Act I sc. 1 ll. 76-92)

My imagination Carries no favour in't but Bertram s. I am undone there is no living none, If Bertram be away Twere all one That I should love a bright particular star And think to wed it, he is so above me In his bright radiance and collateral light Must I be comforted, not in his sphere The ambition in my love thus plagues itself The hind that would be mated by the lion Must die for love 'Twas pretty, though a plague, To see him every hour, to sit and draw His arched brows, his hawking eye, his curls, a In our heart's table, heart too capable Of every line and trick of his sweet favour But now he s gone, and my idolatrous fancy Must sanctify his reliques.

The Taning of the Shrew, which is mainly of farcical character, was based on an old farcical comedy, The Taning of a Shrew, first published in 1594. The underplot of Bianca and her lovers was probably due to a coadjutor. In Shakespeare's Induction, of which the drunken tinker Christopher Sly is the hero, Shakespeare introduces many literal references to Stratford and his native county Similar references figure in the Second Part of Henry IV and in The Merry Wives of Windsor, which followed the Invarg of the Strew at no tong interval. Such allusions are probably attributable to Stakespeares resumption of relations with his native place as the time of the composition.

In 1377, turning agam to English history, he produced the two parts of Herry IV Although in the Lies Part the character of Hotspur is drawn with great vividness, and in both parts Prince Hal is depicted with unflagging spirit, the two pieces or a the enthusiastic affection in which they have been held since their first production on the stage to Shake pearl's creation of the deathless character of Filstiff In Falstaff, Shake-peare's purely comic pover culminated. Every syllable of his utterances should be studied Probably his rich ness of temperament may be gauged, as well as anywhere, by the shrewdly comic speech which he mockingly addresses to Prince Hal in his assumed character of the king, Prince Hal's father (Act II se iv II 387-418) His assumption of the kingly role justly evolves from Mistress Quickly the characteristic compliment 'O Jesu' he doth it as like one of those harlotry players as ever I see'

Fal Harry, I do not only marvel where thou spendest thy time, but also how thou art accompanied though the camonule, the more it is trodden on the factor it grows, yet youth, the more it is wasted the Looner it wears. That thou art my son, I have partly thy mother's word, partly my own opinion, but chiefly a villanous trick of thine eye, and a foolish hanging of thy nether lip, that doth warrant me. If then thou be son to me, here lies the point, why, being son to me, art thou so pointed at? Shall the blessed sun of heaven prove a micher and cat black berries? a question not to Shall the son of England prove a thick and be asked take purses? a question to be asked. There is a thing, Harry, which thou hast often heard of, and it is known to man, in our land by the name of pitch this pitch. as ancient writers do report, doth defile, so doth the company thou keepest for, Harry, now I do not speak to thee in drink but in tears, not in pleasure but in pas sion, not in words only, but in vocs also and yet there is a virtuous man v hom I have often noted in thy com pany, but I I now not his name

Prince What manner of man, an it like your majesty 'Isl' A goodly portly man, i' faith, and a corpulent, of a cheerful look, a pleasing eye, and a most noble carriage, and, as I thinh, his age some fifty, or, by 'r lady, inch may to three score and now I remember me, his name is I alstair if that man should be leadly given, he do eiveth me, for, Harry, I see virtue in his looks. If then he tree may be I nown by the fruit, as the fruit by the tree, i' en, peremi toril, I speak it, there is virtue in that Falstair him keep with, the rest banish. And tell me rise, thou naughty variet, tell me, where hast thou been this month?

Henry IV was followed by The Merry Wrees of B indisor, which, according to early traditions, was disigned to eatisf, Queen Elizabeth's curiosity to learn how halstaff would bear himself when in love. The result was a far ical comedy reflecting the b'uff temper of contemporary middle class society.

It the same time, the spirited character of Prince Hil was specially congenial to Shakespeare, and after devoting one play to Palstaff, he devoted another to the later career of the prince who succeeded to the throne as Henry V speare's chronicle-play of Henry V was produced in 1509, probably at the newly-built Globe Theatre It abounds in patriotic sentiment. Most of the speeches of the hero are familiar in anthologies The soliloguy of the king on the emptiness of the ceremonial homage that is paid to royalty, the orations in which he condemns the conspirators Cambridge, Grey, and Scroop, or reproves his cousin Westmoreland for regretting the smallness of the English force on the eve of Agincourt, are masterly specimens of spirited cloquence choruses before the acts, too-notably the first-are splendidly phrased, and there is abundant variety in the comic clement, although it lacks the great presence of Falstaff When Pistol announces to his companions

I or Falstaff he is dead, And we must yearn therefore, the disreputable Bardolph remarks, with a wonderful touch of pathos, 'Would I were with him wheresome'er he is, either in heaven or in hell' The hostess opens her description of the hero's last hours thus (Act II se iii 19)

Nay, sure, he's not in hell he's in Arthur's bosom, if ever man went to Arthur's bosom. A' made a finer end and went away an it had been any christom child, a' parted even just between twelve and one, even at the turning o' the tide for after I saw him fumble with the sheets, and play with flowers, and smile upon his fingers' ends, I knew there was but one way, for his nose was as sharp as a pen, and a' babbled of green fields.

Henry V completed the series of Shakespeare's Histories, which may be likened to detached books of an English Iliad They form collectively a kind of national epic. The late play of Henry VIII, which is only partially by Shakespeare, must be considered apart.

Some reflections of the public affirs in which Shakespeare had personal interest appear in Henry V In the chorus before the last act of the play Shakespeare makes friendly illusion to the expected return from Ircland of the Earl of Essex, the close friend of his patron, the Earl of Southampton. Subsequently, in 1601, Essex and Southampton were leaders in a rebellion against the queen's authority in London, with the result that Essex was executed and Southampton received a sentence of imprisonment for life. Shake-peare thus lost a generous patron, but by the end of the sixteenth century his career was in the full tide of its triumphant progress. In literary and theatrical society his influence was then supreme. He was in a position to befriend younger men of kenius like Ben Jonson, and was a prominent figure in the meetings of Jonson and his literary associates at the Mermaid Tavern in Bread Street In 1593 Francis Meres, a learned graduate of

Cambridge, writing of contemporary literature in his Palladis Tamia, culogised Shakespeare as the greatest man of letters of the day 'The Muses would speak Shakespeare's fine filed phrase if they could speak English.' Unprincipled publishers placed Shakespeare's name on the title-pages of books by other pens in order to attract purchasers Between 1595 and 1608 six plays in which he had no hand-Locrine, Thomas Lord Cromwell, The Puritan, Oldcastle, The London Prodigal, and The Yorkshire Tragedy-came forth with Shakespeare's name or initials on the title-pages. The pirate publisher, William Jaggard, produced in 1599 a poetic anthology, entitled The Passionate Pilgrim, 'by W Shakespeare,' although only five out of the twenty pieces were from the poet's pen Obscure mystical verses, on the Phanix and the Turtle, which may be genuine work of Shakespeare's, were printed above his full signature in 1601, with poems by other writers of note, in Robert Chester's Love's Marty

Meanwhile Shakespeare had resumed relations with Stratford. He was doubtless there on August 11, 1596, when his only son Hamnet was buried in the parish church. Thenceforth he devoted much of his energies to endeavours to restore the fame and fortune of his family in his native place, and though he continued to spend the greater part of many subsequent years in London, he thenceforth paid more than one visit annually His father's debts had grown in his to Stratford long absence, and his wife had also borrowed money for her support. But his return finally relieved his kindred of all pecuniary anxiety. By his advice his father, at the end of 1596, applied to the College of Heralds in London for a grant of arms The negotiations were protracted through three years, but in 1599 the authorities acceded to the request of the poet and his father, assigning to the family a 'gold shield with a bend sable bearing a golden spear, with a crest of a falcon with wings displayed (silver), supporting a spear (gold)' The motto ran, 'Non sanz droict' These arms were thenceforth used by the poet and his children. By way of corroborating his position, he purchased on May 4, 1597, the largest house in Stratford, called New Place.

In 1598 three letters, written by Shakespeare's fellow-townsmen, and still extant at Stratford, give evidence of his local reputation as a man of wealth and influence. One letter, dated October 25, 1598, is an appeal addressed to Shakespeare by Richard Quiney for a loan of £30 financial prosperity which is indicated in the correspondence is readily traceable to Shakespeare's professional earnings, although his wealthy patron, Southampton, is said to have supplemented them in his early years by generous gifts 1599 he wrote nineteen plays, besides revising dramatic work by other pens After 1599 he wrote Such extensive literary work eighteen plays probably brought him on the werage at least I

£35 a year, equivalent to some £300 in modern currency But Shakespeare was also an actor, and actors' salaries were high, from that source Shakespeare must, according to the current rates of remuneration, have derived an average income of £130, exceeding £1000 in modern currency sequently a third source of income was added. When, in the winter of 1598, the Globe Theatre was built, the proprietors presented Shakespéare with a substantial share in the profits, which were always large and always increasing Towards the close of his life he was also allotted a share in the receipts of the Blackfriars Theatre, but it was from the Globe that he, as part-owner, actor, and dra matist, clearly derived, when at the zenith of his career, an ample and substantial income later years of his life he could not have earned less than £600 a year It was reported at the time that 'he spent at the rate of £1000' Part of his professional revenues he invested in real property at Stratford In 1602 he purchased for £320 one hundred and seven acres of arable land near the town, as well as a cottage and garden adjoining New Place In 1610 he acquired twenty acres of pasture. Meanwhile, in 1605, he bought for £440 an unexpired term of a lease of a moiety of the Stratford tithes This negotiation involved him in some legal embarrassments, but, as is common among men of wealth, Shakespeare stood rigorously by his rights in all his business relations, and often appeared as plaintiff in the local courts

The calls of business never, however, impeded Shakespeare's literary activity Despite the somewhat complicated financial transactions in which he was engaged at the time at Stratford, it was in 1599 that he composed his three most finished and most characteristic comedies, Much Ado about Nothing, As You Like It, and Twelfth Night In each there are almost as much serious episode and earnest reflection as humorous jest, badinage, and comic dialogue. The sad central story of Hero and Claudio in Much Ado is of Italian origin, but the brilliant comedy of Benedick and Beatrice and the quaint humour of the watchman Dogberry and Verges are wholly original As You Like It, a pastoral comedy with exceptionally varied dramatis personæ, was adapted from Lodge's romance of Rosalind The smaller characters are as well worthy of study as the The lips of the shepherdess Phebea very subordinate character-for example, echo with rare fidelity the accents of the perennial village coquette, her reminiscence of her interview with Ganymede is as finely pointed, as any speech in the play (Act III sc. v ll 108-138)

Phebe Think not I love him, though I ask for him, 'Tis but a peevish boy, yet he talks well, But what care I for words? yet words do well When he that speaks them pleases those that hear It is a pretty youth not very pretty But, sure, he's proud, and yet his pride becomes him He'll make a proper man the best thing in him

Is his complexion, and faster than his tongue Did make offence his eve did heal it up He is not very tall, yet for his years he's tall His leg is but o so, and yet 'tis well There va a pretty redness in his lip, A little riper and more lusty red Than that mix'd in his cheek, twas just the difference Betweet the constant red, and mingled damask There to some women, Silvius, had they mark d him In parcels as I did, would have gone near To fall in love with him but for my part, I love him not nor hate him not, and yet I have more cause to hate him than to love him For what had he to do to chide at me? He said mine eyes were black and my hair black, And, now I am remember d, scorn d at me I marvel why I answerd not again But that's all one, omittance is no quittance I il write to him a very taunting letter, And thou shalt bear it wilt thou, Silvius? Sir ius Phebe, with all my heart Phile I ll write it straight, The matter's in my head and in my heart I will be bitter with him and passing short. Go with me, Silvius

I velfth Night, like Wuch Ado, is indebted to an It dian story. Though probably written about 1600, the carliest reference to it was made by Henry Manningham, a barrister of the Middle I cmple, who described a performance of the piece at the hall of his Inn on February 2, 1602 leading themes of Viola's passion for the Duke Orsino, and the Duke's passion for Olivia, belong to scrious romance, and a pathetic note infects the humorous characterisation of Malvolio, whose vinity dimost issues in a tragic denouement, but Sir Loby Belch, Sir Andrew Aguecheek, and Maria are conceived wholly in the comic vein. In Fwelfth Vight, as in Much Ado and As You Like It, Shikespeare's lyric genius showed itself in perfection. The songs with which the three plays are interspersed include the verses (Fwelth Night, \ct 11 sc. m 1 38)

O mistress mine, where are you roaming?
O, tay and hear, your true love's coming,
That can sing both high and low
Trip no further, pretty sweeting
Journeys end in lovers meeting
I very with man's son doth know

What is love? tis not hereafter,
Present mirth hath present laughter,
What is to come is still unsure.
In delay there lies no plenty
Then come kiss me sweet and twenty,
Youth's a stuff will not endure.

In 1601 Shikespeare made a new departure by drimitising an incident in Roman history—the death of Julius Casar—which he read in North's noble translation of Plutaren's Itzes. The play of Julius Casar is a penetrating study of political life and character. The dramatis fersone are bilineed and contrasted with minutest care.

Hardly a better example of the Shakespearean power of making a speaker reveal, as it were, unconsciously and unpremeditatedly his true quality could be quoted than the speech in which Casar hints to Antonius his suspicious fear of Cassius, and thereby betrays his own degeneracy (Act 1 sc ii ll 192-214)

Casar Let me have men about me that are fat,
Sleek headed men, and such as sleep o' nights
I ond Cassius has a lean and hungry look,
He thinks too much—such men are dangerous,
Intonius—Fear him not, Cæsar, he's not dangerous,

He is a noble Roman, and well given Casar Would he were fatter! but I fear him not Yet if my name were liable to fear. I do not know the man I should avoid So soon as that spare Cassius He reads much, He is a great observer, and he looks Quite through the deeds of men he loves no plays, As thou dost, Antony, he hears no music Seldom he similes, and smiles in such a sort As if he mock'd himself, and scorn'd his spirit That could be moved to smile at any thing Such men as he be never at heart's ease Whiles they behold a greater than themselves And therefore are they very dangerous I rather tell thee what is to be fear'd Ihan what I fear, for always I am Cesar Come on my right hand, for this ear is deaf, And tell me truly what thou think'st of him

Soon after the production of Julius Casar, Shakespeare's theatrical prospects, like those of others engaged in theatrical enterprise in London, were for a time somewhat seriously imperilled. In 1600 the Puritans of the city of London, who were always hostile to the theatres, sought to induce the Privy Council to forbid the continuance of more than two playhouses in Middlesex and Surrey, but though the Council issued a prohibition in accordance with the Puritan citizens' wish, it was suffered to remain inoperative. More threatening was the sudden popularity which companies of boy actors in London suddenly acquired in the sight of playgoers in the winter of 1600. In the following year Shakespeare described in his new play of Hands how the boys' performances absorbed the favour of the playgoers of London, and how the theatres which were in the hands of the men actors were for the time described. Shakespeare's perverse tempered friend, Ben Jonson, further complicated the situation by throwing in his lot with the boys, for whom he wrote plays that were rapturously received by the public. But the vogue of the boys, with which Shakespeare was naturally out of sympathy, declined as rapidly as it had risen. Its fall may partly be attributed to the triumphant success with which Shike speare's great tragedy of Hamlet was first produced by the men players in 1602. An old play on the same subject is lost, but from it Slinkespeare probably derived useful hints. The story belongs to Danish history, and had been adapted by Bandello, whose version was accessible to Shake speare in the French rendering by Belleforest. The piece, which is mainly a psychological study, is the longest of Shakespeare's plays, but the intensity of interest with which Shakespeare invested the subtle character of the hero rendered the tragedy the most popular of all his productions

In numerous familiar soliloquies Hamlet reveals the course of the struggle proceeding within his brain between his irresistible tendency to intro spective meditation and his consciousness of the pressing need for action, which the working of his mind deprived him of the power of taking. The internal conflict is nowhere so forcibly depicted as when the young prince meets a detachment of the army of Fortinbras, and a captain tells him that they are on their way to fight the Poles (Act IV sc. iv. ll. 18–19),

To gain a little patch of ground That hath in it no profit but the name

The callous admission of so unsubstantial an incitement to action stirs in Hamlet this torturing reflection on his own habit of inaction (Act IV sc. iv ll 32-66)

How all occasions do inform against me, And spur my dull revenge! What is a man, If his chief good and market of his time Be but to sleep and feed? a beast, no more Sure, he that made us with such large discourse, Looking before and after, gave us not That capability and god like reason To fust in us unused. Now, whether it be Bestial oblivion, or some craven cruple Of thinking too precisely on the event,-A thought which, quartered, hath but one part wisdom And ever three parts coward,-I do not know Why yet I live to say 'This thing's to do,' Sith I have cause, and will, and strength, and means To do 't Lamples gross as earth exhort me Witness this army, of such mass and charge, Led by a delicate and tender prince, Whose spirit with divine ambition puff'd Mal is mouths at the invisible event, Exposing what is mortal and unsure To all that fortune, death, and danger dare, Even for an egg shell | Kightly to be great -Is not to stir without great argument, But preatly to find quarrel in a straw When honour's at the stake How stand I then, That have a father kill'd, a mother stain'd, Excitements of my reason and my blood, And let all sleep, while to my shame I see The inurment death of twenty thousand men, That for a fantasy and trick of fame Go to their graves like beds, fight for a plot Whereon the numbers cannot try the cause, Which is not tomb enough and continent To hale the slun? O, from this time forth, My thoughts be bloody, or be nothing worth!

Troil is and Crissida, although published for the first time in 1609, belongs to the same period as Hamlet. It is based on a media val story of the Trojan war, and is little influenced by the classical spirit. The heroine, Cress da, contrary to literary tradition, is represented by Shrkespe irc as a heartless coquette. The speeches of the Greek generals abound in pithily expressed philosophy of universal application. Especially notable are the eloquent meditations of Ulysses. Nowhere else has the doctrine of the inevitableness of rank in the physical, political, and social worlds, or the need of a due observance of it, been set forth with greater nobility of language than in the speech which Ulysses addresses to his colleagues in the Grecian camp before Agamemnon's tent (Act I see in 11 75-137)

Ulysses Trov, yet upon his basis, had been down

And the great Hector's sword had lack'd a master, But for these instances The specialty of rule hath been neglected And, look, how many Grecian tents do stand Hollow upon this plain, so many hollow factions. When that the general is not like the hive To whom the foragers shall all repur, What honey is expected? Degree being vizarded, The unworthiest shows as fairly in the mask The heavens themselves, the planets and this centre, Observe degree, priority and place Insisture, course, proportion, season, form, Office and custom, in all line of order And therefore is the glorious planet Sol In noble eminence enthroned and sphered Amidst the other, whose inedicinable eye Corrects the ill aspects of planets evil, And posts like the commandment of a king, Sans check to good and bad but when the planets In evil mixture to disorder wander, What plagues and what portents, what mutiny, What raging of the sea, shaking of earth, Commotion in the winds, frights, changes, horrors, Divert and crack, rend and deracinate The unity and married calm of states Quite from their fixture! (), when degree is shaked, Which is the ladder to all high designs, The enterprise is sick! How could communities, Degrees in schools and brotherhoods in cities, Peaceful commerce from dividable shores, The primogenitive and due of birth, Prerogative of age, crowns, sceptres, laurels, But by degree, stand in authentic place? Take but degree away, untune that string, And, hark, what discord follows! each thing meets In mere oppugnancy—the bounded waters Should lift their bosoms higher than the shores, And make a sop of all this solid globe Strength should be lord of unbecility, And the rude son should strike his fither dead Force should be right, or rather, right and wron, Between whose endless jar justice relides, Should lose their names, and so should justice too Then every thing includes itself in power, Power into will, will into appetite, And appetite, an universal wolf, So doubly seconded with will and po ver, Must make perforce an universal prey, And last eat up himself. Great Agamemnon, This chacs, when degree is suffocate, Pollows the choking And this neglection of degree it is

That he a price goes backward, with a purpose It both to climb. The general's disdain'd By him one step below, he by the next, I hat next by him beneath so every step, Leampled by the first pace that is sick. Of his superior grows to an envious fever. Of pale and bloodless emulation, and 'tis this fever that keeps Troy on foot, Not her own sinews. To end a tale of length, I roy in our weakness stands, not in her strength.

Hirdly less penetrating are the same speaker's reflections on the tendency of human nature to value what is new to the neglect of the good that is old, when he reminds Achilles that his early fame cannot resist the advance of Ajav's newerborn reputation (Act III se in ll 145-153)

Time hath, my ford, a wallet at his back. Wherein he puts alms for oblivion, A great sized monster of ingratitudes. Those scraps are good deeds past, which are devour'd As fast as they are made, forgot as soon. As done perseverance dear my lord, keeps honour bright to have done, is to hang Quite out of fashion, like a rusty mail. In monumental mockers.

VI On March 24, 1603, Queen Elizabeth died Mithough she had proved an appreciative patron of Shakespeare, her successor, James I, showed him and his associates far more pronounced favour Very soon after his accession James bestowed on the company of actors to which Shakespeare be longed the title of the King's Servants, and gave them the rank of grooms of the royal chamber Thenceforth Shakespeare and his colleagues took part in all great court festivities, while Shakespeare's plays were repeatedly performed in the royal presence

During the first six years of the new reign Shakespeare was engaged on his greatest achieve ments in tragedy Othello seems to have been the first new piece by Shakespeare that was acted before Jimes, and it was quickly followed by Weasure for Measure The stories of both come originally from an Italian collection of romances, the Hecatominutae of Cinthio Cinthio's story of Measure for Measure was accessible in both French and English, but Othello is not known to have been translated out of the Italian before Shakespeare treated it. With masterly genius Shakespeare reconstructed leading episodes in both romances Othello displayed his fully matured powers to splendid advantage. An unfaltering equilibrium is maintained in the treatment of plot and character thise. Almost every sentence in Othellos dying speech has become proverbial (let v so n ll 341-359)

Soft you, a word or two before you go
I have done the state some service, and they know't
No more of that I pray you, in your letters,
When you shall it ese unlucky deeds relate,
Speak of me as I am, nothing extenuite,
Nor a down aught in malice—then must you speak

Of one that loved not wisely but too well,
Of one not easily jealous, but, being wrought,
Perplex'd in the extreme, of one whose hand,
Like the base Indian, threw a pearl away
Richer than all his tribe, of one whose subdued eyes,
Albeit unused to the melting mood,
Drop tears as fast as the Arabian trees
Their medicinal gum—Set you down this,
And say besides, that in Aleppo once,
Where a malignant and a turban'd Turk
Beat a Venetian and traduced the state,
I took him by the throat, the circuincised dog,
And smote him, thus—[Stabs himself

Measure for Measure, which deals mainly with the virtue of chastity, contains one of the finest scenes (between Angelo and Isabella, Act II sc. II 143 seq) and one of the greatest speeches (Claudio on the fear of death, Act III sc I II 119-133) in the range of Shakespearean drima. Claudio's speech, very human if very cowardly,

Ay, but to die, and go we know not where To lie in cold obstruction and to rot, This sensible warm motion to become A kneaded clod, and the delighted spirit To bathe in fiery floods, or to reside In thrilling region of thick ribbed ice, To be imprison'd in the viewless winds, And blown with restless violence round about The pendent world, or to be worse than worst Of those that lawless and incertain thought Imagine howling—'its too horrible! The weariest and most louthed worldly life That age, ache, penury, and imprisonment Can by on nature is a paradise. To what we fear of death

Macbeth is on the same lofty level of tragic art as Othello The subject, drawn from Scottish history, especially appealed to King James and his It is the shortest of all Shakespearc's tragedies, and the most rapid in action sure and very subtle is the revelation of character offered by Shakespeare's portraits of Macbeth and his wife In the hero there is a peculiar mingling of covetous ambition and reckless physical courage, with a highly developed imagi native faculty which lends his utterance in the cutastrophe of his career a weird splendour of phrase at the same time that it invests it with strange aloofness of facling. He receives the crushing news of the death of his wife, on whose strength of will and practical temperament his action in former scasons of crisis wholly depended, thus (Act v Sc v 11 15-28)

Macleth Wherefore was that cry?

Septon The queen, my lord, is dead

Marceth She should have died hereafter,

There would have been a time for such a word.

To-morrow, and to morrow, and to-morrow,

Creeps in this petty pace from day to day,

To the last syllable of recorded time

And all our yesterday, have lighted fools

The way to dusty death Out, out, brief candle 'Life's but a walking shadow, a poor player That struts and frets his hour upon the stage And then is heard no more it is a tale Told by an idiot, full of sound and fury, Signifying nothing

King Lear, the most heart rending of all Shakespeare's tragedies, was acted at court on December 26, 1606. It was based on a legend of British history, but Shakespeare so re created the story that all the pity and terror of which tragedy is capable reached their climax in his treatment of it. There is awful beauty in the speeches of the demented king in the concluding scenes. The words which lead up to his recognition of his daughter Cordelia are unsurpassable in their pathos (Act IV sc vii ll 59-70).

Pray do not mock me
I am a very foolish fond old man,
Fourscore and upward, not an hour more nor less,
And, to deal plainly,
I fear I am not perfect in my mind
Methinks I should know you and know this man,
Yet I am doubtful, for I am mainly ignorant
What place this is, and all the skill I have Remembers not these garments, nor I know not Where I did lodge last night Do not laugh at me,
For, as I am a man, I think this lady
To be my child Cordclia.

Timon of Athens, although the hero was cast in the mould of Lear, falls far short of its three pre-Shakespeare was not responsible for decessors the whole. Nearly all Acts in and v came from The coadjutor may possibly have an inferior pen been George Wilkins, who may safely be credited with aiding Shakespeare in the romantic play of Pericles at the same date (1607-1608) Only Acts iii and v and part of Act iv of Pericles can confidently be assigned to the great dramatist, but these scenes form a self-contained whole, and are characterised by a matured felicity of expres-Witness the simple lament of Marina, the desolate heroine, while scattering flowers on her nurse's grave (Act IV sc. 1 ll 13-20)

No, I will rob Tellus of her weed,
To strew thy green with flowers—the yellows, blues,
The purple violets, and manifolds,
Shall, as a carpet, hang upon thy grave,
While summer days do last—Ay me! poor maid,
Born in a tempest, when my mother died,
This world to me is like a lasting storm,
Whirring me from my friends.

Of like calibre are the words of Pericles when his daughter Marinn, whom he thinks to be dead, presents herself to him (Act V sc 1 ll 106-112)

My dearest wife was like this maid, and such a one
My daughter might have been my queen's square brows,
Her stature to an inch, as wand like straight,
As silver voic'd, her eyes as jewel like
And cas'd as richly, in pace another Juno,

Who startes the ears she feeds, and makes them hungry, The more she gives them speech.

Perides was published in 1608 On the same day that license for its publication was obtained, a more impressive piece of literature, Antony and Cleopatra, was announced to be also ready for the press, although its publication was delayed for fifteen years. For the plot of Antony and Cleopatra Shakespeare had recourse again to North's translation of Plutarch. To the theme he brought all his vitalising power, and the tragedy marks the zenith of his achievement. The irresistible spell that it everts on readers justifies the application to it of the familiar words in which Enobarbus describes the heroine (Act 11 sc ii ll 239-242)

Age cannot wither her, nor custom stale Her infinite variety—other women cloy The appetites they feed, but she makes hungry Where most she satisfies

Antony and Cleopatra was most worthily followed at no long interval by Cortolanus, which also owes its birth to Shakespeare's study of North's translation of Plutarch Despite the austere temper of the play, the dramatic interest is in Cortolanus sustained as unflaggingly as in Othello

Coriolanus was Shakespeare's last excursion into the true realms of tragedy The three latest plays that came from his unaided pen, Cymbeline, Winter's Tale, and The Tempest, belong to a category of their own, apart alike from comedy and Though many of the episodes are poigtragedy nantly pathetic, all end happily, and their tone is throughout placid and tranquil, in marked contrast with the tempestuous temper of the great series of plays immediately preceding them of the concluding trinity, Cymbeline, is especially notable for the fascination of the heroine, Imogen, the crown and flower of Shakespeare's female The story is freely adapted from Holmshed's Chronicle of British History, interwoven with a story from Boccaccio. The play contains the splendid dirge, 'Fear no more the heat o' the sun,' which clothes the most solemn sentiment in a lyric garb of exceptional verbal and metrical simplicity (Act IV sc 11 ll 259-282)

Gu.derius Fear no more the heat o' the sun,

Nor the furious winter's rages,

Thou thy worldly task hast done,

Home art gone, and ta'en thy wages
Golden lads and girls all must,

As chimney sweepers, come to dust

Arviragus Fear no more the frown o' the great,
Thou art past the tyrant's stroke,
Care no more to clothe and eat,
To thee the reed is as the oak
The sceptre, learning, physic, must
All follow this and come to dust,

Gui Fear no more the lightning flash,

Iri Nor the all-dreaded thunder stone,

Gui Fear not slander, consure rash,

Arv Thou hast finish'd joy and moan

E. All lovers voing, all lovers must Consign to thee, and come to dust

Gu No exerciser harm thee!

Ir Nor no witcherait charm thee!

Gr Ghost unlaid forbear thec!

1r Nothing ill come near thee!

Li'i Quiet consummation have, And renowned Le thy grave!

The Winter's Tale was witnessed at the Globe Theatre on May 15, 1611, by a play goer, Dr Simon Forman, who placed the fact on record, but the picc vas doubtless produced in the preceding winter. The story was drawn from a popular romance of Pandosto by Shakespeare's early foe, Robert Greene, but Shakespeare introduced many The thievish peddler, Autolycus, is his own invention, and into his roguish mouth are placed some of the most spirited of Shakespeare's lyrics (ct. Act. IV sc. ii ll. 1-12) At the same time the pastoral incident throughout the Winter's Tule is the freshest of all Shakespeare's presentations of country life witness Perdita's beautiful speeches at the sheep shearing feast (Act IV sc m 1 70 seq), which include lines (118-128) like these

Daffodils,

That come before the swallow dares, and take the winds of March with beauty, agolets dim, But so exter than the lids of Juno's eyes Or Cytherea's breath, pale primroses. That die unmarried, ere they can behold Bright Phoebus in his strength, a malady Most incident to maids bold oxlips and The croy numperral, lilies of all lands, The flower de luce being one. O, these I lack, To make you garlands of, and my sweet friend, to strew him o'er and o'er!

The Ten pest, probably virten in 1611, was suggested by the ships reck off the hitherto un known Bermuda Islands in the summer of 1609 of a fleet bound for the Indics The islands were currently reported by the surviving mariners to be the home of mysterious sounds and devils It is clear that Shakespeare studied many recent pamphlets which reported the wreck of the fleet, but at the same time he incorporated in the Tamp st the result of study of other books of traid in the New World. Nowhere did Shakespeare give rein to his imagination with more imposing effect than in the Fempest. The tone is marked at all points by great solemnity of thought, and endeavours have been made to represent it as a conscious effort in metaphysics ruther than a work of poetic fancy. There is little ground to justify a metaphysical interpretation Shikopaire wis merel, developing with the inetter ad per ousne a of middle life some dramatic themes and characters with which he had already dealt less perfectly in earlier ventures of the a hoel of Marin cot Percies and of Perdita et the il ters Title Ariel belongs to the world of

Puck in A Midsumn or V gat's Dream, although the later delineation is in the severer colours that were habitual to Shakespe ire's maturity Caliban is an imaginary portrait, conceived with matchless vigour and vividness, of the aboriginal savage of the New World, of whom Shakespeare had read in travellers' tales or heard from their lips Prospero, the guiding providence of the romance, has been fancifully identified with Shakespeare himself, who probably bade farewell in the Tempest to the enchanted work of his life. There is no just ground for the identification. The conditions of the story and of Prospero's character fully account for his magnanimous renunciation of his magical ficulty as soon as by its exercise he had restored his shattered fortunes Prospero's words of renunciation run (Act v sc. 1 ll. 33-57)

Ye elves of hills, brooks, standing lakes, and groves, And ye that on the sands with printless foot Do chase the ebbing Neptune, and do fly him When he comes back, you demi puppets that By moonshine do the green sour ringlets make, Whereof the ewe not bites, and you whose pastime Is to make midnight mushrooms, that rejoice To hear the solemn curfew, by whose aid-Weal masters though ye be-I have bedimm'd The noontide sun, call'd forth the mutinous winds, And 'twixt the green sea and the azured vault Set roaming war to the dread rattling thunder Have I given fire, and rifted Jove's stout oak With his own bolt, the strong based promontory Have I made shake, and by the spurs pluck'd up The pine and cedar graves at my command Have waked their sleepers, oped, and let 'em forth By my so potent art But this rough magic I here abjure, and, when I have required Some heavenly music-which even now I do-To work mine end upon their senses, that This airy charm is for, I'll break my staff, Bury it certain fathoms in the earth, And deeper than did ever plummet sound I'll drown my book

VII Although Shakespeare abandoned dramatic composition in 1611, or thereabouts, he left with the manager of his company unfinished drafts of more than one play, which at a later date other dramatists were commissioned to complete. Shakespeare's place at the head of the acting drimatists of the day wis taken by John Fletcher, and it was he, with occasional aid from another distinguished writer, Philip Massinger, who put the finishing touches to Shal espeare's uncom pleted work. One of the plays which is known to have been due to this copartnership is lost vas called Cardento, and was based on a story in Cervanics' novel of Don Quirote, the first part of which was originally published in an English translation in 1612 Two other pieces, The Two Noole Kinsmen and Henry VIII, in which the hands of both Fletcher and Shikespeire are triccable still survi c The Two Noble Kinsmen, then first printed in 1634, was stated to be the joint production of 'the memorable worthies of their time, Mr John Fletcher and Mr William Shakespeare, gentlemen.³ The main plot is based on Chaucer's Kinght's Tale, and in the scenes developing that story Shakespeare's hand is plainly visible. The opening song, sung by Athenian nymphs who are strewing flovers at the wedding of Theseus and Hippolyta, has the true Shakespearean ring (Fwo Noble Kinsmen, Act I sc. 1—Beaumont and Fletcher)

Roses their sharp spines being gone, Not royal in their sincils alone, But in their huc, Maiden pinks, of odour faint, Daisies smell less, yet most quaint, And sweet thyme true,

Primrose, first born child of Ver,
Merry spring time's harbinger,
With her bells dim
Oxlips in their cradles growing,
Mangolds on death beds blowing,
Lark heels trim

All, dear Nature's children sweet,
Lie 'fore bride and bridegroom's feet,
Blessing their sense! [Strewing flowers
Not an angel of the air,
Bird melodious or bird fair,
Be absent hence!

The crow, the slanderous cuckoo, nor
The boding raven, nor chough hoar,
Nor chatt'ring pie
May on our bride house perch or sing,
Or with them any discord bring,
But from it fly!

Henry VIII was in course of performance at the Globe Theatre on June 29, 1613, when the firing of some cannon on the stage set the play-The house was burned down, house in flames and was rebuilt next year Henry VIII is a loosely constructed drama, and resembles a historical masque. It was first printed in the First Folio edition of Shakespeare's works of 1623 as Shakespeare's sole production there are at least thirteen scenes which on metrical grounds are to be assigned to the pen of Fletcher, possibly with occasional aid from Wolsey's magnificent farewell to Massinger Cromwell (Act III sc II ll 412-459), though in metre and language it often recalls the work of Fletcher, is of a greatness far excelling anything positively known to proceed from Fletcher's pen

Wolsey Go, get thee from me, Cromwell, I am a poor fall'n man, unworthy now
To be thy lord and master—seek the king,
That sun, I pray, may never set! I have told him
What and how true thou art—he will advance thee,
Some little memory of me will stir him—
I know his noble nature—not to let
Thy hopeful service perish too—good Cromwell,
Neglect him not, make use now, and provide

For thine own future safety

Cromwell

O my lord

Must I, then, leave you? must I need forgo
So good, so noble, and so true a master?

Bear witness, all that have not hearts of iron,
With what a sorrow Cromwell leaves his lord

The king shall have my service, but my prayers

For ever and for ever shall be yours.

Wol Cromwell, I did not think to shed a tear

In all my miseries, but thou hast forced me, Out of thy honest truth, to play the woman

Let's dry our eyes and thus far hear me, Cromwell, And, when I am forgotten, as I shall be, And sleep in dull cold marble, where no mention Of me more must be heard of, say I taught thee, Say, Wolsey, that once trod the ways of glory, And sounded all the depths and shoals of honour, Found thee a way, out of his wreck, to rise in, A sure and safe one, though thy master missed it. Mark but my fall and that that rum'd me. Cromwell, I charge thee, fling away ambition By that sin fell the angels, how can man then, The image of his Maker, hope to win by it? Love thyself last cherish those hearts that hate thee, Corruption wins not more than honesty Still in thy right hand carry gentle peace, To silence envious tongues Be just, and fear not Let all the ends thou aim'st at be thy country's, Thy God's, and truth's, then if thou fall'st, O Cromwell, Thou fall'st a blessed martyr' Serve the king, And prithee, lead me in There take an inventory of all I have, To the last penny, tis the kings my robe, And my integrity to heaven, is all I dare now call mine own. O Cromwell, Cromwell! Had I but served my God with half the zeal I serv'd my king he would not in mine age Have left me naked to mine enemies. Crom Good sir, have patience So I have. Farewell The hopes of court ' my hopes in heaven do dwell.

This may safely be assigned to Shakespeare, although in it Shakespeare seems to have given proof of his versatility by echoing in a glorified key the habitual strain of Fletcher

With Henry VIII Shakespeare's work was After his retirement from active connection with the theatre his plays were still performed at court and on the public stages, but the last five years of his life were mainly passed at Stratford In 1613 he paid a short visit to London in order to make what proved his last investment in real estate. He purchased a house in the neighbourhood of the Blackfriars Theatre for £140, of which he left £60 on mortgage. The decd of conveyance bears the date March 10th, and is now in the Guildhall Library A second deed dated next day and relating to the mortgage is now in the British Museum Both documents bear Shakespeare's signature The Blackfriars house was leased immediately to a resident in the neighbourhood In July 1614 John Combe, 2 wealthy inhabitant of Stratford, died and left Shakespeare £5 At the end of the year Shakespeare was

The il inter's Tale was witnessed at the Globe Theatre on May 15, 1611, by a playgoer, Dr Simon Forman, who placed the fact on record, but the piece was doubtless produced in the preceding The story was drawn from a popular romance of Pandosto by Shakespeire's early foe, Robert Greene, but Shakespeare introduced many The thickish peddler, Autolycus, is his changes own invention, and into his roguish mouth are placed some of the most spirited of Shakespeare's lyrics (cf Act IV sc II ll 1-12) At the same time the pastoral incident throughout the Winter's Tale is the freshest of all Shakespeare's presen tations of country life, witness Perdita's beautiful speeches at the sheep shearing feast (Act IV se in 1 70 seq), which include lines (118-128) like these

Drffodils,

That come before the swallow dares, and take The winds of March with beauty, violets dim, But sweeter than the lids of Juno's eyes Or Cytherea's breath, pale primroses, That die unmarried, ere they can behold Bright Phœbus in his strength, a malady Most incident to maids, bold oxlips and The crown imperial, lilies of all kinds, The flower de luce being one! O, these I lack, To male you gurlands of, and my sweet friend, To strew him o'er and o'er!

The Tempest, probably written in 1611, was suggested by the shipwreck off the hitherto unknown Bermuda Islands in the summer of 1609 of tilect bound for the Indies. The islands were currently reported by the surviving mariners to be the home of mysterious sounds and devils It is clear that Shakespeare studied many recent pamphlets which reported the wreck of the fleet, but at the same time he incorporated in the It upest the result of study of other books of trivel in the New World Nowhere did Shikespeare give rein to his imagination with more imposing effect than in the Tempest. The tone is mirked it ill points by great solemnity of thought, ind endeavours have been made to represent it as a conscious cutort in metaphysics rather than a work of poetic fancy. There is little ground to just fy a metaphysical interpretation Shakespeare was merely developing with the increased senousic s of middle life some driniatic themes and characters with which he had already do ilt iess pertectly in earlier ventures. of the aboot of Mains of Percles and of Perdita of the Hinters Take Artel belongs to the world of]

There is no just ground for the identification The conditions of the story and of Prospero's character fully account for his magnani mous renunciation of his magical faculty as soon as by its exercise he had restored his shattered fortunes Prospero's words of renunciation run (Act V sc 1 ll. 33-57)

Ye elves of hills, brooks, standing lakes, and groves, And ye that on the sands with printless foot Do chase the cbbing Neptune, and do fly him When he comes back, you demi puppets that By moonshine do the green sour ringlets make, Whereof the ewe not bites, and you whose pastime Is to make midnight mushrooms, that rejoice To hear the solemn cursew, by whose aid-Weak masters though ye be-I have bedimm'd The noontide sun, call'd forth the mutinous winds, And 'twist the green sea and the azured vault Set roaring war to the dread rattling thunder Have I given fire and rifted Jove's stout oak With his own bolt, the strong based promontory Have I made shake, and by the spurs pluck'd up The pine and cedar graves at my command Have waked their sleepers, oped, and let 'em forth By my so potent art But this rough magic I here abjure, and, when I have required Some heavenly music -which even now I do-To work mine end upon their senses, that This airy charm is for, I ll break my staff, Bury it certain fathoms in the earth, And deeper than did ever plummet sound I'll drown my book

VII Although Shakespeare abandoned dramatic composition in 1611, or thereabouts, he left with the manager of his company unfinished drafts of more than one play, which at a later date other dramatists were commissioned to complete Shakespeare's place at the head of the acting dramatists of the day was taken by John Fletcher, and it was he, with occasional aid from another distinguished writer, Philip Massinger, who put the finishing touches to Shakespeare's uncompleted work. One of the plays which is known to have been due to this copartnership is lost. It was called Cardenio, and was based on a story in Cervanies' novel of Don Quirote, the first pirt of which was originally published in an English trinslation in 1612 Two other pieces, The Two Noble Kinsmen and Henry VIII, in which the hands of both Fletcher and Shallespeare are traccable still survive The Two Noble Kinsmen, s hen first printed in 1634, was stated to be the joint production of 'the memorable worthies of their time, Mr John Fletcher and Mr William Shakespeare, gentlemen.' The main plot is based on Chaucer's Knight's Tale, and in the scenes developing that story Shakespeare's hand is plainly visible. The opening song, sung by Athenian nymphs who are strewing flowers at the wedding of Theseus and Hippolyta, has the true Shakespearean ring (Two Noble Kinsmen, Act 1 sc. 1—Beaumont and Fletcher)

Roses their sharp spines being gone,
And royal in their smells alone,
But in their hue,
Maiden pinks, of odour faint,
Daisies smell less, yet most quaint,
And sweet thyme true,

Primrose, first born child of Ver Merry spring time's harbinger, With her bells dim Oxlips in their cradles growing, Mango'ds on death beds blowing, Lark heels trim

All, dear Nature's children sweet,
Lie 'fore bride and bridegroom's feet,
Blessing their sense! [Strewing flowers
Not an angel of the air,
Bird melodious or bird fair,
Be absent hence!

The crow, the slanderous cuckoo, nor
The boding raven, nor chough hoar,
Nor chatt'ring pie
May on our bride house perch or sing,
Or with them any discord bring,
But from it fly !

Henry VIII was in course of performance at the Globe Theatre on June 29, 1613, when the firing of some cannon on the stage set the play-The house was burned down, house in flames and was rebuilt next year Henry VIII is a loosely constructed drama, and resembles a historical masque It was first printed in the First Folio edition of Shakespeare's works of 1523 as Shakespeare's sole production. there are at least thirteen scenes which on metrical grounds are to be assigned to the pen of Fletcher, possibly with occasional aid from Wolsey's magnificent farewell to Cromwell (Act III sc. 11 ll 412-459), though in metre and language it often recalls the work of Fletcher, is of a greatness far excelling anything positively known to proceed from Fletcher's pen

IVolse; Go, get thee from me, Cromwell, I am a poor fall'n man, unworthy now
To be thy lord and master—seek the king,
That sun, I pray, may never set! I have told him
What and how true thou art—he will advance thee,
Some little memory of me will stir him—
I! now his noble nature—not to let
Thy hopeful service perish too—good Cromwell,
Neglect him not, make use now, and provide

For thine own future safety

Cromwell

O my lord!

Must I, then, leave you? must I need forgo
So good, so noble, and so true a master?

Bear witness, all that have not hearts of iron,
With what a sorrow Cromy ell leaves his lord

The king shall have my service, but my prayers

For ever and for ever shall be yours.

IVol Cromwell, I did not think to shed a tear In all my miseries, but thou hast forc d me, Out of thy honest truth, to play the woman Let's dry our eyes and thus far hear me, Cromwell, And, when I am forgotten, as I shall be, And sleep in dull cold marble, where no mention Of me more must be heard of, say I taught thee, Say, Wolsey, that once trod the ways of glory, And sounded all the depths and shoals of honour, Found thee a way, out of his wreck, to rise in, A sure and safe one, though thy master missed it. Mark but my fall and that that rum'd me Cromwell, I charge thee, fling away ambition By that sin fell the angels, how can man then, The image of his Maker, hope to win by it? Love thyself last cherish those hearts that hate thee, Corruption wins not more than honesty Still in thy right hand carry gentle peace, To silence envious tongues Be just, and fear not Let all the ends thou aim'st at be thy country's, Thy God's, and truth's, then if thou fall'st, O Cromwell, Thou fall'st a blessed martyr! Serve the king, And prithee, lead me in There take an inventory of all I have, To the last penny, tis the king's my robe, And my integrity to heaven, is all I dare now call mine own. O Cromwell Cromwell! Had I but served my God with half the zeal I serv'd my king he would not in mine age Have left me naked to mine enemies.

Cron. Good sir, have patience.

Wol So I have. Farewell

The hopes of court my hopes in heaven do dwell.

This may safely be assigned to Shakespeare, although in it Shakespeare seems to have given proof of his versatility by echoing in a glorified key the habitual strain of Fletcher

With Henry VIII Shakespeare's work was After his retirement from active connection with the theatre his plays were still performed at court and on the public stages, but the last five years of his life were mainly passed at Stratford In 1613 he paid a short visit to London in order to make what proved his last investment in real estate. He purchased a house in the neighbourhood of the Blackfriars Theatre for £140, of which he left £60 on mortgage The decd of conveyance bears the date March 10th, and 1s now in the Guildhall Library A second deed dated next day and relating to the mortgage is now in the British Museum Both documents bear Shakespeare's signature. The Blackfriars house was leased immediately to a resident in the neigh-In July 1614 John Combe, a wealthy inhabitant of Stratford, died and left Shakespeare At the end of the year Shakespeare was involved in a quarrel between the corporation of Stratford and the son of his friend Combe, who made an attempt to enclose the common field, which belonged to the corporation. The municipal authorities made vain efforts to enlist Shakespeare appears to have supported the rapacious landlord. The corporation was successful in the struggle.

Shakespeare's health was failing at the beginning of 1616, and on 25th January he caused Francis Collins, a solicitor of Warwick, to draft his will, but the document was for the time left unsigned cording to a local tradition, a month or two later he entertained at his house two literary friends, Michael Drayton and Ben Jonson. They had, it was reported, 'a merry meeting,' but 'itt seems drink too hard, for Shakespeare died of a feavour there contracted.' Whether this record be correct or not, there is little doubt that his illness recurred in Murch, and that, after revising the will which had been drafted in January, he then duly completed its execution. He died on Luesday, April 23, 1616, at the 15c of fifty two. He was buried, two days later, inside Stratford Church, near the northern wall of the chancel. Over the poet's grave were inscribed the lines

> Good friend, for Jesus sake forbeare To dig the dust enclosed heare, Bleste be the man that spares these stones, And curst be he that moves my bone.

Before 1623 a monument by a London sculptor of Dutch birth, Gerard Johnson was affixed to the wall overlooking the grave. It includes a half-length figure of the dramatist, whose hands are disposed as if in the act of writing. The inscription runs as follows.

Judicio Pylium, genio Socratem, arte Maronem, Terra tegit, populus maret, Olympus habet.

Stay passenger, why goest thou by so fast?
Kend, if thou canst, whom envious death hath plast
Within this monument. Shalespeare with whome
Quick nature dide, whose name doth deek ys tombe
For more then cold, sith all yt he hath writt
Leaves hving art but page to serve his witt.

Shakespeare was survived by his wife and two diaghters. The widow died on August 6, 1623, at the 13e of sixty seven, and was buried near the poet two days later. Both his daughters mirried. The voinger, Judith, had become the wife of a neighbours son, Thomas Quiney, two months before the poe's death (Pebruary 10, 1616). She was the mother of three sons, all of whom died young Surviving husband, sons, and sister, she died it Stratford on February 9, 1662, in her seventy seventh year. The elder diaghter, be sanna, had married, in 1608, John Hill, a physician at Stratford. She was buried in Stratford Church, July 11, 1649, aged fifty-six. The inscription on her tombstone attests that she was endowed, in the opinion of her neighbours, with something of her father's wit and wisdom Mrs Hall's only child, Elizabeth, was the last surviving descendant of the poet. She married twice, her first husband being Thomas Nash of Stratford (1593-1647), her second husband was Sir John Barnard (or Bernard) of Abington, Northamptonshire. Lady Barnard died childless at her husband's house at Abington, and was buried in the church there on February 17, 1670.

Shakespeare's will was proved by John Hall, his son in law, and joint executor with his daughter, Mrs Hall, in London on 22nd June following his It has been stated, on the strength of the religious evordium to the will, that Shakespearc died a Roman Catholic, but, in point of fact, the exordium was the conventional formula, and proves nothing respecting the testator's personal belief Shakespeare's elder daughter, Susanna Hall, was made by the will mistress of New Place and practically of all the poet's property. To his wife, whose name did not appear in the original draft, Shakespeare left in the final druft only his second best bed and its furniture. There is some probability in the theory that his relations with her were not of a very cordial nature, but the slender bequest in the will cannot reasonably be taken as indicating a desire on the part of the poet to publish his indifference or dislike. It is likely that her age and ignorance of affairs unfitted her in the poct's eyes for the control of property, and she was accordingly committed to the care of his elder daughter. To his granddaughter, Elizabeth Hall, afterwards Lady Barnard, the poet bequeathed his plate, with the exception of a silver and gilt bowl, which went to his younger daughter Judith The latter also received, with a tenement in Chapel Lane (in remainder to the elder daughter), £300 Among other legatees, each of the dram itist's fellow-actors, Heming, Burbage, and Condell, received a sum of 26s 8d wherewith to buy

VIII Of the thirty-seven plays of which Shake speare was the author, only sixteen were published (in quarto) before his death. No less than twenty-one remained in manuscript, but two of these, the second and third parts of Henry 11, had been issued in imperfect drafts, under the titles respectively of the Contention and the True Tragedy. Othello was the first of the unpublished plays to be issued after the poet's death, it appeared in 1622.

In 1623 the first attempt was made to issue a complete edition of Shakespeare's plays. The two actor friends of the dramatist, John Henning and Henry Condell, were mainly responsible for the venture, but the expenses were defraved by a small syndicate of printers and publishers. Of these, the chief were the printers William Jagard and his son Isaac. Their partners were the booksellers William Aspley, John Smethwick, and Edward Blount. Edward Blount and Isaac Jaggard obtained on November 8, 1623, a license for the publication of sixteen of the twenty plays by Shakespeare that were not previously in print. The volume known as the First Folio seems to have been accessible to the public in the course of the same month. It included thirty-six plays, Pericles, though already in print, was omitted On the titlepage was engraved the crude portrait by Martin Droeshout, which Ben Jonson, in lines printed on the fly-leaf, declared to hit the poet to the life. Commendatory verses included a splendid eulogy by Ben Jonson and poems by Hugh Holland, Leonard Digges, and I M --perhaps Jasper Mayne The dedication was signed by Heming and Condell, and was addressed to the brothers, William Herbert, Earl of Pembroke, the Lord Chamberlain, and Philip Herbert, Earl of Montgomery In a succeeding address 'to the great variety of readers' the same writers declare that their object in undertaking the publication was solely 'to keep the memory of so worthy a friend and fellow alive as was our Shakespeare' The work is carelessly printed, and abounds in typographical errors text, which in the case of twenty one of the plays is not accessible elsewhere, was drawn from more or less edited playhouse copies, and it is doubtful if in any instance the exact form in which a play came from Shakespeare's pen was presented in the volume. In the case of the fifteen plays that had previously appeared in quarto the folio text discloses numerous differences The editors declared that the folio text was alone authentic, but this claim cannot be accepted without quali-The imperfect quarto versions of the Merry Wives of Windsor and Henry V are replaced in the folio by satisfactory texts, but the quarto texts of Love's Labour's Lost, A Midsummer Night's Dream, and Richard II are superior to those of the folio Most of the great plays of which the sole version is preserved in the folio are defaced by corrupt passages. Such, notably, are Coriolanus, All's Well that Ends Well, and Nevertheless, the First Folio remains Macbeth intrinsically the most valuable volume in English literature, perfect copies, which are rarely met with, fetch very high prices both in this country and America. The highest price paid at a public sale for a perfect copy is £1700, that sum was paid in London at Christie's salerooms, on July 11, 1899, by Mr B B Macgeorge of Glasgow

The folio was reprinted in 1632, and a third edition appeared in 1663 without serious change, but the third issue reappeared in the following year with an appendix of seven plays 'never before printed in folio'. The new pieces included Pericles, which had been published separately in quarto in Shakespeare's lifetime, and six other plays by other hands, which had also been published separately in Shakespeare's lifetime, and had been unjustifiably attributed to his pen by unscrupulous publishers, although it was obvious he had no hand in them The names of the spurious plays were The London Prodigal, The History of Thomas Lord Cromwell, Sir John Oldcastle, Lord Cobham, The Puritan IVidow, A Yorkshire Tragedy, and The Tragedy of Locrine A fourth edition of the folio appeared in 1685 with the spurious appendix

The editors of the First Folio anticipated the final and universal verdict of the character of Shakespeare's achievements when they wrote, 'These plays have had their trial already and stood out all appeals' The laws of the classical drama, which Shakespeare's plays defied, still commanded respect in Shakespeare's day, but even lovers of the ancient ways acknowledged that the force of his genius had revealed new methods of dramatic art hitherto unsurpassed and unsus-Ben Jonson, a champion of classical theories of art, in commendatory verses prefixed to the First Folio, claimed that Shakespeare had put to shame the poets of Greece and Rome Through the three centuries that have elapsed since the great dramatist reached the maturity of his powers, his reputation has steadily grown in volume 'In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries there were seasons of ebb or stagnation in the spread of his fame. After the Restoration public taste in England veered towards the French and classical dramatic models, and clumsy efforts were made adapt Shakespeare's plays to the current vein of sentiment. Dryden, D'Avenant, Shadwell, Nathan Tate, and others boldly travestied Shakespeare's text in revised versions of his plays the eclipse of Shakespeare's vogue was partial and temporary, and the Restoration adaptations quickly sank into oblivion On the continent of Europe a resolute endeavour was made in the eighteenth century to prove Shakespeare unworthy of the honour that was paid him by his fellow country-Voltaire, the great French writer, who long dominated the taste of Europe, made desperate efforts to prove Shakespeare a barbarian, and his work a mass of indecency and incoherence, which was only occasionally illumined by the true spirit of poetry But Voltaire's conclusions were powerfully disputed by the German critic Lessing, and when in course of time Shakespeare's work's appeared in competent translations in the various languages of Europe, Voltaire's views ceased to influence European opinion

Throughout the nineteenth century Shakespeare's fame has steadily marched onwards as in triumphal progress, not only among his own countrymen, but among intelligent men and women of other countries. In Germany, Shakespeare's work is studied as closely and as enthusiastically as in England or America, and in France, Italy, and Russia reverence for it and him is increasing year by year On the English stage the name of every actor and actress since Betterton, the great actor of the period of the Restoration, has been identified with Shakespearenn parts, and for the last elality years e er, ictor or actress of ambition in German, I rance, or Italy has been well content to base his or her claim to reputation on the his trionic interpretation of Shakespearean roles may consequently be asserted that in every quarter of the globe to which civilised life has penetrated Shakespeare's power is now recognised It is universally illowed that in knowledge of human character, in wealth of humour, in depth of passion, in fertility of fancy, in command of all the force and felicity of linguage, and in soundness of jud_ment, he has no rivil in the literature of any nation or epoch. His unassailable supremacy ul imitely springs from the versatile working of his insight and intellect by virtue of which his pen limited with uncrying precision almost every gradation of thought and emotion that inimates the living stage of the world benius enabled him to give being in his pages to ill the shapes of humanity that present themselves on the highway of life. So mighty a ficulty thus sets at naught the common limitations of nationality and is acclaimed by the whole civilised world

SHALFSPLA IS TO ITHAIT - According to Aubrey's account, Stake plate was a handsome well shaped man and it is to be repretted that no wholly cathfactory portrait of him exists. The rade y warred but on the monument in Stratford Church and the expectpla a engraving on the title page of the First Folio were hone t endeavour to depict the poet a features, but are not remark ac'e as works of art. Elaborate materials for a biography were collected by James Orchard Halliwell Phillipps in his Outeries of the Life of Shak sfevre (7th ed. 1837). We F. G. Fleay in his Shikespeare Mount (1836), in his Life of Sinkespeare (1880), in his History of the Stage (1830), and in his Biographical Chronile of the English Drama (1891), added for the first time much useful information respecting the history of the contemporary stage and Shakespeare's relations with fellow dramatists. The latest general life of Shake peare and account of his works is by the writer of the present article (1816) illusted 1893. Students ed. 1893. Nathan Diakes Shikespeare and lis Times (1317) and G W Thornbury's Stakesp ares England (1856) collect much material respecting Shakespeare's social environment. Francis Douce's Illustrations of Shalespeare (1807, new el 1839) Shakespeares Library (ed I P Collier and W C Hallitt, 1873), Shakespeare's Plutarch (ed Sheit 1875) and Shakespeares Holinsha I (ed. W G Boswell Stone, 18(6) are of service in tracing the sources of Shakespeare's plots. Alexander Schmidt's Sinkespeare Lexicon (1874) and Dr E. 1 Ablott's Shakespeare in Grammar (1869, new ed 193) are valuable aids to a study of the text. Useful concordances to the Plays have been prepared by Mrs Cowden Clarke (1845) to the Poems by Mrs H H Furness (Philadelphia, 1875), and to Plays and Poems in one volume, with references to numbered lines, by John Bartlett (London and New York, 1395). The publications of the (Old) Shakespeare Society (1841-53), of the New Shakspere Society (1874-03) and of the Deutsche Shakespeare Gesellschaft of Weimar (1865-1501) comprise many papers of value in the aesthetic, textual, historical, and biographical study of Shake speare. The most important critical studies by Englishmen are Colendge's Notes and Lectures (collected by T. Ashe, 1883), Dowden's Shalstere, his Mind and Art (1875) Mr A C Swin burnes A Study of Shakespeine (1879). Reference may also be made with advantage to Thomas Spencer Layness Snake speare Studies (12)3) to Dr Ward's chapters on Shakespeare in his Eiglish Drimatic Literature (new ed 1898) to Richard G Moulton's Suavespeire as & Drimitic Artist (1885), and to Mr F S Boas's Sailespeire in l lus Predecessors (1895). The estays on Shakespeare's heromes, respectively by Mrs Jameson in 1832 and Lady Martin in 1885 are pleasant reading. Among numerous German criticisms of Shakespeare, most interesting are the fragmentary notices in Go-the's It elbelin Meister and It aurheit und Dichtung, Heine's Studies of Shikespeare's Heroines (Eng trins. 1895), and Kreysing's Shalesfeare Fragen (Leipzig, 1871) Ulricis Snakespeares Drimatic Irt and Gervinus's Commen taries both of which are well known in Inglish translations, are of comparatively smaller value. If illium Sutkespeare, an attractive if some what functial treatise by the Danish writer Dr Ceorg I randes, was published man English translation (1868 2 vols.). Among recent French critics of Shake peare the most memorable are Guizet's Stike feare et an Tonfs (1852), a shapody by the poet Victor Hugo (1864) and Mired Mencres & Smilesfeure, ses Chores et ses Cri ques (1.60) which is a saner appreciation. George Chapman, the translator of Homer, was born near Hitchin about 1559, is supposed to have studied at Oxford and at Cambridge, and died Wood describes him as 'a person of most reverend aspect, religious and temperate, qualities rarely meeting in a poet.' He enjoyed the royal patronage of King James and Prince Henry, and the friendship of Spenser, Jonson, and Shakespeare According to Oldys, he 'preserved in his conduct the true dignity of poetry, which he compared to the flower of the sun, that disdains to open its leaves to the eye of a smoking taper? Chapman wrote carly and copiously for the stage. His first play, The Blind Beggar of Alexandria, was produced in 1596 All Fools, a good comedy, probably belongs to 1599 In 1598 he completed Marlowe's Hero and Leander, but not with Marlove's music. After some experiments on parts of the Iliad, the great and complete translation was produced in 1611 in fourteen-syllable rhyming Chapman's equivalents for the com couplets pound Homeric epithets, the far shooting Phabus, the ever living gods, the many-headed hill, silverfooted Thetis, the tripli-feathered helm, highwalled Thebes, the strong winged lance, &c., were happily chosen vigour, old world majesty, and passion are not awanting, and though Popc's version put Chapman's out of fashion, though some of Chapman's merits are quite unhomeric, Charles Lamb, Coloridge, and Keats restored the older translation to favour, and spite of obscurities, conceits, harshnesses, and serious slips in Greek, the translation still ranks as a great achievement. The Odyssey (1616) followed in ten syllable couplets (1616) The conclusion of Book xix of the Iliad runs thus in Chapman

But however spirited and stately as a translator, Chapman pro ed rather an undrimatic drinicist. He continued to supply the theatre with tracelies and comedies up to 1620, or later, yet of the dozen that have descended to us, not one possesses real vivifying dramatic power. In didactic observation and description he is sometimes happy, and hence he has been prused for possessing 'more thinking' than many of his contemporaries tendency to an epic method of narrative is frequently apparent and injurious to effect. But in many single passages he shows great poetic power and beauty, surpassing in this respect, in Professor Ward's judgment, all the Elizabethans but Shakespeare. Lastward Hoe was written in conjunction with Jonson and Marston, but is mainly Chapman's, iccording to Ward, who pronounces it 'one of the liveliest and healthiest, as it is one of the best constructed comedies of the age.' As to the imprisonment of the authors for their political allusions, see below in the article on Jonson. The Gentleman

Usher contains at least one fine scene (Act iv) Its sequel, Monstear d'Olive, 15, Professor Ward thinks, 'one of our most diverting Eliza bethan comedies? Bussy d Imbois and Ine Rivenge of Bussy d' Imbois give i striking picture of the intrigues at the court of Henry III of France, and illus trate Chapman's love of similes and meta phors, is well as the power and beauty of his versification, occasionally bombast is mixed with true poetry, though not so as to justify Dryden's denuncrations. The Conspirate and the Tragedie of Charles Duke of Byron are undramatic, but contain some fine things. In a sonnet prefixed to the comedy of All Fools (1605), Chapman says that he was 'marked with age for aims of greater weight.'

Other plays are May Day (1611), The Widows Fears (1612), and Casar and Pompey (1631) posthumous tragedies, Alphonsus and Revenge for flonour, bear his name with doubtful right. former, on the candidature of Richard of Cornwall for the imperial throne, is appallingly bloody in its incidents, and exhibits greater horrors than Kyd's worst passages. A peculiarity is, that the dialogue is freely interspersed with German words and lines, printed in German black letter, but so monstrously misspelt is at times to be barely intelligible. Ball, a comedy, and The Tragedie of Chabot were the joint work of Chapman and Shirley The best or Chapman's drama is works, Lastraard Hoe and Ca rol, were written in collaboration with others Among Chapman's non-dramatic works are Enthyn ne Rage is, Petraren's Seren Penitentiall Psalmes, In Diang Peem of Musaus, and The Georgicks of Hesiod The first act of All Fools contains some of Chapman's most characteristic work, it opens thus with a conversation between the three friends, Rinaldo, Fortunio, and Valerio

Rinaldo Can one self cause, in subjects so alike As you two are, produce effect so unlike? One like the Turtle all in mournful strains, Wailing his fortunes, th' other like the Lark Mounting the sky in shrill and cheerful notes, Chanting his joys aspired—and both for love? In one, love raiseth by his violent heat Moist vapours from the heart into the eyes, I rom whence they drown his breast in daily showers In th' other, his divided power infuseth Only a temperate and most kindly warmth, That gives life to those fruits of wit and virtue, Which the unkind hind of an uncivil father Had almost nipp'd in the delightsome blossom

Fortunio O. brother. love rewards our SERVICES With a most partial and injurious hand. If you consider well our different fortunes Valerio loves, and tovs the dame he loves. I love, and never can enjoy the sight Of her I love, so far from conquering In my desires' assault, that I can come To lay no battery to the fort I seek, All passages to it so strongly kept,

GEORGE CHAPMAN
From a Print (Wm Pass feet) in the British Museum.

By strait guard of her father Rin I dare swear, If just desert in love measured reward, Your fortune should exceed Valerio's far, For I am witness (being your bedfellow) Both to the daily and the nightly service You do unto the deity of love, In vows, sighs, tears, and solitary watches. He never serves him with such sacrifice, Yet hath his bow and shafts at his command Love's service is much like our humorous lords. Where minions carry more than servitors, The bold and carcless servant still obtains, The modest and respective nothing grins, You never see your love unless in dreams, He-Hymen puts in whole pos ession What different stars reign'd when your loves were born, He forced to wear the willow, you the hom? But, brother, are you not ashamed to make Yourself a slave to the base lord of love, Begot of fancy, and of beauty born? And what is beauty? a mere quintessence, Whose life is not in being but in seeming , And therefore is not to all eyes the same, But lil e a cozening picture, which one way Shous like a crow, another like a swan,

And upon what ground is this beauty drawn?

Upon a woman, a most brittle creature,
And would to God (for my part) that were all.

For But tell me, brother, did you never love? Am You know I did, and was beloved again, And that of such a dame as all men deem'd Honour'd, and made me happy in her favours Exceeding fair she was not, and yet fair In that she never studied to be fairer Than Nature made her, beauty cost her nothing, Her virtues were so rare, they would have made An Ethiop beautiful at least so thought By such as stood aloof, and did observe her With credulous eyes, but what they were indeed I'll spare to blaze, because I loved her once, Only I found her such, as for her sake, I vow eternal wars against their whole sex, Inconstant shuttlecocks, loving fools and jesters, Men rich in dirt, and titles sooner won With the most vile than the most virtuous Found true to none if one amongst whole hundreds Chance to be chaste, she is so proud withal, Wayward and rude, that one of unchaste life Is oftentimes approved a worthier wife Undressed, sluttish, nasty to their husbands, Spunged up, adorned, and painted to their lovers All day in ceaseless uproar with their households If all the night their husbands have not pleased them, Like hounds, most kind, being beaten and abused Like wolves, most cruel, being kindliest used.

For Fie, thou profanest the deity of their sex Rin Brother, I read that Egypt heretofore Had Temples of the richest frame on earth, Much like this goodly edifice of women With alabaster pillars were those Femples Upheld and beautified, and so are women, Most curiously glazed, and so are women, Cunningly painted too, and so are women, In outside wondrous heavenly, so are women, But when a stranger view'd those fanes within, Instead of gods and goddesses, he should find A painted fowl, a fury, or a serpent, And such celestial inner parts have women

Valerio Rinaldo, the poor fox that lost his tail, Per uaded others also to lose theirs Thyself, for one perhaps that for desert Or some defect in thy attempts refused thee, Revilest the whole sex, beauty, love, and all I tell thee Love is Nature's second sun, Causing a spring of virtues where he shines, And as without the sun, the world's great eye, All colour, beauties, both of Art and Nature, Are given in vain to men, so without love All beauties bred in women are in vain. All virtues born in men he buried, For love informs them as the sun doth colours, And as the sun, reflecting his warm beams Against the carth, begets all fruits and flowers, So love fair shining in the inward man, Brings forth in him the honourable fruits Of valour, vit, virtue, and haughty thoughts, Brave resolution, and divine discourse Oh, 'tis the Paradise, the heaven of earth And dulst thou know the comfort of two hearts, In one delicious harmony united, As to joy one joy, and think both one tho ight, Lave both one life, and therein double life

To see their souls met at an interview
In their bright eyes, at parley in their lips,
Their language, kisses—and to observe the rest,
Touches, embraces, and each circumstance
Of all love's most unmatched ceremonies
Thou wouldst abhor thy tongue for blasphemy
Oh' who can comprehend how sweet love tastes
But he that hath been present at his feasts?

Am Are you in that vein too, Valerio? Twere litter you should be about your charge, How plough and cart goes forward, I have known your joys were all employ'd in husbandry, Your study was how many loads of hay Y meadow of so many acres yielded, How many oven such a close would fat And is your rural service now converted From Pan to Cupid? and from beasts to women? Oh, if your futher knew this, what a lecture Of bitter castigation he would read you!

I al My fither? why, my father? does he think To rob me of myself? I hope I know I am a gentleman, though his covictous humour And education hath transform d me baily, And made me overseer of his pastures, I'll be invself in spite of husbandry [Enter Grafics And see, bright heaven, here comes my husbandry Here shall my cittle graze, here Nectar drink, Here will I hedge and ditch here hide my treasure O poor Fortunio, how wouldst thou triumph, If thou enjoy'd'st this happiness with my sister!

For I were in heaven if once 'twere come to that

For I were in heaven if once 'twere come to that Am And methinks its my heaven that I am past it

'Young men think old men are fools but old men know young men are fools' is well put 'Death and his brother sleep,' so often and so variously linked in contrast by the poets, are by Chapman thus conjoined

Since sleep and death are called the twins of nature

We are reminded of Bunyan by

He that to nought aspires doth nothing need Who breaks no law is subject to no king

A homely simile is

Shoes ever overthrow that are too large, And hugest cannon burst with overcharge

There are many ways of putting what Chapman words so 'An Englishman, being flattered, is a lamb, threatened, a hon' 'Man is a name of honour for a king' is a pithy single line or sentence, so are 'He that is one man's slave is free from none,' 'Flatterers look like friends as wolves like dogs,' 'Danger the spur of great minds,' 'A death for love's no death, but martyrdom' What Keats felt when he 'heard Chapman spead out loud and bold' we know from Keats's most famous sonnet, 'On first looking into Chapman's Homer'

A complete edition of Chapman's works was published in three volumes in 1873-75, with an essay by Mr Swinbarne, also repeately published (1873), the volume of the plays was edited by aft R. H. Shepherd. Inother three-volume edition of the play (1771) retained the old spell no, including the preposterous Cerman of Mythons in Dr. Carl Elre chited Mythons in 1267. He per a the standard edition of the Homer (5 vols. 1837).

Trancis Bacon.

Lord Bacon is the name by which contemporaries and succeeding generations have agreed to speak of the aggressive intellectual reformer, the preat English writer, the servile statesman, the corrupt Chancellor, who by effquette and the rules of the peers, e should rather be spoken of as Lord Verulam or Viscount St Albans, in his Apoputlegms he spoke of himself as 'the Lord Bicon,' as well ast the Lord St Albans' Born at Yorl House in the Strand on the 22nd of January 1501, Francis Lacon was the younger son by his second marriage of Sir Nicholis Bacon, Lordkeeper of the Great Seal, his mother, Ann, daughter of Sir Anthony Cooke, was a lady of strong will ind great accomplishments, and a zerlous Cilvinist In childhood he displayed such vivicity of intellect ind sedateness of be haviour that Queen Llizabeth used to call him her young Lord Keeper, and at the age of tuche he was sent to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he carly became disgusted with the Aristotelian philosophy, which still held unquestioned sway in the great English schools of learning. This dislike of the philosophy of Aristotle, as Licon himself declared to his secretary, Dr Kawley, he fell into, 'not for the worthlessness of the author, to whom he would ever ascribe all high attributes, but for the unfruitfulness of the way, being a philosophy only strong for disputations and contentions, but burren of the production of works for the benefit of the life of man? After spending two years at Cambridge, he began the study of law at Gray's Inn (1576), but that same year he went to France for about three years with Sir Amy is Paulet, the English ambassador observations on foreign affairs were afterwards published in a work entitled Of the State of Europe By the sudden death of his fither in 1579, he vas compelled to return hastily to England and engage in some profession After in vain soliciting his uncle, Lord Burghley, to procure for him such a provision from Government as might allow him to devote his time to literature and philosophy, he raturned to the study of the law, was called to the Bir in 1582, and became a bencher of his inn in 1566. While engaged in practice as a barrister le del not forget philosophy, early in life he sketched ms vast (but never completed) work, In Instauration of the Sciences He became member of Purhament for Melcombe Regis in 1584, for Trunton in 1586, and for Middlesex in In 1504 he sought to attract the queen's attention by addressing to her a paper of advice in which, with a boldness unique in a barrister of three ind twenty, he argued for more tolerance in the treatment of recusants, and in 1589 he i rote a pamphtet on the controversies in the Analic in Church, in which he pleaded for clas ! ticit, in matters of doctrine and discipline. in orator he is highly extelled by Ben Jonson

In one of his speeches he distinguished himself by tal ing the popular side in a question respecting some large subsidies demanded by the court, and gave great offence to Her Majesty To Lord Burghley and his son, Robert Cecil, Bacon con tinued to pay court in hope of advancement, till at length, finding himself disappointed in that quarter, he attached himself to Burghley's rival, Essex, who, with all the ardour of a generous friendship, endeavoured in vain to procure for him in 1593 the office first of Attorncy and then of Solicitor General, and in 1596 that of Master of Essex in some degree soothed Bacon's the Rolls disappointment by presenting him with an estate at Iwickenham, which he afterwards sold for Bacon recommended his patron to resort to petty flattery of the queen, misunderstanding his frank character, and advised him to undertake the suppression of Tyrone's rebellion (1598) When Essex was brought to trial after his return from Ircland in disgrace in 1599, the friend whom he had so greatly obliged was associated at his own request (in a subordinate capacity) with the prosecuting counsel, in the hope, as he said, of aiding his patron, but Essex was dismissed from all his offices When Essex broke into open rebellion in 1601, Bacon voluntarily endeavoured to secure his conviction on the capital charge of treason He complied, moreover, after the earl's execution, with the queen's request that he should write A Declaration of the Practices and Triasons attempted and committed by Robert, Earl of Esser, which was printed by authority, and in another paper he defended his own conduct on the ground that the claims of the State must override those of friendship. In Elizabeth's last years Bacon tried to mediate between Crown and Parliament, and himself advised tolerance in Ireland.

After the accession of James the fortunes of Bacon began to improve. He made extravagant professions of loyalty, planned schemes for the union of England and Scotland, and proved that the difficulties between king and commons could easily be arranged He was knighted July 1603, and in subsequent years obtrined successively the offices of King's Counsel, Solicitor-General (1607), and Attorney-General In the execution of his duties he did not scruple to lend himself to the most arbitrary measures of the court, and in 1615 he even assisted in an attempt to extort a confession of treason, under torture, from an old clergyman of the name of Peacham Torture was applied, not at Bacon's suggestion, but with his assent, and he examined the prisoner while on the rack, without result. Peacham was then tried in King's Bench, Bacon undertaking to confer with each judge so as to secure a conviction—Coke resisted Bacon's advice, and in consequence Bacon helped to get Colle dismissed.

Although his income had now been greatly en larged by the emoluments of office and a marriage with the daughter of a wealthy alderman, his extravagance and that of his servants, which he seems to have been too good-natured to check, continued to keep him in difficulties. He cringed to the king and his favourite, Buckingham, and at length, on the 7th of January 1618, he attained the summit of his ambition, by being created Lord High Chancellor of England, and in July he was raised to the peerage as Baron Verulama title which gave place in January 1621 to that of Viscount St Albans As Chancellor it cannot be disputed that, both in his political and judicial capacities, he grossly deserted his duty only did he suffer Buckingham to interfere with his decisions as a judge, but, by accepting numerous presents or bribes from suitors, he gave occasion, in 1621, to a parliamentary inquiry, which ended in his condemnation and disgrace. It has been argued that he did not allow the presents he received to influence his decisions, or but rarely But he fully confessed to the twenty three articles of corruption which were laid to his charge, and when waited on by a committee of the House of Lords, appointed to inquire whether the confession was subscribed by himself, he answered, 'It is my act, my hand, my heart I beseech your lordships to be merciful to a broken reed' It was decided that he be fined £40,000, imprisoned during the king's pleasure, and banished from Parliament and court. He was soon released and pardoned, but not allowed to return to court, and retired to Gorhambury, near St Albans He had now ample lessure to attend to his philosophical and literary pursuits, even while he was engaged in business these had not been neglected. In 1597 he published Meditationes Sacræ, a Table of the Colours of Good and Evil, and ten Essays In 1612 he reprinted the Essays, increased to thirty-eight, and finally, in 1625, he again issued them, 'newly written,' and now fifty eight in number These, as he himself says, 'come home to men's business and bosoms, and, like the late new halfpence, the pieces are small and the silver is good.' The Essays immediately acquired a popularity and credit they have maintained till now Dugald Stewart says the work was 'one of those where the superiority of his genius appears to the greatest advantage, the novelty and depth of his reflections often receiving a strong relief from the triteness of his subject. It may be read from beginning to end in a few hours, and yet, after the twentieth perusal, one seldom fails to remark in it something overlooked before. This, indeed, is a characteristic of all Bacon's writings, and is only to be accounted for by the mexhaustible aliment they furnish to our own thoughts, and the sympathetic activity they impart to our torpid faculties' The Essays, by which Bacon is best known as an author, may fairly be regarded as his most original work. In 1605 he published Of the Proficience and Advancement of Learning, Divine and Human, which, afterwards published in a Latin expansion with the title De Augmentis Scientiarum, constitutes the first part of his great (but unfinished) Instauratio Scientiai um, meant to be a review and encyclopædia of all knowledge. The second part, entitled tovum Organum, was that on which his high reputation as a philosopher was mainly grounded, and on the composition of which he bestowed most labour. It was written in Latin, and appeared in 1620. In the first part of the Advancement of Learning, after considering the excellence of knowledge and the means of disseminating it, together with what had already been done for its advancement, he divides learning into the three branches of history, poetry, and philosophy, having reference to 'the three parts of man's understanding'-memory, imagination, and reason The first aphonsm of the Novum Organum furnishes a key to the author's leading doctrines 'Vlan, being the servant and interpreter of nature, can do and understand so much, and so much only, as he has observed in fact or in thought of the course of nature.' His new method-novum organum-of employing the understanding in adding to human knowledge is expounded in this work, and more or less fully in all his philosophical treatises first abandons the deductive logic of Aristotle and the schoolmen, in which preconceived theories were constructed without reference to actual fact, and were syllogistically arranged to lead to elaborate conclusions never tested by observation Bacon relied on inductive and experiment methods - on the accumulation and systematic analysis of isolated facts to be obtained by observation and experiment. From this assemblage of facts alone were any conclusions to be drawn. The induction was to rest not on a simple enumeration of phenomena, a method familiar to predecessors of Bacon, but on their careful selection and arrangement, with necessary rejections and elimina-'Phantoms of the human mind'-'idols' (eidola) of the tribe, the cave, the market place, and the theatre, as Bacon called them-inherited by man, or produced by his environment, were exposed and swept aside. Nothing was to obscure the 'dry light of reason.' Bacon took all knowledge for his province, and his inductive system was to armve at the causes not only of natural but of all moral and political effects. While developing his new scientific method Bacon made some shrewd scientific observations-he described heat as a mode of motion, and light as requiring time for transmission, but in many things he was even behind the scientific knowledge of his time His system was never finished He never reached his examination of metaphysics-of final causeswhich was to succeed his treatment of physics

Some other parts of the Instauratio were drafted or nearly completed. The Sylva Sylvarum is devoted to the facts and phenomena of natural science, including suggestions and original observations made by Bacon himself. Other discussions concern the winds, life and death, the dense and the rare.

Next in popularity to the Essays was the treatise Of the 11 isaom of the Ancients (in Latin, 1609, trans 1610), wherein Bacon attempts, generally with more ingenuity than success, to discover secret meanings in the mythological fables of antiquity. The New Atlantis, described below, was also one of the most popular of the works. The History of King Henry VII is held by spedding to have been the first to give any true picture of the king or of his reign, and to have given really "iluable guidance to all who have since treated the period. He trins lated some of the Psalms intoverse, drew up a confession of faith anidst his wort troubles, and composed three privers, one of which Addison praised for its un exampled clevi tion of thought. There were also a number of minor treatises and un finished works, in cluding Havins of the Law and other profession il treatises, and i collection of A pophthegms, incodotes and witticisms incient and modern, many of them little above the level of jou Miller

After retiring from public life, Bacon, though enjoying in annual income of £2500, continued to live in so ostentatious a style that at his death in 1626 his debts amounted to upwards of £22,000 The devotion to science appears to have been the immediate cause of his death. Trivelling in his carringe when there was snow on the ground, he bes in to consider whether flesh might not be preserved by snow as well as by salt. In order to make the experiment he alighted at a cottage near Highgate, bought a hen, and stuffed it with This so chilled him that he was unable to return home, but went to the Earl of Arundel's house in the neighbourhood, where his illness was so much increased by the dampness of a bed into which he was put that he died in a few days 9th April 1626 He was buried in St Michael's Church it St Albans. In a letter to the earl, the list !

which he wrote, after comparing himself to the elder Pliny, who lost his life by trying an experiment about the burning of Mount Vesuvius,' he does not forget to mention his own experiment, which, says he, 'succeeded excellently'

The overstatement by his admirers of Bacon's claims to universal and unparalleled admiration as the greatest of modern philosophers does him ultimately an injustice, and his contributions to science and scientific progress have been too jealously' and grudgingly criticised. Pope's epigram, 'The wisest, brightest, meanest of mankind,' is too complimentary to his wisdom and too hard on his character, Macaulay's praise and blame, glorification and vituperation, are ill balanced in the same way It is absurd to regard him as the in ventor of experi mental science, or as having devised a perfect method Where he actually expounds scientific facts he makes gross blunders, he was not even abreast of the science of his own day, he never mentions Harvey's circulation of the blood, and he persistently rujected the Copernican system He was not, in philosophy proper, a scientific thinker at all. His scientific importance depends on his insistence on the facts that man is the servant and interpreter of nature, that truth is not derived from authority, and that knowledge is the fruit of experience. The inductive method was practised before his time, but he was the first to show its vast importance and to recognise its scientific justification, the impetus his methods gave to future scientific investigation is indisputable turned the tide in favour of experimental research, and though he is not, is used to be said, the father of English philosophy too, the precursor of Locke and Hume, his empiricism gave a tone to English philosophical speculation. His owi character is strangely complex. He had an unparalleled behef in himself, which warranted him in ignoring the ordinary laws of morality H_L was conscious of possessing intellectual power sufficient to revolutionise the relations of man and nature, and he was slow to recognise any moral obstacle that came in the way of his attaining the wealth and position needed for realising his vast intel-He found himself drawn to lectual ambition politics in order to obtain power, but he always regarded himself as a stranger in the political sphere he failed as a manager of men, and he made shipwreck of his life. But with calm confidence he wrote in his will, 'For my name and memory, I leave it to men's charitable speeches and to foreign nations and the next ages' His eminence in the sphere of practical philosophy, as a master of pregnant thoughts clothed in splendid, nervous, dignified, and for his time singularly concise and trenchant English, is recognised by everybody

The five following extracts are from the Famoria

Of Death

Men fear death, as children fear to go in the dark and as that natural fear in children is increased with tales, so is the other. Certainly the contemplation of death as the wages of sin and passage to another world is holy and religious, but the fear of it as a tribute due unto nature is weak. Yet in religious medi tations there is sometimes mixture of vanity and of superstition. You shall read in some of the fnars' books of mortification, that a man should think with himself what the pain is if he have but his finger's end pressed or tortured, and thereby imagine what the pains of death are, when the whole body is corrupted and dissolved, when many times death passeth with less pain than the torture of a limb for the most vital parts are not the quickest of sense. And by him that spake only as a philosopher and natural man, it was well said, Pompa mortis magis terret quani mors ifsa. Groans. and convulsions, and a discoloured face and friends weeping, and blacks, and obsequies, and the like shew death terrible. It is worthy the observing that there is no passion in the mind of man so weak but it mates and masters the fear of death and therefore death is no such terrible enemy, when a man ha h so many at tendants about him, that can win the combat of him Revenue triumphs over death, love slights it honour aspireth to it, grief flyeth to it, fear pre occupateth it nty, we read, after Otho the emperor had slain himself, pity, which is the tenderest of affections, provoked many to die out of mere compassion to their sovereign, and as the truest sort of followers. Nay, Seneca adds, nice ness and satisty could quandu cadem fecers more relle, non tantum fortis, aut miser, sal etiam fastidiosus fotest. A man would die, though he were neither valuant nor miserable, only upon a weariness to do the same thing so oft over and over. It is no less worthy to observe how little alteration in good spirits the approaches of death make, for they appear to be the same men till the last instant. Inaustus C war died in a compliment. Livia, conjugit in dri nera r cice, et Titeria in dissimulation, as Tacitus suth of الت ٢ han fari literiam ires et cereue, non dissinu i un, deserci int. Vespasian in a jest 13 futo, Deur fig. Galba with a sentence. Ferr, in ex resit fopuli Romani, holding forth his neck. Septimus Severus in dispatch. Adate, si quid milit rastat agendum, and the like. Certainly the Stores bestowed too much cost upon death, and by their great preparations made it appear more fearful. Better saith he [Juvenal], qui finem ritie extremum inter munera conit natura. It is as natural to die, as to be born, and to a little infant perhaps the one is as painful as the other. He that dass in an earnest pursuit is like one that is wounded in hot blood, who for the time scarce feels the hurt, and therefore a mind fixt and bent upon somewhat that is good doth avert the dolors of death but above all believe it, the sweetest canticle is Aunc dimittis, when a man hath obtained worthy ends and expectations | Depth hath this also , that it openeth the gate to good fame, and extinguisheth envy -extinctus amabitur idem

Of Studies

Studies serve for delight, for ornament, and for ability Their chief use for delight is in privateness and retiring, for ornament, is in discourse, and for ability, is in the judgment and disposition of business, for expert men can execute, and perhaps judge of particulars, one by one, but the general counsels and the plots and mar shalling of affairs come best from those that are learned To spend too much time in studies is sloth, to use them too much for ornament is affectation, to make judgment wholly by their rules is the humour of a scholar, they perfect nature and are perfected by expe mence-for natural abilities are like natural plants, that need pruning by study, and studies themselves do give forth directions too much at large, except they be bounded in by experience. Crasty men contemn studies, simple men admire them, and wise men use them, for they teach not their own use, but that is a wisdom without them, and above them, won by observation. Read not to contradict and confute, nor to believe and take for granted, nor to find talk and discourse, but to weigh and consider. Some books are to be tasted, others to be swallowed, and some few to be chewed and digested that is, some books are to be read only in parts, others to be read, but not curiously, and some few to be read wholly, and with diligence and attention. Some books allo may be read by deputy and extracts made of them by others, but that would be only in the less important arguments, and the meaner sort of books, else distilled books are, like common distilled waters flashy things. keading maketh a full man, conference a ready man, and writing an exact man and, therefore, if a man write little, he had need have a great memory, if he confer little, he had need have a present wit, and if he read little, he had need have much cunning, to seem to know that he doth not

Of Beauty

Virtue is like a rich stone, best plain set, and surely virtue is best in a body that is comely, though not of delicate feature, and that hath rather dignity of presence than beauty of aspect, neither is it almost seen, that ver beautiful per ons are otherwise of great virtue, as if nature were rather busy not to err, than in labour to produce excellency, and therefore they prove accomplished, but not of great spirit, and sindy rather behaviour than virtue. But this lo'ds not always for luguious examples that this lo'ds not always for luguious examples to the pastanus. Infinite Bell of France, Edward IV of Inghard, Ale mades of Athens, Lunael, the sephy of Persia, were all high and great spirits, and yet the most beautiful men of their times. In beauty, that of favour is more than that of colour and that of decent and gracious motion more than that of favour That is the best part of beauty which a picture cannot express, no, nor the first sight of the life. There is no excellent beauty that hath not so ne strangeness in the proportion. A man cannot tell whether Apelles or Albert Durer were the more trifler, whereof the one would make a personage by geometrical proportions the other, by taling the best parts out of divers faces to make one excellent. Such personages, I think, ould please nobod, but the painter that made them Not but I think a painter may make a better face than ever was but he must do it by a kind of felicity (25 a musician that maketh an excellent air in music), and no by rule, A man shall see taces, that, if you examine them part by part, you shall find never a good and let altogether do well If it be true that the principal part of b auty is in decent motion certainly it is no marvel though persons in years seem many times more a nuble, fall return autumnus pulcher, for no youth can be comely but by pardon and considering the youth 13 to mal c up the comelines Beauty is as summer fruits, which are easy to corrupt and cannot list, and, for the most part, it makes a dissolute youth, and an age a little out of countenance, but yet certainly again, if it light well, it mal eth virtues shine, and vices blush.

Of Deformity

Deformed persons are commonly even with nature, for as nature hath done ill by them, so do they by nature, being for the most part, as the Scripture saith, 'void of natural affection,' and so they have their revenge of nature. Certainly there is a consent between the body and the mind, and where nature erreth in the one, she sentureth in the other Ubs pacat in uni, perichtatur in alters but because there is in man an election touching the frame of his mind, and a nece sity in the frame of his body, the stars of natural inclination are sometimes obscured by the sun of discipline and virtue, therefore it is good to consider of deformity, not as a sign which is more deceivable, but as a cause which seldom fuleth of the effect. Whosoever hath any thing fixed in his person that doth induce contempt, both also a perpetual spur in himself to rescue and deliver himself from scorn, therefore, all deformed persons are extreme hold, first, as in their own defence, as being exposed to scorn, but in process of time by a general habit it 'irreth in them industry, and especially of this kind, o which and observe the weakness of others, that they may have omewhat to repay. Again, in their superiors, it quencheth jealousy towards them, as persons that they think the may at pleasure despise, and it laveth their competion and emulators asleep as never believing they hould be in possibility of advancement till they we them in possission. So that upon the matter, in a great sat, determits is an advantage to rising in "localt times, and at this present in some countries, were cont to put great trust in ennucles, because they that are envious towards all are more obnoxious and office us fower by one, but not their trust towards them ha 't rituer been as to good spials and good shisperers, that you may traces and officers and much like is the raion of deformed persons. Still the ground is, they vill, item, be of spirit, seek to free themsel es ma seem, had much be either by intue or make, and therefore let it not be marvelled if sometimes they prove excellent persons, as was Agesilaus, Zanger the son of Solyman, Esop, Gasca, president of Peru, and Socrates may go likewise amongst them, with others.

Of Adversity

The virtue of prosperity is temperance, the virtue of adversity is fortitude. Prosperity is the blessing of the Old Testament, adversity is the blessing of the New. which carrieth the greater benediction, and the clearer revelation of God's favour Yet even in the Old Testa ment, if you listen to David's harp, you shall hear as many hearse like airs as carols, and the pencil of the Holy Ghost hath laboured more in describing the afflic tions of Job than the felicities of Solomon. Prosperity is not without many fears and distastes, and adversity is not without comforts and hopes. We see in needle works and embroidenes, it is more pleasing to have a lively work upon a sad and solemn ground, than to have a dark and inclancholy work upon a lightsome ground judge therefore of the pleasure of the heart by the pleasure of the eye Certainly virtue is like precious odours, most fragrant where they are incensed or crushed, for prospenty doth best discover vice, but adversity doth best discover virtue

Weighty words are scattered through all the essays, and many phrases or sentences have become proverbial. It is the essay 'Of Marriage and Single Life' that begins, 'He that hath wife and children hath given hostages to fortune, for they are impediments to great enterprises, either of virtue or mischief.' That 'Of Parents and Children' has 'Children sweeten labours, but they make misfortunes more bitter, they increase the cares of life, but they mitigate the remembrance of death' That 'Of Revenge' gives a famous 'Revenge is a wild kind of justice, definition which the more man's nature runs to, the more ought law to weed it out. Tor as for the first wrong, it doth but offend the law, but the revenge of that wrong putteth the law out of office, 'Of Gardens' he says 'God Almighty first planted a garden, and indeed it is the purest of human pleasures. It is the greatest refreshment to the spirit of man, without which buildings and palities are but gross handy-works and a man shall ever see that when ages grow to civility and elegancy, men come to build stately sooner than to garden finely, as if gardening were the greater perfection' 'Of Building' we have the pregnant remark 'Houses are builty to live in, and not to look on therefore let use be preferred before uniformity except where both may be had Leave the goodly fabrics of houses for beauty only to the enchanted pilaces of the poets, who build them with small cost? And another essay commences 'Dissimulation is but a faint kind of policy or wisdom, for it asketh a strong wit and a strong heart to know when to tell truth and to do it. Therefore it is the wealer sort of politicians who are the greatest dissemblers' From the same rich source are 'A crowd is not company, and faces are but a gallery of pictures, and talk but a tinkling cymbal, where there is no love,' 'Lookers on many times see more than the gamesters' He seems to have coined new proverbs as easily as he quoted old ones—'The remedy worse than the disease,' &c.—and wittily moulded anew the wisdom of the ancients. Thus he takes the Scriptural proverb about riches making themselves wings, and adds a new thought. 'Riches have wings, and sometimes they fly away of themselves, sometimes they must be set flying to bring in more.' The idea 'Knowledge is power,' which Bacon repeatedly expresses, is to be found, it should be noted, in the Meditationes Sacræ of his mediæval namesake, Roger Bacon.

Bacon left the following fragment for the beginning of a History of Henry VIII, in continuation of his Henry VII—all that was ever written of it

After the decease of that wise and fortunate king, Henry the seventh, who died in the height of his prosperity, there followed, as useth to do, when the sun setteth so exceeding clear, one of the fairest mornings of a kingdom that hath been known in this land, or any where else A young king about eighteen years of age, for stature, strength, making, and beauty, one of the goodlest persons of his time. And though he were given to pleasure, yet he was likewise desirous of glory, so that there was a passage open in his mind by glory, for virtue Neither was he unadorned with learning, though therein he came short of his brother Arthur He had never any the least pique, difference, or jealousy with the king his father, which might give any occasion of altering court or council upon the change, but all things passed in a still. He was the first heir of the white and red rose, so that there was no discontented party now left in the kingdom, but all men's hearts turned towards him and not only their hearts, but their eyes also, for he was the only son of the kingdom He had no brother, which though it be a comfortable thing for kings to have, yet it draweth the subjects' eyes a little aside yet being a married man in those young years, it promised hope of speedy issue to succeed in the crown Neither was there any queen mother, who might share any way in the government, or class with his coun sellors for authority, while the king intended his pleasure. No such thing as any great and mighty subject, who might any way eclipse or overshade the imperial power And for the people and state in general, they were in such lowness of obedience, as subjects were like to yield, who had lived almost four and twenty years under so politic a king as his father, being also one who came partly in by the sword, and had so high a courage in all points of regality, and was ever victorious in rebellions and seditions of the people. The crown extremely rich, and full of treasure, and the kingdom like to be so in a short time. For there was no war, no dearth, no stop of trade or commerce, it was only the crown which had sucked too hard, and now being full, and upon the head of a young king, was like to draw less. Lastly, he was inheritor of his father's reputation, which was great throughout the world. He had strait alliance with the two neighbour states, in ancient enemy in former times, and an ancient friend, Scotland and Burgundy He had peace and amity with France, under the assur ance, not only of treaty and league, but of necessity and mability in the French to do him hurt, in respect that the French king's designs were wholly bent upon Italy so that it may be truly said, there had scarcely been seen or known in many ages such a rare con currence of signs and promises of a happy and flour ishing reign to ensue, as were now met in this young king, called after his father's name, Henry the eighth

The New Atlantis records the discovery of a magnificent island in the northern-Pacific, v hose eminently Christian, courteous, chaste, and cultured inhabitants protect themselves against the evil communications of a corrupt world by deliberately isolating themselves in their self-sufficing father-Strangers are discouraged from landing save under special circumstances, and, needing nothing from abroad, the islanders carry on no traffic with foreign parts, though they send out carefully disguised, specially selected commissioners to report on all that is noteworthy in the way of science or learning, invention or discover; amongst The 'New Atlantis' is so called in the outsiders contrast with the other or great Atlantis, which is identified with the American continent, and the romance has points in common with More's Utopia (referred to by an islander, not altogether approvingly, as 'a book of one of your men, of a feigned commonwealth), Voltaire's Candide, Johnson's Rasselas, and still more oddly with The Book of Mormon, for there is word of the prehistoric civilised races who preceded the North American Indians, and the favoured islanders-possibly descended from Nachoran, 'another son' of Abraham-receive a direct and immediate gift of the sacred Scriptures in book form, as also of the miraculous power to read them without difficulty The New Atlantis is, as a romance, painfully didactic, but is in other respects curiously interesting, though it has only here and there the charm of Bacon's best style, and is obviously but a fragment of an undeveloped The voyage is thus described scheme

We sailed from Peru, where we had continued by the space of one whole year, for China and Japan, by the South Sea, taking with us victuals for twelve months, and had good winds from the east, though soft and weak, for five months' space and more. But then the wind came about, and settled in the west for many days, so as we could make little or no way, and were sometimes in purpose to turn back. But then, again, there arose strong and great winds from the south, with a point east, which carried us up, for all that we could do, to wards the north by which time our victuals failed us, though we had made good spare of them. So that, finding ourselves in the midst of the greatest wilderness of waters in the world, without victual, we gave ourselves for lost men, and prepared for death. Yet we did lift up our hearts and voices to God above, who sheweth his wonders in the deep, beseeching him of his mercy, that as in the beginning he discovered the face of the day, all brought forth dry land, so he would now discover land to us, that we might not perish. And it came to pass, that the next day, about evening, we saw within a lenning before us, to vards the north, as it were thick close, which did put us in some hope of land, knowing how that part of the South Sea was utterly unknorn, and might have islands or continents, that Intherto were not come to light. Wherefore we bent our course thather, where we saw the appearance of land all that night, and in the dawning of the next day, we might plainly discern that it was a land, flat to our sigh, and full of boscage, which made it shew the more And after an hour and a half's sailing we entered into a good haven, being the port of a fair city, not areat indeed, but well built, and that gave a pleasant view from the sea and we thinking every minute long till we were on land, came close to the shore, and offered to land. But straightways we saw divers of the people with hastons in their hands as it were, forbidding us to land, yet without any ones or ficroeness, but only as warning us off by signs that they made. Whereupon, being not a little discomforted we were advising with During which time there ourselves what we should do made forth to us a small boat with about eight persons in it, whereof one of them had in his hand a tipstaff of a yellow cane, tipped at both ends with blue, who came abourd our ship, without any show of distrust at all. and when he saw one of our number present himself omewhat afore the rest, he drew forth a little scroll of parchment, somewhat yellower than our parchment, and shining like the leaves of writing tables, but otherwise oft and flexible, and delivered it to our foremost man. In which scroll were written in ancient Hebrew, and in ancient Greek, and in good Latin of the school, and in Spanish these words 'Land ye not, none of you, and provide to be gone from this coast within sixteen days, except you have further time given you meanwhile if you want fresh water, or victual, or help for your sick, or that your ship needeth repair, write down your wants, and you shall have that which belongeth to mercy '

Ultimately the voyagers were most kindly received in 'the Stringers' House,' hospitably entertuned at the public expense, and their sick doctored, on condition only of their keeping within the bounds prescribed to them When they naturally wished to know how their hosts had received Christianity, they were told a marvellous tale how 'about twenty years after the ascension of our Saviour,' out of a pillar of fire a cedar wood irk came sailing shorewirds in presence of all the inhabitants of the city of Renfusa, containing a letter from the apostle Bartholomen and a complete copy on parchment of the Old and New Testaments-including, Bacon notes, those 'books of the New Testiment which were not at that time written,' though, he evidently thought most of the books were extant in 1D 53 or there Then or later they also became possessed of the otherwise wholly lost encyclopedic work which Solomon 'wrote of all plants from the cedar of Libanus to the moss that growtth out of the and they were miraculously empowered to read these sacred books as if they had been wn 'en in their o'in language.

The following remarkable communication by the governor of the Strangers' House distinctly trenches on the province of The Book of Mormon and of Solomon Spaulding's romance

'You shall understand, that which perhaps you will scarce think credible, that about three thousand years ago, or somewhat more, the navigation of the world, especially for remote voyages, was greater than at this Do not think with yourselves, that I know not how much it is increased with you within these six score years I know it well, and yet I say greater then than now whether it was, that the example of the ark, that saved the remnant of men from the universal deluge, gave men confidence to adventure upon the waters, or what it was, but such is the truth. The Phænicians, and especially the Tyrians, had great fleets. So had the Carthaginians their colony, which is yet farther west loward the east, the shipping of Egypt, and of Palestine, was likewise great. China also, and the great Atlantis, that you call America, which have now but junks and canoes, abounded then in tall ships. This island, as appeareth by faithful registers of those times, had then fifteen hundred strong ships, of great content. Of all this there is with you sparing memory, or none, but we have large knowledge thereof

'At that time this land was known and frequented by the ships and vessels of all the nations before named And, as it cometh to pass, they had many times men of other countries, that were no sailors, that came with them, as Persians, Chaldeans, Arabians, so as almost all nations of might and fame resorted hither, of whom we have some stirps and little tribes with us at this day And for our own ships, they went sundry voyages, as well to your Straits, which you call the pillars of Her cules, as to other parts in the Atlantic and Mediterraneau Seas, as to Peguin, which is the same with Cambaline, and Quinzy upon the Oriental Seas, as far as to the borders of the Last Partary [There is some confusion here for which neither Marco Polo nor Sebastian Munster is responsible. Pegu has no connection with Cambaluc or Cambalu, i.e. Peking, nor that with Quinzy, Quinsay, Kinsai, or Khing sai, i.e. Hang chow foo And neither Peking nor Hang-chow is on the oriental sea.]

"At the same time, and an age after, or more, the in habitants of the great Atlantis did flourish For though the narration and description which is made by a great man with you, that the descendants of Neptune planted there, and of the magnificent temple, palace, city and hill, and the manifold streams of goodly navigable rivers, which, as so many chains, environed the same site and temple, and the several degrees of ascent, whereby men did climb up to the same, as if it had been a scala cali, be all poetical and fabulous yet so much is true, that the said country of Atlantis, as well that of Peru, then called Coya, as that of Mexico, then named Tyrambel, were mighty and proud kingdoms in arms, shipping, and riches so mighty, as at one time, or at least within the space of ten years, they both made two great expeditions, they of Tyrambel, through the Atlantic to the Mediterranean Sea, and they of Coya, through the South Sea upon this our island and for the former of these, which was into Europe, the same author amongst you, as at seemeth, had some relation from the Egyptian priest whom he citeth. For assuredly, such a thing there was, but whether it were the ancient Athenians that had the glory of the repulse and resistance of those forces, I can say nothing, but certain it is, there never came back either ship, or man, from that voyage. Neither had the other voyage of those of Coya upon us had better fortune, if they had not met with enemies of For the king of this island, by name greater clemency Altabin, a wise man, and a great warrior, knowing well both his own strength, and that of his enemies, handled the matter so, as he cut off their land forces from their ships, and entoiled both their navy and their camp with a greater power than theirs, both by sea and land, and compelled them to render themselves without striking stroke and after they were at his mercy, contenting himself only with their oath, that they should no more bear arms against him, dismissed them all in safety But the divine revenge overtook not long after those proud enterprises. For within less than the space of one hundred years, the great Atlantis was utterly lost and destroyed, not by a great earthquake, as your man saith, for that whole tract is little subject to earthquakes, but by a particular deluge or inundation those countries having, at this day, far greater rivers and far higher mountains, to pour down waters, than any part of the old world. But it is true that the same inundation was not deep, not past forty foot, in most places, from the ground so that although it destroyed man and beast generally, yet some few wild inhabitants of the wood escaped. Birds also were saved, by flying to the high buildings in many places higher than the depth of the water, yet that inundation, though it were shallow, had a long continuance, whereby they of the vale, that were not drowned, perished for want of food, and other things necessary. So as marvel you not at the thin population of America, nor at the rudeness and ignorance of the people, for you must account your inhabitants of America as a young people, younger a thousand years, at the least, than the rest of the world, for that there was so much time between the universal flood and their particular inundation. For the poor remnant of human seed, which remained in their mountains, peopled the country again slowly, by little and little and being simple and savage people, not like Noah and his sons, which was the chief family of the earth, they were not able to leave letters, arts, and civility to their posterity, and having likewise in their mountainous habitations been used, in respect of the extreme cold of those regions, to clothe themselves with the skins of tigers, bears, and great hairy goats, that they have in those parts when after they came down into the valley, and found the intolerable heats which are there, and knew no means of lighter apparel, they were forced to begin the custom of going naked, which continueth at this day '

The most characteristic institution of the island is 'Solomon's House, or the College of the Six Days' Works, and Bacon's chief interest in the whole affair was in the description of this 'model of a college for the interpreting of nature and the producing of great and marvellous works for the benefit of men.' Amongst the 'riches of Solomon's House,' the first to be named are low-level and high-level observatories and experimental stations. The 'low region' is in caves or shafts sunk six hundred fathoms, some of them under great hills and mountains. The high-level ones are thus described

"We have high towers, the highest about half a mile in height, and some of them likewise set upon high mountains, so that the vantage of the hill with the tower, is in the highest of them three miles at least And these places we call the upper region - accounting the air between the high places and the low, as a middle region. We use these towers, according to their several heights and situations, for insolation, refrigeration, con servation, and for the view of divers meteors, as winds, rain, snow, hail, and some of the fiery meteors also. And upon them, in some places, are dwellings of hermits, whom we visit sometimes, and instruct what to observe"

Solomon's House gave no hesitating approval to systematic vivisection

'We have also parks and inclosures of all sorts of beasts and birds, which we use not only for view or rare ness, but likewise for dissections and trials, that thereby we may take light what may be wrought upon the body of man. Wherein we find many strange effects, as continuing life in them, though divers parts, which you account vital, be perished, and taken forth, resuscitating of some that seem dead in appearance, and the like. We try also all poisons and other medicines upon them, as well of chirurgery as physic. By art likewise, we make them greater or taller than their kind is, and contrari wise dwarf them, and stay their growth we make them more fruitful and bearing than their kind is, and contrariwise barren, and not generative.'

How far Bacon was from the truth as it is in modern science may be seen from other departments of the college, which abet spontaneous generation 'We have also means to make divers plants rise by mixtures of earths without seeds, and likewise to make divers new plants differing from the vulgar, and to make one tree or plant turn into another. We make a number of kinds of serpents, worms, flies, fishes of putrefaction, whereof some are advanced in effect to be perfect creatures like beasts or birds, and have seves and do propagate.' The New Atlantis ends abruptly, after describing at some length several of the various departments of the college.

Bacon's adhesion to various anti-scientific maxims is also conspicuous in his Sylva Sylva-rum or Natural History, where there is a chapter 'Of the insecta bred of putrefaction,' for example Here too he prescribes experiments for the 'version and transmutation of air into water,' and others for the making of gold from silver or copper (quicksilver is useless for the purpose) 'The world hath been much abused by the opinion of making gold the work itself I judge to be possible, but the means hitherto propounded to effect it are in the practice full of error and imposture, and in the theory full of unsound imagination'

Confidence in the importance of his work is expressed in the following characteristic sentences (quoted from the translation of the Novum Organum prepared for Stebbing's edition)

I have made a beginning of the work—a beginning, as I hope, not unimportant—the fortune of the human race will give the issue,—such an issue, it inay be, as in the present condition of things and men's minds cannot easily be conceived or imagined. For the matter in hand is no mere felicity of speculation, but the real business and fortures of the human race, and all power of operation. For man is but the servant and interpreter of nature, what he does and what he knows is only what he has observed of nature's order in fact or in thought, beyond this he knows nothing and can do nothing. For the chain of causes cannot by any force be loosed or broken, nor can nature be commanded except by being obeyed. And so those twin objects, human Knowledge and human Power, do really meet in one, and it is from ignorance of causes that operation fails.

And all depends on keeping the eye steadily fixed upon the facts of nature and so receiving their images simply as they are. For God forbid that we should give out a dream of our own imagination for a pattern of the world, rather may be graciously grant to us to write an apocalypse or true vision of the footsteps of the Creator imprinted on his creatures.

Bacon's verses have a somewhat exceptional interest in view of the Bacon Shakespeare propaganda. Two poems have often been printed as his on very doubtful authority. That beginning—

The man of his upright
Whose guiltless heart is free
I rom all dishonest deeds,
Or thought of vanity, is now known to be Campion's. The other, in cluded at first in Palgrave's Golden Treasury, is a translation or paraphrase of a Greek epigram of uncertain authorship. The paraphrase was ascribed to Bacon as early as 1629, three vears after his death, and was accepted by Spedding as his. It is suggestive and metrical, and well voithy of a 'metaphysical poet,' but is hardly a triumphant poetical achievement, as may be seen from the first verse.

The world's a bubble and the life of man
Less than a span,
In his conception wretched, from the womb
So to the tomb
Curst from the cradle and brought up to years
With cares and fears.
Who then to frail mortality shall trust
But hims the water or but writes in dust.

But Bacon certainly executed a metrical Translation of Certain Psalms, seven in number, for he published them in his own name (1624), with a grateful dedication to his friend George Herbert They are the only verses we can confidently say were written by the Lord Chancellor, and they give no very high idea of vihat he could do when he assumed his singing robes. The First Psalm is versified in this fashion

Who never gave to wicked reed
A yielding and attentive ear,
Who never sinners' paths did tread,
Vor sat him down in scorner's chair,
Lat maketh it his whole delight
On law of God to meditate,
And therein spendeth day and night
That man is in a Lappy state.

The Hundred and Forty-ninth is even less worthy of the author of such majestic prose, and as poetry is clearly below the ordinary level of Sternhold and Hopkins. The first verse runs

O sing a new song to our God above,
Avoid prophane ones, 'tis for holy quire
Let Israel sing songs of holy love
To him that made them, with their hearts on fire
Let Sion's sons lift up their voice and sing
Carols and anthems to their heav'nly king

Attempts have sometimes been made to extend portentously Bacon's literary bequest to posterity From Delia Bacon's time (1857) to the present day the voice of the paradoxist has from time to time been heard proclaiming to an incredulous world the faith that Bacon is the author or joint author of some or most or all of Shakespeare's plays. Because Shakespeare was not a really great actor and was regardless of his fame, because he did not publish his own plays, because the player was illiterate while the plays were learned because the plays must have been written by the greatest man of that or all time, because Bacon was great enough to have written them, because of coincidences between Bacon's thought and the playwright's, because of cryptograms worked into the texture of the plays (Donnelly) because the more im portant of the plays fit exactly into gaps left by Bacon in the system of his prose works (Bormann)-for these and other reguons we are asked to believe this eccentric theory Delia Bacon wrote the Philosophy of the Plays of Shakespears Unfolded in 1857 Wyman published in 1884 (at Chicago) a Bibliography of the Shakespeare Bacon Controversy, containing two hundred and fifty five entries (seventy three for the Bacon view) Donnelly's Great Cryptogram (1388) tned to prove that Bacon's cryptogram was found throughout Shakespeare. The same argument may of course be extended—and has been extended—to claim what is best in Marlowe, Burton and even Montaigne for Bacon 1-surely with the effect of a reductio ad absurdum. C. Stopes issued a pamphlet on the Shakespeare Bacon Question in 1888, and another in 1989. Two notable German contributions were J Schipper Zur Krielk der Shakespeare Bacon Frage (against, Vienna, 1839) and Edwin Bormann, Das Shakespeare Geheimniss (1894 trans The Shake speare Secret 1896). The first Life of Bacon was by his 'learned chaplain, William Rawley (c. 1588-1667) it appeared in 1657 and went into a second edition in 1661. The standard edition of Bacon's works is that of Spedding, Ellis, and Heath (14 vols. 1857-74) seven volumes of which are occupied by the apologetic Life and Letters by Mr Spedding See also Macaulay's brilliant attack, the article in the Dictionary of National Biography by Dr S R. Gardiner and Dr Fowler Dean Church's monograph in the 'Men of Letters' series (1884) and the short Life by Dr Abbott (1885), with the Life and Philosophy by Professor Nichol (1890), and for the philosophy, Kuno Fischer's monograph (trans 1857) and Fowler's edition of the vovum Organum (1878).

Lancelot Andrewes (1555-1626), successively bishop of Chichester, Ely, and Winchester, and a privy councillor, had the singular good fortune to enjoy the favour of three sovereigns, and his death was mourned by the youthful muse of Born at Barking, and bred at Merchant Faylors' and Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, he was at thirty four Master of the Hall and probendary of St Paul's, and was reputed next to Ussher the most learned divine of the day. In patristic learning he stood alone. By his defence of James against Bellarmine-James having written an apology for the new onth of allegrance—he secured the special favour of the ling. He attended the Hampton Court Conference, and went with the king to Scotland in 1617 to try to persuade the Scots that cpiscopacy was better than presbytery. Andrewes was a strong High Churchman, and, like his protegé and friend Laud, attached importance to a high ritual the Puritan Pronne describes with open disgust the 'Popish furniture' of his private chapels both at Ely and at Winchester sonally he was, unlike Laud, tolerant towards those who thought differently, and was revered for his devoutness by many strict Puritans He was master of fifteen languages, was of sufficient depth in philosophy to be consulted by Bacon, and was almost equally noted for his charity, his munificence, and his wit. Dr Neale, Bishop of Durham, and Andrewes were standing behind the king's chair at dinner, when James suddenly turned to them and said, 'My lords, cannot I take my subjects' money when I want it, without all this formality in Parliament?' Neale replied, 'God forbid, sir, but you should, you are the breath of our nostrils' The king then addressed Andrewes 'Well, my lord, and what say you?' 'Sir,' replied Andrewes, 'I have no skill to judge of parliamentary cases' The king answered, 'No puts off, my lord, answer me presently' 'Then, sir,' said he, 'I think it lawful for you to take my brother Neale's money, for he offers it.' He was accounted the greatest preacher of his time, 'the star of preachers,' 'an angel in the pulpit,' but to a taste moulded on the later and more flowing style of Jeremy Taylor and Tillotson, the power and impressiveness of his sermons and their wealth of matter and illustration are obscured by the abruptness of the transitions, the tags of Latin and Greek, and the extraordinary verbal conceits or puns-' If it be not Immanu el it will be Immanu hell, ' 'Immanu el and Immanu all' The following extract is a fair specimen

Of Angels and Men.

Of the parties compared, angels and men, these two we must first compare, that we may the more clearely see the greatnesse of the grace and benefit, this day vouch safed us. No long processe will need to lay before you how farre inferiour our nature is to that of the angels it is a comparison without comparison It is too apparant, if we be laid together or weighed together we shall be found minus habentes, farre too light. They are in expresse termes said (both in the Old and in the New Testament) to excell us in power and as in power, so in all the rest. This one thing may suffice to shew the oddes that our nature, that we, when we are at our very highest perfection, it is even thus expressed that we come neare, or are therein like to, or as an angell Perfect beautie, in Saint Stephen they saw his face, as the face of an angell. Perfect wisdome in David my lord the king is wise, as an angel of God eloquence in Saint Paul though I spake with the tongues of men, nay of angels. All our excellence, our highest and most perfect estate, is but to be as they therefore, they above us farre

But to come nearer What are angels? Surely they are spirits, glorious spirits, heavenly spirits, immortal spirits. For their nature or substance, spirits, for their quality or property, glorious, for their place or abode, heavenly, for their durance or continuance, immortall.

And what is the seed of Abraham, but as Abraham himselfe is? And what is Abraham? Let him answer himselfe I am dust and ashes. What is the seed of Abraham? Let one answer in the persons of all the rest, dicens putredint, &c, saying to rottennesse, thou art my mother, and to the wormes, yee are my brethren

- I They are spirits, now what are we, what is the seed of Abraham? Flesh. And what is the very harvest of this seed of flesh? What but corruption, and rottenness, and worms. There is the substance of our bodies.
- 2. They glorious spirits, we vile bodies (beare with it, it is the Holy Ghost's owne terme, Who shall change our vile bodies) And not only base and vile, but filthy and uncleane ex immundo conceptum senune, conceived of unclean seed there is the metall. And the mould is no better, the wombe wherein we were conceived, vile, base, filthy, and uncleane. There is our qualitie.
- 3 They heavenly spirits, angels of heaven that is, their place of abode is in heaven above, ours is here below in the dust, inter pulices, et culices, times, araneas, et vermes, our place is here among fleas and flies, moths, and spiders, and crawling wormes. There is our place of dwelling
- 4. They are immortal spirits, that is their durance. Our time is proclaimed in the prophet. Flesh, all flesh is grasse, and the glory of it as the floure of the field (from April to June). The sithe commeth, may, the wind but bloweth, and we are gone, withering sooner than the grasse, which is short may, fading sooner than the floure of the grasse, which is much shorter may, saith Job, rubbed in peeces more easily than any moth.

This we are to them if you lay us together, and if you weigh us upon the ballance, we are altogether lighter than vanity itself there is our weight. And if you value us, man is but a thing of nought there is our worth. Hocest omnis homo, this is Abraham, and this is Abraham's seed and who would stand to compare these with angels? Verily, there is no comparison, they are, in comparably, farre better than the best of us.

Now then this is the rule of reason, the guide of all choice, evermore to take the better and leave the worse Thus would man doe, hac est lex hominis Here then commeth the matter of admiration notwith standing these things stand thus, betweene the angels and Abraham's seed (they, spirits, glorious, heavenly, immortall,) yet tooke He not them, yet, in no wise, tooke He them, but the seed of Abraham. The seed of Abraham, with their bodies, vile bodies, earthly bodies of clay, bodies of mortalitie, corruption, and death these Hee tooke, these Hee tooke for all that Angels, and not men, so, in reason, it should be men, and not angels, so it is and, that granted to us, that denied to them Granted to us, so base, that denied them, so glorious. Denied, and strongly denied, Oυ ουδέπω, not, not in any wise, not at any hand, to them They, every way, in every thing else, above, and before us, in this, beneath and behinde us And we (unworthy, wretched men that we are,) above and before the angels, the Cherubim, the Seraphim, and all the principalities, and thrones, in this dignitie. This being beyond the rules and reach of all reason, is surely matter of astonishment Toûto, &c (saith Saint Chrysostome,) this, it easteth me into an extasie, and maketh me to imagine, of our nature, some great matter, I cannot well expresse what. Thus it is it is the Lord, let Him doe what seemeth good in His owne eyes.

In his lifetime Andrewes published nothing but the Latin con troversial works in defence of the ling's views. In 1628 ninety-six sermons were published from his MSS by King Charles's command, Laud being one of the editors. Even more memorable were the Manual of Private Devotions Vanual of Directions for the Sick, and Prayer for the Holy Communion translated by Drake

(1/15) from Indreases Greek and Latin original. The Devotions is the 10 st fairous though meant by Andrewes whelp for his own two. The in t part of it is in Greek, the second in Latin and in while or in part has been repeatedly translated (as by Stanhope and Horse in the eighteenth century, and since by Neale, Cardinal Newman, Verables, and Whyte), and has been found of great profit by all schools of Christians. Cardinal Newmans translation of the first part appeared in the Tracts for the Times. See the Lives of Ardrewes by A. T. Russell (1864) and R. L. Ottley (1864) and Dr. Alexander Whyte's edition of the Devot out (1900).

John Davis (1550?-1605), of Sandridge, near Dirtmouth, always spelt his name Davys, and must not be confounded with another navigator, later and less interesting, John Davis of Lime house (d 1622) Davys of Sandridge was one of the most distinguished among the intrepid navigators of Queen Elizabeth's reign whose adventures are given by Hakluyt In 1585 and the two following years he made three voyages to the Arctic Seas in search of a north-west passage to China, and on his third voyage, in a bark of twenty tons, discovered the strait to which his name (in the spelling Davis) has ever since been applied In 1595 he himself published a small and now exceedingly rare volume, entitled The Worldis Hydrographical Discription, 'wherein,' as we are told in the title page, 'is proved not onely by aucthoritie of writers, but also by Lite experience of travellers, and reasons of substantiall probabilitie, that the worlde in all his zones, clymats, and places, is habitable and in habited, and the seas likewise universally navigable. vithout any naturall anoyance to hinder the same, whereby appeares that from England there is a short and speedie passage into the South Seas to China, Molucca, Phillipina, and India, by northerly navigation, to the renowne, honour, and benefit of her majestics state and communalty' In corro boration of these positions he gives a short narrative of his voyages, which, notwithstanding their unsuccess, seem to him to show that America is in island, and that a north-west passage chists Davis next made two ill fated voyages to the South Sers, and as pilot of a Dutch vessel bound to the East Indies. In his last voyage as pilot of an English ship of 240 tons he was killed in a desperate encounter with Japanese pirates Besides his chief work, he wrote a very successful treatise on navigation, The Seaman's Secrets were edited in 1878 for the Hakluyt Society by Captain A. H. Markhain

In Search of the North-west Passage

In my first voyage not experienced of the nature of those climates, and having no direction either by Chart, Globe, or other certaine relation in what altitude that passage was to be searched, I shaped a Northerly course, and so sought the same towards the South, and in that my Northerly course. I fell upon the shore which in ancient time via called Groenland, five hundred leagues distant from the Durseys, West north west Northerly, the lar I being very high and full of mightie mountaine all covered with enowe, no viewe of wood, grasse, or earth to be seen, and the shore two leagues off into the sea so full of vec at that no shipping cold by any meanes come neure the same. The lothsome vewe of the shore, and irksome noyse of the yee was such that it bred strange concutes among us, so that we supposed the place to be wast and voyd of any sensible or vegitable creatures, whereupon I called the same Desolation, so coasting this shore towardes the South in the latitude of sixtie degrees, I found it to trend towardes the west. I still followed the leading therof in the same height, and after fiftie or sixtic leagues it fayled and lay directly north, which I still followed, and in thirtic leagues sayling upon the West side of this coast by me named Desolation, we were past all the yee and found many greene and pleasant Isles bordering upon the shore, but the mountaines of the maine were still covered with great quantities of snowe. I brought my shippe among those Isks, and there mored to refreshe our selves in our wearie travell, in the latitude of sixtie foure degrees or there about. The people of the countrey having espeed our shippes came downe unto us in their Canoas, holding up their right hand to the Sunne and crying Yliaout, would strike their breasts, we doing the like, the people came aboard our shippes, men of good stature, unbearded, small eyed and of tract able conditions, by whome, as signes would permit, we understoode that towardes the North and West there was a great sea, and using the people with kindenese in giving them nayles and knives which of all things they most desired, we departed, and finding the sea free from yee, supposing our selves to be past al daunger, we shaped our course West northwest, thinking thereby to passe for China, but in the latitude of sixtie sixe degrees, wee fell with an other shore, and there founds an other passage of 20 leagues broad directly West into the same, which we supposed to bee our hoped straight. We entered into the same thirtie or fortie leagues, finding it neither to wyden nor straighten, then, considering that the yeere was spent, for this was in the fine of August, and not knowing the length of this straight and dangers thereof, we tooke it our best course to returne with notice of our good successe for this small time of search And so retourning in a sharpe fret of Westerly windes, the 29 of September we arrived at Dartmouth quainting master Secretary with the rest of the honorable and worshipfull adventurers of all our proceedings, I was appointed againe the seconde yeere to search the bottome of this straight, because by all likelihood it was the place and passage by us laboured for

In this second attempt the marchants of Exeter and other places of the West became adventurers in the action, so that, being sufficiently furnished for sive moneths, and having direction to search these straights until we found the same to fall into an other sea upon the West side of this part of America, we should again returne, for then it was not to be doubted but shipping with trade might safely bee convered to China and the parts of Asia. We departed from Dartmouth, and arriving unto the south part of the coast of Desolation, coasted the same upon his west shore to the latitude of sixetic sixe degrees, and there ancored among the Isles bordering upon the same, where were refreshed our selves. The people of this place came likewise unto us, by whom I understood through their signes that towardes the North the sea was large.

At this place the chiefe ship whereupon I trusted, called the Mermayd of Dartmouth, found many occasions of discontentment, and being unwilling to proceed shee there forsook me. Then considering how I had given my faith and most constant promise to my worshipfull good friend master William Sanderson, who of all men was the greatest adventurer in that action, and tooke such care for the perfourmance theerof that he hath to my knowledge at one time disbursed as much money as any five others whatsoever out of his owne purse, when some of the companie have been slacke in giving in their adventure. And also knowing that I should loose the favour of M. Secretary Walsingham if I should shrink from his direction, in one small barke of 30 Tunnes whereof master Sanderson was owner, alone without farther com fort or company I proceeded on my voyage, and arriving at these straights followed the same eightie leagues, until I came among many Islands, where the water did ebbe and flowe sixe fadome up right, and where there had bene great trade of people to make traine. But by such thinges as there we found wee knew that they were not Christians of Europe that had used that trade, in fine, by searching with our boat we found small hope to passe any farther that way, and therefore retourning agayne recovered the sea and coasted the shore towards the South, and in so doing (for it was to late to search towardes the North) wee found another great inlet neere fortie leagues broad where the water entered in with violent swiftnesse. This we likewise thought might be a passage, for no doubt the North partes of America are all Islands by ought that I could perceive therein but because I was alone in a small barke of thirtie tunnes and the yeere spent, I entred not into the same, for it was now the seventh of September, but coasting the shore towardes the South wee saw an incredible number of birds. Having divers fishermen aboord our barke they all concluded that there was a great skull of fish being unprovided of fishing furniture, with a long spike nayle made a hooke, and fastening the same to one of our sounding lines, before the bait was changed we tooke more than fortie great Cods, the fishe swimming so aboundantly thicke about our barke as is incredible to bee reported, of which with a small portion of salt that we had wee preserved some thirtie couple or thereabouts, and so returned for England. And having reported to M Secretarie Walsingham the whole successe of this attempt, hee commanded me to present unto the most honourable Lorde high Treasurour of England some part of that fish which when his Lordship saw and hearde at large the relation of this second attempt, I received favourable countenance from his honour, advising mee to prosecute the action, of which his Lordship conceived a very good opinion. The next yere, although divers of the adventurers fell from the action, as all the Westerne Marchants and most of those in London, yet some of the adventurers both honourable and worshipfull con tinued their willing favour and charge, so that by this meanes the next yere two shippes were appointed for the fishing and one pinnesse for the discoverie.

Departing from Dartmouth, through Gods mercifull favour I arrived at the place of fishing and there according to my direction I left the two ships to follow that busines, taking their faithful promise not to depart untill my returne unto them, which shoulde be in the fine of August, and so in the barke I proceeded for the discoverie but after my departure in sixteene dayes the shippes had finished their voyage, and so presently departed for England, without regard of their promise. My selfe, not distrusting any such hard measure, proceeded for the discoverie and followed my course in the free and open sea betweene North and North west, to the latitude of 67 degrees, and there I might see America west from me, and Desolation east, then when I saw the land of both sides, I began to distrust that it would proove but a gulfe. Notwithstanding, desirous to knowe the full certainty, I proceeded, and in 68 degrees the passage enlarged, so that I could not see the westerne shore, thus I continued to the latitude of 73 degrees in a great sea, free from yee, coasting the westerne shore of Desolation. The people came continually rowing out unto me in their Canoes, twenty, forty, and one hundred at a time, and would give me fishes dryed, Salmon, Salmon peale, Cod, Caplin, Lumpe, Stonebase, and such like, besides divers kindes of birds, as Partrige, Fesant, Guls, Sea birds, and other kindes of flesh. I still laboured by signes to knowe from them what they knew of any sea towards the North, they still made signes of a great sea as we understood them, then I departed from that coast, thinking to discover the North parts of America. And after I had sayled towards the west 40 leagues I fel upon a great banke of yee, the winde being North and blew much, I was constrained to coast the same toward the South, not seeing any shore West from me, neither was there any yee towards the North, but a great sea, free, large, very salt and blew, and of an unsearcheable So coasting towards the South I came to the place where I left the ships to fish, but found them not Then being forsaken and left in this distresse, referring my selfe to the mercifull providence of God, I shaped my course for England, and unhoped for of any, God alone releeving me, I arrived at Dartmouth By this last discoverie it seemed most manifest that the passage was free and without impediment toward the North, but by reason of the Spanish fleete and unfortunate time of M Secretaries death, the voyage was omitted and never sithins attempted

Dursey Island and rocks are off the south west coast of Ireland Yliaont, according to Davis sown Eskimo vocabulary is 'I meane no harm, train-oil, skull of fish, school, the capelin is a small fish like a smelt the lumpe is the lump fish, the storebase the black bass the partridges and pheasants were presumably ptarmigan.

Sir John Harington, or HARKINGTON (1561-1612), translator of Ariosto, and son of the John Harington already noticed (page 264), was a courtier of Elizabeth, and godson of the queen He was born at Kelston, near Bath, from Eton passed in 1578 to Christ's College, Cambridge, and in 1599 served in Ireland under Essex, by whom, much to the queen's displeasure, he was knighted on the field. His Short View of the State of Ireland (first published in 1880) is modern in tone and much kindlier to the Irish people than was He wrote a collection of epigrams, some Rabelaisian pamphlets, and a Brief View of the Church, in which he reprobates the marriage of bishops His Ariosto (1591), in the measure of the original, is a paraphrase rather than a transla tion, and is easy rather than admirable. Some of his epigrams are pointed and some of them coarse The first book of the Orlando Furioso (i.e. Roland Distraught) thus opens

Of a Precise Taylor

A Taylor, thought a man of upright dealing, True but for lying, honest but for stealing Did fall one day extreamly sick by chance, And on the sudden was in wondrous trance. The Fiends of hell mustring in fearful manner, Of sundry coloured sill es displayed a banner Which he had stolne, and wisht, as they did tell, That he might find it all one day in hell. The man, affrighted with this apparation, Upon recovery grew a great Precisian He bought a Bible of the best translation, And in his life he showed great reformation, He walked mannerly, he talked meckly, He heard three lectures and two sermons weekely, He vowed to shunne all companies unruly, And in his speech he used no oath but Truly, And zealously to keepe the Sabboth's rest, H s meat for that day on the ev'n was drest, And least the custome which he had to steale Might cause him sometimes to forget his zeale, He gives his journyman a speciall charge, That if the stuffe allowed fell out too large, Val that to filch his fingers were inclined, He il en should put the Banner in his minde. This done (I scint can tell the rest for laughter) A Captaine of a ship came three daies after, And brought three varies of velvet and three quarters, To make Venetians downe below the garters.

He that precisely knew what was enuffe,
Soon shipt away three quarters of the stuffe,
His man, espying it, said in derision
'Remember, master, how you saw the vision!'
'Peace, knave!' quoth he, 'I did not see one ragge
Of such a coloured silke in all the flagge.'

The Nuga Antiqua, from his papers, published in 1769 by a descendant, are far from being mere They are an olla podrida containing things of very various interest and importancemany letters of Sir John Cheke, letters and poems by the elder Harington, letters, verses, and translations by Queen Elizabeth, and poems by many Among Sir John Harington's own contributions is a detailed record of his experiences and observations during the marchings, fightings, and parleyings of Essex's forces in Ireland, a long account of Queen Elizabeth's last illness, and an amazing description of a pageant at the court of James I, which turned out a series of lamentable fiascos because of the shamefully drunken condition of the royal guest, King Christian of Denmark, of the court ladies and gentlemen, and of the players, Faith, Hope, Charity, and Peace There is also a delightfully incredible story of the preternatural sagacity of a seventeenth century dog in a letter from its proud master to Prince Henry This besides a series of lives of exemplary bishops of the Church of England from the same industrious pen

The following extract from Harington's account of an interview with Hugh O'Neill, Earl of Tyrone, during a 'cessation' in the fighting (when he had professed penitence and promised to renounce the title of O'Neill) shows the redoubtable arch rebel and leader of the wild Irishry in an unusual light and quite an attractive character

But staying at Dundalk till the 15th of this month, and no news certain of the earl's coming, I went to see the Newry, and from thence to Darlingford by the narrow water, and was hindred by waters that I could not come back to Sir William Warren before his first meeting with the Earl Tyrone, which was on the 17th day, [at] what time how far they proceeded I know not, but it appeard that the earl was left in good dysposition, because he kept his hour so well the next morning and as I found after, Sir William had told him of me, and given such a report of me above my desert, that next day when I came the earl used far greater respect to me than I expected, and began debasing his own manner of hard life, comparing him self to wolves that fill their bellies sometime and fast as long for it, then excused himself to me that he could no better call to mind myself, and some of my friends that had done him some courtesy in England, and been oft in his company at my Lord of Ormond's, saying these troubles had made him forget almost all his friends

After this he fell to private communication with Sir William, to the effecting of the matters begun the day before, to which I thought it not fit to intrude myself, but took occasion the while to entertain his two sons, by posing them in their learning and their tutors, which were one Fryar Nangle, a Franciscan, and a younger scholer whose name I know not, and finding the two children of good towardly spirit, their age between thirteen and fifteen, in English cloths like a nobleman's sons, with velvet gerkins and gold lace, of a good chearful aspect, freckle faced, not tall of stature, but strong, and well set, both of them [learning] the English tongue, I gave them (not without the advice of Sir William Warren) my English translation of 'Ariosto,' which I got at Dublin, which their teachers took very thankfully, and soon after shewed it the earl, who call'd to see it openly and would needs hear some part of it read. I turn'd (as it had been by chance) to the beginning of the 45th canto—

Looke, how much higher Fortune doth erect
The clyming wight, on her unstable wheele,
So much the nigher may a man expect
To see his head where late he saw his heele
On t'other side, the more man is oppressed,
And utterly ov'rthrowne by Fortune's lowre,
The sooner comes his state to be redressed,
When wheele shal turne and bring the happy houre—

and some other passages of the book, which he seemed to like so well, that he solemnly swore his boys should read all the book over to him.

Then they fell to communication again, and calling me to him, the earl said that I should witness and tell my Lord Lieutenant, how against all his confederates' wills, Sir William had drawn him to a longer cessation, which he would never have agreed to, but in confidence of my lord's honourable dealing with him, for, saith he, 'now is my harvest time, now have my men their six weeks pay afore hand, that they have nothing to do but fight, and if I omit this opportunity, and you shall pre pare to invade me the mean time, I may be condemned for a fool.'

Also one pretty thing I noted, that the paper being drawn for him to sign, and his signing it with O'Neal, Sir William (though with very great difficulty) made him to new write it, and subscribe, Hugh Tyrone. Then we broke our fasts with him, and at his meat he was very merry, and it was my hap to thwart one of his priests in an argument, to which he gave reasonable good ear and some approbation. He drank to my lord's health, and bade me tell him he loved him, and acknowledged this cessation had been very honourably kept. He made likewise a solemn protestation that he was not ambitious, but sought only safety of his life and freedom of his conscience, without which he would not live, though the Queen would give him Ireland.

The epigram on carping writers is in the same metre as Raleigh's poem on Sidney (page 308) and rhymes as in the In Ventorian metre used by Lord Herbert of Cherbury. There is a Life of Harington by Sir Clements Markham in the Roxburghe Club edition (1880) of Harington's tract on James's right to succeed Elizabeth.

Sir Henry Wotton—famed less as a poet than as a diplomatist and man of the world in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I—was born at the ancestral seat, Boughton Place, Maidstone, 30th March 1568—After receiving his education at Winchester and New and Queen's Colleges, Oxford, where he became the intimate of Donne, he spent the years 1588–95 on the Continent—Bavaria, Austria, Italy, Switzerland, and France—and made the acquaintance of Beza and Casaubon. He then attached himself to the service of the Earl of Essex, the favourite of Elizabeth, but on his friend's fall from favour withdrew to France and Italy Having gained the friendship of King James of Scotland, when sent by the Duke of Florence to warn him of a plot to poison him, he was employed by James, on his ascending the English throne, as ambassador to Venice. A versatile and lively mind qualified Sir Henry in an eminent degree for this situation, of the duties of which we have his own idea in his well known definition of an ambassador as 'an honest man sent to he abroad for the good of his country' This was originally written in Latin in a friend's album in Germany (though one would think it must have been conceived in English, the pun being essentially English), the publication of it by the scurrilous controversialist Scioppius lost him the Ling's favour for a time. But he was employed as ambassador at Venice in 1604-19 and 1621-24. A mission to Vienna (1620) was with the hopeless attempt of making the policy of James I seem dignified in respect of the deadly struggle begun between his son-in law, the Elector Palatine, elected King of Bohemia, and the emperor James I 's cheap efforts at mediation were scouted by the emperor At Venice, Wotton was the friend of scholars like Paolo Sarpi, a connoisseur in all matters of art, a collector of pictures, a bountiful, public spirited, popular, and hospitable ambassador A sudden change of court favour lost him the Venetian embassy, his salary was in arrears, he was deep in debt, and without income or appointment, when by the mediation of Prince Charles he was made Provost of Eton (1624), having just before published The Elements of Architecture To qualify himself fully he took deacon's orders, and it was not without regretful longings for the great world he had left that he settled down to his duties at Eton, where he died in December 1639, in the seventy-second year of his While resident abroad, he embodied the result of his inquiries into political affairs in a work called The State of Christendom, or a most Exact and Curious Discovery of many Secret Passages and Hidden Mysteries of the Times This, however, was not printed till eighteen years after his death, like his Life of Buckingham and his 'parallel' between Essex and Buckingham - His writings were published in 1651, under the title of Reliquia Wottomanæ, prefaced by Izaak Walton's exquisite biography in miniature. Dr Hannah says none of his pieces has been traced to an earlier date than 1602, but about 1586, he wrote a lost tragedy, Tancredo He was a scholar and patron of men of letters, and his enthusiastic commendation of Milton's Comus-a copy of which the poet had sent to him - stands to his credit. Sir Henry was an easy, amiable man, an angler, and an 'undervaluer of money,' as Walton, who used to fish and converse with him, says Two of his poems are specially well known to lovers of seventeenthcentury verse

The Character of a Happy Life (c. 1614).

How happy is be born and taught.

That serveth not another's will,

Whose armour is his honest thought,

And simple truth his utmost skill.

Whose passions not his masters are, Whose soul is still prepar'd for death, Unit'd unto the World by care Of publick fame or private breath.

Who envies none that chance doth raise, Nor vice hath ever understood, How deep-st wounds are given by praise, Nor rules of State, but rules of good

Who hath his life from rumours freed Whose conscience is his strong retreat, Whose state can neither flatterers feed, Nor ruine make Oppressors great.

Who God doth late and early pray
More of his grace then gifts to lend,
And entertains the harmless day
With a Religious Book or Friend.

On his Mistress, the Queen of Bohemia (c. 1620).

You meaner Beauties of the Night,
That poorly satisfie our Eyes
More by your number than your light,
You Common people of the Skies,
What are you when the Sun shall rise?

You curious Chanters of the Wood,
That warble forth Dame Nature's lays,
Thinking your Voices understood
By your weak accents, what's your praise,
When Philomel her voice shall ruse?

You Violets that first appear
By your pure purple mantles known
Like the proud Virgins of the year,
As if the Spring were all your own,
What are you when the Rose is blown?

So, when my Mistriss shall be seen In Form and Beauty of her mind, By Vertue first, then Choice, a Queen Fell me if she were not designed Th' Eclipse and Glory of her kind?

The last quoted poem has been not unjustly described as an imperishable lyric. Other poems often cited are 'On a bank as I sate a fishing,' 'I'cars at the Grave of Sir Albertus Morton,' and the couplet on the death of the latter's wife.

His prose is perhaps hardly worthy of his varied powers, he beg in many things, and finished too few, being fire dious. But almost all his prosenthough it is unequal in style, and some laborrously corded passages contain little better than commonplace-is enlivened by happy strokes of wit and real humour, quaint conceits (sometimes passing into artificiality), apt allusions, and the wisdom of a man of the world Amongst his prose pieces are a Survey of Education (unfinished), a tedious panegyric of Charles I, 'characters,' and aphorisms on education Characteristic was his advice to Milton, when he went to Italy, to 'keep his thoughts close, and his countenance loose,' and his recommendation to a young diplomatist 'that to be in sufety himself and serviceable to his country' he should always speak the truth, 'and by this means, your truth will secure yourself, if you shall ever be called to any account. and 'twill also put your Adversaries (who will still hunt counter) to a loss in all their disquisitions and undertakings.' Other famous sayings of his are that at Hastings 'the English would not run away and the Normans' could not . 'All that went for good and bad in Caesar was clearly his own, 'Great deservers do grow intolerable presumers,' and that 'hanging was the worst use a man could be put to'

Besides the Life by Walton prefixed to the Reliq uze Wottomanze, there is 'a biographical sketch by A. W Ward (new ed. 1900). Dyce edited his poenis in 1843, and Hannah in 1845, 1264, and 1875

Sir John Davies (1569-1626), lawyer, statesman, and poet, of good Wiltshire family, studied at Queen's College, Oxford Between 1594 and 1596, while a student of the Middle Temple, he published Orchestra, or a Poem of Dancing, in a Dialogue between Penelope and one of her Wooers. in which he represents Penclope as declining to dance with Antinous, whereon Antinous lectures her upon the antiquity and universality of that elegant evercise, whose ments are described in verses partaking of the flexibility and grace of the This 'sudden rash half capreol of his subject wit,' as he called it, is in a seven-line stanza, obviously imitating Spenser, and is a harmonious poem in the conccit that natural phenomena have rhythmical motions and may be said to dance. The following is a fairly representative passage

And now behold your tender nurse, the Ayre,
And common neighbour, that aye runns around,
How many pictures and impressions faire
Within her empty regions are there found,
Which to your sences dauncing do propound,
For what are breath, speech, ecchoes, musicke, winds,
But dauncings of the ayre in sundry kinds?

I or when you breath, the ayre in order moves,
Now in, now out, in time and measure trew,
And when you speake, so well she dauncing loves,
That doubling oft, and oft redoubling new,
With thousand formes she doth herselfe endew
For all the words that from our hips repaire,
Are nought but tricks and turnings of the ayre.

Hence is her pratting daughter, Eccho, borne,

That daunces to all voyces she can heare

There is no sound so harsh that shee doth scorne,

Nor any time wherein shee will forheare

The agric pavement with her feet to weare

And yet her hearing sence is nothing quick, For after time she endeth every trick.

And thou, sweet Mus cke, dauncing's onely life,

The care's sole happinesse, the ayre's best speach,
Loads'one of fello vship, charming rod of strite,

The soft mind's Paradice, the sicke mind's leach,
With thine own tong thou trees and stones canst teach,

That when the aire doth dance her finest measure,

Then art thou born, the gods' and men's sweet pleasure.

Lastly, where keepe the Winds their revelry,

Their violent turnings, and wild whirling hayes,
But in the ayre's traducint gallery?

Where shee herselfe is turned a hundreth wayes,
While with those maskers wantonly she playes

Yet in this misrule, they such rule embrace

As two at once encomber not the place.

Fo 'dance the hay' is to dance in a ring Anticipations of thoughts in more than one modern author have been found in the verses on the tides that closely follow

For loc, the Sea that fleets about the Land,
And like a girdle clips her solide waist,
Musicke and measure both doth understand
For his great chrystall eye is alwayes east
Up to the Moone, and on her fixed fast
And as she daunceth in her pallid spheere
So daunceth he about the center hecre

Sometimes his proud greene waves in order set,
One after other flow into the shore,
Which when they have with many kisses wet,
They ebbe away in order as before,
And to make knowne his courtly love the more,
He oft doth lay aside his three forkt mace,
And with his armes the timorous earth embrace

The poem on dancing is said to have been written in fifteen days It was published in 1596, and the same year he showed a temper other than poetical by breaking his stick over the head of a fellow-Templar who had provoked him by mistimed raillery-oddly enough the same wit to whom he had dedicated his Orchestra Davies was promptly disburred, and was not readmitted till after imple apologies in 1601. His next venture was a new departure for the gay but chastened wit -his famous Aosce Teipsion, or Poem on the Immortality of the Soul, which, first published in 1599, presed through four other editions in the author's lifetime. Davies accompanied the commissioners who brought to James VI of Scotland the official announcement of Queen Elizabeth's death (not the unofficial Sir Robert Carey on his headlong ride), and James at once took the author of Aosce Teipsair anto high fi our. It was at this time that Bacon wrote to Davies the letter begging him to use his interest with the ling in favour of conceiled poets-whatever the term may have meant-of which the Bacon-Shakespeare faction make so much. James made Davies Solicitor General and Attorney General for Ireland, and knighted him, having been Speaker of the Irish Parliament, and i shown great zeal in the plantation of Ulster, he returned to English law practice, sat for Newcastle in the House of Commons, and was King's Surgeant and nearly appointed Chief-Justice at his death.

Davies, especially in Nosce Feipsum, represents, life Donne, a complete revolt against the lovelyrics and pastorals of the earlier Elizabethans, but has most in common with the didactic poet Fulke Greville, Sidney's friend, who had more of the stuff of poetry within him than Davies. None Terpsium deals with subjects of profound interest in a philosophical rather than a poetical temper, many of the best passiges are cloquent, the plan is compact, and the argument logical. Campbell said 'In the happier parts of his poem we come to logical truths so well illustrated by ingenious similes, that we know not whether to call the thoughts more poetically or philosophically just. The judgment and fancy are reconciled, and the imagery of the poem seems to start more vividly from the surrounding shades of abstraction' The versification of the poem (long quatrains) was afterwards copied by D'Avenant and Dryden, and used by Gray in the Elegy Hallam said there was hardly a linguid verse, but there are few passages that have as much claim to be called poetry as these reasons for the soul's immortality

Davies also wrote a series of Hymns is Astrea in acrostics to the glory of Ellis i Betha Regi (a, and some of his shorter poems were printed in Davison's Riftsofy and other collections. He wrote in prose on law subjects and the state of Ireland and edited in the vortain French still current a collection of Cues et matters in Ley resist as and adjudges in let Courts del Roy en cest Realme [Le, Ireland]. His wife Lady Eleanor Davies also a poetess, turned prophetess on the strength of the anagram on her name Reveal O Daniel, and was not cired by the counter anagram of the witty Dean of Arches, Never so mul a ladie! Sir John's works were printed by Grosart in the 'Fuller Worthes (3 vols. 1869-76) the complete poems in the 'Old English Poets (2 vols. 1876)

John Davies of Hereford (1565?-1618), poet, was of Welsh descent, and is sometimes spoken of as the Welsh poet. He became famous as a writing master, and practised this profession in Oxford and London But he found time to write a vast number (too great!) of poems, longer and shorter, on sacred, philosophical, and other themes, eclogues, elegies, and eulogies, for the most part in a very tedious manner. Mirum in Modum discusses in verse God's glory and the soul's shape, Murgeosmus deals with psychology Some of his sonnets are good, and there was a noted poem on The Picture of an Happy Man, full of antitheses of the nature of solemn puns, and beginning thus

How blest is he though ever crost that can all Crosses Blessings make, That findes himself ere he be lost, and lose that found for Vertues sake.

Yer blest is he in life and death, that feares not Death nor loves this Life, That sets his Will his will beneath, and hath continuall feace in strife

Lord of the World epitomiz'd,

Who with staid Front outfaces Fate,

He makes his Conscience a continual Feast

His poems fill two large quarto volumes of Dr Alexander B. Grosart's 'Chertsey Worthes Library (1973).

Sir Robert Circy, or Cara, first Earl of Monmouth (c 1560–1639), wrote one of the earliest autobiographics in the language fighth son of Lord Hunsdon, he served upon several embassies, fought by land and sea, was a warden of the Border marches, was knighted by Essex in 1591, and become Baron of Leppington in 1622, Earl of Monmouth in 1626. His interesting Memoirs s are adited by the Earl of Cork and Orrers in 1759, and by Scott in 1808. In 1589 Carey walked for a wiger from London to Berwick (342 miles) in ti clic days, and won £2000, in March 1603 he rode from near London to Edinburgh in about aixt hours, to bring the news of Queen Elizabeth's death to James VI, in direct defiance of the orders of the Government, who were preparing to despatch a dignified and formal commission, which arrived two days after Carey (see page 395)

A Scottish Raider

There was a favourite of Sir Robert Car's, a great thief, called Geordic Bourne. This gallant, with some of his associates, would in a bravery come and take goods in the East March I had that night some of the garrison abroad. They met with this Geordie and his fellows, driving of cattle before them. The garrison set upon them, and with a shot killed Geordie Bourne's uncle, and he himself, bravely resisting, till he was sore hurt in the head, was taken. After he was taken, his pride was such as he asked who it was that durst arow that night's work? But when he heard it was the garrison, he was then more quiet. But so powerful and awful was this Sir Robert Car and his favourites, as there was not a gentleman in all the East March that durst offend them. Presently after he was taken, I had most of the gentlemen of the March come to me, and told me that now I had the ball at my foot, and might bring Sir Robert Car to what condition I pleased, for that this man's life was so near and dear unto him, as I should have all that my heart could desire for the good and quiet of the country and myself, if upon any condition I would give him his life I heard them and their reasons, notwithstanding, I called a jury the next morning, and he was found guilty of March treason Then they feared that I would cause him to be executed that afternoon, which made them come flocking to me, humbly intreating me that I would spare his life till the next day and if Sir Robert Car came not himself to me, and made me not such proffers as I could not but accept, that then I should do with him what I pleased And further, they told me plainly that if I should execute him before I had heard from Sir Robert Car, they must be forced to quit their houses and fly the country, for his fury would be such against me and the March I commanded, as he would use all his power and strength to the utter destruction of the East March They were so earnest with me that I gave them my word he should not die that day There was post upon post sent to Sir Robert Car, and some of them rode to him themselves to advertise him in what danger Geordie Bourne was how he was condemned, and should have been executed that afternoon, but by their humble suit I gave them my word that he should not die that day, and therefore besought him that he would send to me with all the speed he could, to let me know that he would be the next day with me, to offer me good conditions for the safety of his life. When all things were quiet, and the watch set at night, after supper, about ten of the clock, I took one of my men's liveries, and put it about me, and took two other of my servants with me in their liveries, and we three, as the Warden's men, came to the Provost Marshal's, where Bourne was, and were let into his chamber sat down by him, and told him that we were desirous to see him, because we heard he was stout and valiant, and true to his friend, and that we were sorry our master could not be moved to save his life voluntarily of himself said, that he had lived long enough to do so many villanies as he had done, and withal told us that he had lain with above forty men's wives, what in England, what in Scotland, and that he had killed seven Englishmen with his own hands, cruelly murdering them that he had spent his whole time in whoring, drinking, stealing, and taking deep revenge for slight offences. He seemed to be very penitent, and much desired a minister for the comfort of his soul. We promised him to let our master know his desire, who, we knew, would presently grant it. We took our leaves of him, and presently I took order that Mr Selby, a very worthy honest preacher, should go to him, and not stir from him till his execution the next morning for after I had heard his own confession, I was resolved no conditions should save his life, and so took order that at the gates opening the next morning he should be carried to execution, which accordingly was performed.

The Sir Robert Car of Carey's story was Sir Robert Ker of Cessford, warden-depute of the Middle Marches in 1594 who played a conspicuous part in the stirring history of the time. He was himself put in ward as a raider by Lord Hunsdon had to dwith more slaughters than one was more than once denounced a rebel and had to fiee his country but in 1600 was created Lord Roxburghe, and in 1616 Earl of Roxburghe.

The Dying of Queen Elizabeth.

I took my journey about the end of the year 1602 When I came to court, I found the Queen ill disposed, and she kept her inner lodging, yet she, hearing of my arrival, sent for me. I found her in one of her withdrawing chambers, sitting low upon her cushions. She called me to her, I kissed her hand, and told her it was my chiefest happiness to see her in safety, and in health, which I wished might long continue. She took me by the hand, and wrung it hard, and said, 'No, Robin, I am not well,' and then discoursed with me of her indisposition, and that her heart had been sad and heavy for ten or twelve days, and inher discourse, she fetched not so few as forty or fifty great sighs. I was grieved at the first to see her in this plight, for in all my lifetime before, I never knew her fetch a sigh, but when the Queen of Scots was beheaded. Then, upon my knowledge, she shed many tears and sighs, manifesting her innocence, that she never gave consent to the death of that Queen.

I used the best words I could, to persuade her from this melancholy humour, but I found by her it was too deep rooted in her heart, and hardly to be removed. This was upon a Saturday night, and she gave command, that the great closet should be prepared for her to go to chapel the next morning The next day, all things being in a readiness, we long expected her coming After eleven o'clock, one of the grooms came out, and bade make ready for the private closet, she would not go to the great There we stayed long for her coming, but at the last she had cushions laid for her in the privy chamber hard by the closet door, and there she heard service. From that day forwards, she grew worse and worse. She remained upon her cushions four days and nights at the least. All about her could not persuade her, either to take any sustenance, or go to bed. The Queen grew worse and worse, because she would be so, none about her being able to persuade her to go to bed. My Lord Admiral was sent for, (who, by reason of my sister's death, that was his wife, had absented himself some fortnight from court,) what by fair means, what by force, he got her to bed. There was no hope of her recovery, because she refused all remedies

On Wednesday, the 23d of March, she grew speech

That afternoon, by signs, she called for her council, and by putting her hand to her head, when the king of Scots was named to succeed her, they all knew he was the man she desired should reign after her About six at night she made signs for Archbishop Whitgift and her chaplains to come to her, at which time I went in with them, and sat upon my knees full of tears to see that heavy sight Her Majesty lay upon her back, with one hand in the bed, and the other without. The bishop kneeled down by her, and examined her first of her faith, and she so punctually answered all his several questions, by lifting up her eyes, and holding up her hand, as it was a comfort to all the beholders. Then the good man told her plainly what she was, and what she was to come to, and though she had been long a great Queen here upon earth, yet shortly she was to yield an account of her stewardship to the King of After this he began to pray, and all that were by After he had continued long in prayer, till the old man's knees were weary, he blessed her, and The Queen made a sign meant to rise and leave her with her hand. My sister Scroop knowing her meaning, told the bishop the Queen desired he would pray still. He did so for a long half hour after, and then thought to leave her The second time she made sign to have him continue in prayer. He did so for half an hour more, with earnest cries to God for her soul's health, which he uttered with that fervency of spirit, as the Queen, to all our sight, much rejoiced thereat, and gave testimony to us all of her Christian and comfortable end By this time it grew late, and every one departed, all but her women that attended her

This that I heard with my ears, and did see with my eyes, I thought it my duty to set down, and to affirm it for a truth, upon the faith of a Christian, because I know there have been many false lies reported of the end and death of that good lady

Francis Meres (1565-1647) is often quoted as an authority on the literary history of this period in virtue of his Palladis Tanna He was sprung of good old Lincolnshire stock, studied at Cambridge, became M.A. of both universities, and from 1602 was rector of Wing, in Rutland He published one or two religious works, but is only remembered for the Palladis Tamia, which is not so much a book, or, as he calls it, 'a comparative discourse of our English Poets with the Greek, Latin, and Italian poets,' as a meagre catalogue raisonné, in which English authors from Chaucer's day to his own time are in a sentence or short paragraph characterised and linked with some Greek, classical Latin, or modern Latin poet to whom Meres thought they presented an analogy Some of the remarks are sensible, some really pregnant, many jejune and pointless to a degree, occasionally there is only a mere scrap of biographical fact. Sir Philip Sidney is 'our rarest poet,' and the Arcadia 'his immortal poem' Than Spenser's Faerie Queene 'he knows not what more excellent or exquisite poem may be written' The next may be quoted in full

As the soul of Euphorbus was thought to live in Pythagoras, so the sweet witty soul of Ovid lives in mellifluous and honey tongued Shakespeare Witness h.s I enus und Adonis, his Lucrice, his sugared sonnets among his private friends, etc.

As Plantu, and Seneca are accounted the best forcornedy and tragedy among the Latins, so Shakespeare among the English is the most excellent in both kinds of the stage. For comedy, witness his Gentlemen of Verona his Errors, his Love's Labour's Lost, his Love's Labour's Won [All's Well that Ends Well], his Midsurimer Nigh's Driam, and his Merchint of Venue. For tragedy his Richard II, Richard III, Many IV, King John, Trus Androneus, and his Romeo and Juliet. As Epius Stolo [so in Meres really the grammarian Achies Stilo, who flourished about 100 it...] said that the muses would speak with Plantus's tongue if they would speak Latin, so I say that the muses would speak with Shakespeare's fine filed phrase
if they were to speak English

But the paragraph immediately preceding says that Warner, in Albion's England, 'hath most admirably penned the history of his own country,' that Meres had heard the best wits of both universities style him the English Homer, and Meres adds that (this is Meres's own judgment), 'as Euripides is the most sententious among the Greek poets, so is Warner among our English poets'! The conclusion of the literary survey is

As the poet Lycophron was shot to death by a certain rival of his, so Christopher Marlow was stabbed to death by a baudy serving man, a rival of his in his lewd love.

Then follows a still more meagre list of English punters and English musicians, named as before with their classical prototypes. Nicholas Hilliard, Isaac Oliver, and John de Creetes in England, 'very funous for their painting,' correspond to Apelles, Zeuvis, and Parrhasius in Greece!

Palladis Tamia, Wit's Treasury, was published in 1598, being the second volume of a series of which the first (1597) was called Politeuphina, Wit's Commonwealth (apophtheyms, &c) Two other little volumes completed the series, otherwise unimportant. Tamia is a Greek word for 'treasury'

Gervise Markham (1568?-1637) has been reputed 'the first English hackney writer,' and was believed to have imported the first Arab horse into I ngland. His industry as author, translator, and compiler was enormous, and his work was, some of it, distinctly meritorious, is well as advantageous to the kingdom. He served in the Low Country wars and in Ireland before, about 1593, he settled down to miscellineous writing. In 1595 he published his poem (174 eight line stanzis) on the battle of the Revenze, some of its phrises reappear in Tennyson's (more condensed) story He versified the Song of Solomon, and wrote poems describing the feelings of St John and Mary Magdalene at the loss of their Lord, and he wrote a lengthy conunuation of Sir Philip Sidney's Ircadia He also translated from the Italian, and had a share in two drumas But his principal work was in prosemuch of it very pedestrum prose, though elsewhere quant and not unhout ments of its own. The Descourse of Horsemansnippe (1593) was the first of eight or nine separate publications (though constantly repeating themselves, according to his fashion) on horses and farriery The Young Sportsman's Instructor is one of many books on archery, fowling, angling, cock fighting, and hawking and Country Contentments (1611) passed bunting through a dozen editions, its second part, The English Huswife, being also separately reissued The English Husbandman (3 parts, 1613-15) and Cheap and Good Husbandry (1611, 13th ed. 1676) are two out of many books on farming and improving land. Then there was also a series of books on soldiering and military exercises with this record, he left works which yet remain in Country Contentments thus discourses 'Of Angling, the Vertue, Use and Antiquity'

Since Pleasure is a Rapture, or power in this last Age stoln into the hearts of men, and there lodged up with such careful guard and attendance, that nothing is more Supreum, or ruleth with greater strength in their affections, and since all are now become the Sons of Pleasure, and every good is measured by the delight it produceth what work unto men can be more thankful then a discourse of that pleasure which is most comely, most honest, and giveth the most liberty to Divine Meditation? and that without all question is the Art of Angling, which having ever been most hurtlesly necessary, hath been the sport or Recreation of Gods Saints, of most holy lathers, and of many Worth, and Reverend Divines, both dead and at this time breathing

For the use thereof (in its own true and unabused nature) carrieth in it neither covetousness, deceit, nor anger, the three main spirits which ever (in some ill measure) rule in all other pastimes, neither are alone predominant without the attendance of their several hand maids, as Theft, Blasphemy, or Bloodshed, for in Dice play, Cards, Bowls, or any other sport, where money is the goal to which mens minds are directed, what can mans avaried there be accounted other then a familiar Robbery, each seeking by deceit to couzen and spoyl others of the blisse of meanes which God hath bestowed to support them and their families?

But in this Art of Angling there is no such evil, no such sinful violence, for the greatest thing it coveteth is for much labour a little I ish, hardly so much as will sufnce Nature in a reasonable stomach for the Angler must intice, not command his reward, and that which is worthy millions to his contentment, another may buy for a great in the Market. His deceit worketh not upon men, but upon those Creatures whom it is lawful to beguile for our honest Recreations or needful use, and for all rage and fury it must be so great a stranger to this civil pastime, that if it come but within view or speculation thereof, it is no more to be esteemed a picasure For every proper good thereof in the very instant faileth, shewing unto all men that will undergo any delight therein, that it was first invented, taught, and shall for ever be maintained by Patience only And yet I may not say, only Patience, for her other three Sisters have lil cuise a commanding in this exercise, for Justice directeth and appointeth out those places where men may with liberty use their sport, and neither do injury to their Neighbours, nor incur the censure of in Temperance layeth down the measure of the action, and moderateth desire in such good proportion that no Excess is found in the over flow of their affections. Lastly, Fortitude enableth the Mind to undergo the travail and exchange of Weathers with a healthful ease, and not to despair with a little expense of time, but to persevere with a constant imagination in the end to obtain pleasure and satisfaction

Now for the Antiquity thereof (for all pleasures, like Gentry, are held to be most excellent, which is most ancient) it is by some Writers said to be found out by Deucation and Pyrrha his Wife after the general Flood Others write, It was the invention of Saturn, after the Peace concluded betwixt him and his Brother Titan And others, That it came from Belus the Son of Nimrod who first invented all holy and vertuous Recreations. And all these though they savour of fiction, yet they differ not from truth, for it is most certain, that both Deucalior, Saturn, and Belus are taken for figures of Noah and his family, and the invention of the Art of Angling is truly said to come from the sons of Seth, of which Noah was most principal. Thus you see it is good, as having no coherence with evil worthy of use, in as much as it is mixt with a delightful profit and most antient, as being the Recreation of the first Patriarchs, Wherefore now I will proceed to the Art it self, and the means to attain it.

Now for your Lines, you shall understand that they are to be made of the strongest, longest, and best grown Horse haire that can be got, not that which groweth on his Main, nor upon the upper part or setting on of his tayl, but that which groweth from the middle and inmost part of his dock, and so extendeth it self down to the ground, being the biggest and strongest hairs about the Horse neither are these hairs to be gathered from poor, lean and diseased Jades of little price or value, but from the fattest, soundest, and proudest Horse you can find, for the best Horse hath ever the best hair, neither would your hairs be gathered from Nags, Mares, or Geldings, but from ston'd Horses only, of which the black hair is the worst, the white or gray best, and other colours indifferent. Those Lines which you make for small fish, as Gudgeon, Whiting or Menew, would be composed of three hairs those which you make for Pearch or Trout would be of five hairs, and those for the Chub or Barbel would be of seven. To those of three hairs, you shall add one thread of silk, To those of five, two threads of silk, and to those of seven, three threads of silk. You shall twist your hairs neither too hard nor too slack, but even so as they may twind and couch close one within another, and no more, without either snarling or gaping one from another, the end you shall fasten together with a fishers knot, which is your ordinary fast knots, foulded four times about, both under and above, for this will not loose in the water, but being drawn close together, will continue, when all other knots will fail, for a hair being smooth and stiff, will yield and go back, if it be not artificially drawn together Your ordinary line would be between three and four fadom in length, yet for as much as there are diversities in the length of rods, in the depth of waters, and in the places of standing to angle in, it shall be good to have lines of divers lengths, and to take those which shall be littest for your purpose.

See the articles by Sir Clements Markham in the Dictionary of Vational Biography, Arber's reprint (1871) of the Revenge poem, and Grosart's edition (1871) of the poems on St John and Mary Magdalene's lamentations. Thomas Stoler (1571–1604), a Londoner, studied at Christ Church, became notable as a poet, and wrote a long poem in seven line decasyllabic stanzas on the Life and Death of Thomas Wolsey, Cardinall (1599), Malone thought that this work might, as well as Cavendish's Life, have helped to mould the conception and wording of the drama of Henry VIII But even without that it is inevitable that the drama, which obviously follows Cavendish's words at times, should also present reflections in some measure parallel to such as these from Storer

Perchance the tenor of thy mourning verse
May leade some pilgrim to my toomblesse grave,
Where neither marble monument nor hearse
The passenger's attentive view may crave,
Which honors now the meanest persons have,
But well is me where e'er my ashes lie,
If one teare drop from some religious eie

Seek'st thou for fame? hee's best that least is knowne.
Or prince's favours? that's no common grant.
Serv'st thou for wealth? a courtier knows his owne
Or for degree? preferment waxeth scant Want'st thou to live? no hell to courtiers want.
O rather yet embrace thy private lot
With honest fame and riches purely got.

Looke how the God of Wisedom marbled stands
Bestowing laurel wreaths of dignitie
In Delphos Isle, at whose unpartiall hands
Hang antique scrolles of gentle herauldrie,
And at his fecte ensignes and trophies lie
Such was my state, whom every man did follow
As living statue of the great Apollo

If once we fall, we fall Colossus like,
We fall at once like pillars of the sunne,
They that betweene our stride their sailes did strike,
Making us sea markes where their shippe did runne,
Even they that had by us their treasure wonne,
Rise as we may by moderate degrees,
If once we stoope, they'll bring us on our knees

Richard Bainfield (1574-1627) studied at Oxford, and while he was yet a young man settled on his estate in Staffordshire. His works are three small volumes of poetry, The Affectionate Shep herd (1594), Cynthia, with Certain Sonnets, and the Legend of Cassandra (1595), and a collection, The Encomion of Lady Pecunia, &c. (1598) large measure of the melodiousness and sonority so strangely common to the Elizabethans, but he is best known from the two pieces believed to be his, printed as by Shakespeare, in the miscellany called The Passionate Pilgrim (see page 257) These pieces-both from his last volume-are the ode, 'As it fell upon a day,' and the sonnet, 'If Musique and sweet Poetrie agree,' and Professor Saintsbury still hints that 'As it fell' is much above Barnfield's usual level and really very like Grosart (1876) and Arber (1882) in Shakespeare their editions of Barnfield denounce Collier's view that it is really two odes and is by Shakespeare

As it fell upon a day. In the merne month of May. Sitting in a plea ant shade. Which a grove of myrtles made, Beastes did leape, and birds did sing. Trees did grow, and plants did spring, Everything did banish mone, Sa e the Nightin, ale alone She, poor bird, as all forlorne, Lean'd her breast up till a thorne. And there sung the doleful'st ditty, That to heare it was great pitty 'Fie, fie, fie,' now would she cry, 'Teru, teru,' by and by, That, to hear her so complaine, Scarce I could from teares refraine. For her griefes so lively showne Made me thinke upon mine owne Ah! (thought I) thou mourn st in vaine, None takes pitty on thy paine Senselesse trees, they cannot heare thee Ruthlesse beares, they will not cheer thee. King Pandion, hee is dead, All thy friends are lapt in lead. All thy fellow birds doc singe, Carclesse of thy sorrowing !

Whilst as fickle Fortune smiled, Thou and I were both beguiled. Everie one that flatters thee Is no friend in miserie. Words are easi., like the winde. Faithfull friends are hard to finde Evene man will bee thy friend Whilst thou hast wherewith to spend, But if store of crownes be scant, No man will supply thy want. If that one be prodigall, Bountifull they will him call, And with such like flattering, 'Pitty but hee were a king' If he be addict to vice. Quickly him they will intice, If to women hee be bent, They have at commaundement. But if fortune once doe frowne. Then farewell his great renowne? They that fawn'd on him before Use his company no more Hee that is thy friend indeed, Hee will helpe thee in thy neede, If thou sorrowe, her will weepe, If thou wake, hee cannot sleepe Thus of everie gnese in heart He vith thee doth beare a part These are certaine signes to knowle Faithfull friend from flatt'ring foe.

Sonnet to R. L.

If Musique and sweet Poetrie agrice As they must needs (the Sister and the Brother), Then must the love be great twixt thee and mee, Because thou lov'st the one and I the other Dowland to thee is deare, whose heavenly touch Upon the lute do h ravish humaine sense. Spenser to mee, whose deepe conceit is such as paising all conceit, needs no defence.

Thou lov'st to heare the sweete melodious sound That Pho.bus lute, the Queene of Musique, makes And I in deepe delight am chiefly drownd Whenas himselfe to singing he betakes.

One god is god of both, as poets faigne,
One knight loves both, and both in thee remaine.

It should be noted that the reference in the ode to Pandion father of Philomela and Procne, brings in a very unmistakable echo of Spenser For in the Shefherd's Calendar Cuddy lamented

And great Augustus long agoe is dead, And all the worthies liggen wrapt in lead That matter made for poets on to play

Thomas Campion (c. 1575-1620), physician, musician, and poet, was born at Witham, in Essex, studied at Cambridge and abroad, left Gray's Inn and the law for medicine, and practised as MD in London for the rest of his life, but found time to compose much good music and to write four masques and a large number of admirable lyrics. His first publication was a book of Latin epigrams (1595, enlarged, 1619), another was Observations on the Art of Poesie (1602), in which he, a born lyrist, advocated unrhymed verse, and a third was a small treatise on counterpoint. But it is as a writer of masques, and especially of lyrics, that he is best known. Some of his best songs are in his masques, others in a series of song-books or Bookes of Ayres, the first edited by Rosseter in 1601, the third about 1617 The greater number of the best were actually written to music, usually his own, and are admirably singable. He was the contemporary of both Sidney and of Ben Jonson, and, like Jonson, is a connecting-link between Elizabethans and Jacobeans Noteworthy is it. as Mr Gosse has pointed out, that he sang before Donne had exercised his masterful and disturbing influence on English poetry His note is all his own, but in its peculiar combination of gracefulness and unstudied art has been compared with Fletcher's, Carew's, and Herrick's evidently knew Campion's verse, and showed this in his own working out of suggestions from Campion's 'Cherry Ripe'

Now Winter Nights Enlarge.

Now winter nights enlarge
The number of their houres,
And clouds their stormes discharge
Upon the ayrie towies.
Let now the chimneys blaze
And cups o'erflow with wine,
Let well tun'd words amaze
With harmonic divine!
Now yellow waxen lights
Shall vaite on hunny love,
While youthfull Revels, Masks, and Courtly sights, Sleepe's leaden spels remove

This time doth well dispence
With lovers' long discourse,
Much speech hath some defence,
Though beauty no remorse
All doe not all thing, well,
Some measures comely tread,

Some knotted Ridles tell,
Some Poems smoothly read.
The Summer hath his joyes,
And Winter his delights,
Though Love and all his pleasures are but toyes,
They shorten tedious nights.

Cherry Ripe.

There is a Garden in her face,
Where Roses and white Lillies grow,
A heav'nly paradice is that place,
Wherein all pleasant fruits doe flow
There Cherries grow which none may buy
Till Cherry ripe themselves do cry

Those Cherries fayrely doe enclose
Of Orient Pearle a double row,
Which when her lovely laughter showes,
They look like Rose buds fill d with snow
Yet them nor Peere nor Prince can buy
Till Cherry ripe themselves doe cry

Her Eyes like Angels watch them still,
IIer Browes like bended bowes doe stand
Threatning with piercing frownes to kill
All that attempt, with eye or hand,
Those sacred Cherries to come nigh,
Till Cherry ripe themselves do cry

To Lesbia.

My sweetest Lesbia, let us live and love,
And though the sager sort our deedes reprove,
Let us not way them heaven's great lampes doe dive Into their west, and strait again revive
But soone as once set is our little light,
Then must we sleepe one ever during night.

If all would lead their lives in love like mee,
Then bloudie swords and armour should not be,
No drum nor trumpet peaceful sleepes should move,
Unles alarme came from the campe of love
But fooles do live, and wast their little light,
And seeke with paine their ever-during night.

When timely death my life and fortune ends, Let not my hearse be vext with mourning friends, But let all lovers, rich in triumph, come And with sweet pastimes grace my happie tombe And, Lesbia, close up thou my little light, And crown with love my ever-during night.

This poem, like Jonson's 'Come, my Celia' (page 409), is suggested by, rather than imitated from, the Vivamus, mea Lesbia, et Amemus of Catullus Campion wrote songs of mourning on the death of Prince Henry in 1612, like so many of his contemporaries, but wis happier in his Divine and Moral Songs

The first verse of 'When the god of merric love' presents a very potable parallel to Burns's autobiographical 'Rantin' Rovin' Robin'

As yet in his cradle lay,
Thus his wither'd nurse did say
'Thou a wanton boy wilt prove
To deceive the powers above,

For by thy continual smiling I see thy power of beguling'

In Burns's song it is the 'gossip' who 'keeks in the lufe' of the new born Robin and foretells his character, especially his devotion to women and his fascination over them.

The best of his masques, performed at White-hall on Twelfth Night 1606-7 in honour of the marriage of Sir James Hay, is usually called 'The Lord Hayes Masque.' 'The Lord's Masque' celebrated in 1613 the more notable marriage of the Elector Palatine and the Princess Elizabeth A third (1613) was performed before the queen at Caversham House on a progress to Bath, the fourth had for its occasion the ill omened wedding of Somerset and his paramour, the divorced and infamous Countess of Essex (also 1613)

Renewed interest in Campion who had long been forgotten, is due wholly to Mr A. H. Bullen's edition of him in 1889. A good selection was published by Mr Ernest Rhys in 1896—a smaller selection of fifty of his songs appeared in the same year

Ben Jonson.

Ben Jonson, the most conspicuous and accomplished dramatist after Shakespeare, was rarely called Benjamin in his own days, and never has been since. Thomas Heywood said in 1635

And Jonson, though his learned pen Was dipt in Castaly, is still but Ben

And of the sixty Johnsons in the Dictionary of National Biography he is, with the doubtful exception of a sixteenth century Latin poet, the only one who preferred the contracted form of the family name. He was, according to his own account, the grandson of a gentleman from Carlisle—originally, he believed, from Annandalc -whose son (Ben's father) lost his estate and became a minister in Westminster Ben, whose early years were full of hardship and vicissitude, was born some nine years after Shakespeare -in 1572-73. His father died a month before Ben's birth, and his mother marrying again, Ben was brought from Westminster School and put to the bricklayer's craft of his stepfather liking the trade, he enlisted as a soldier and served in the Low Countries He challenged and killed one of the enemy in single combat, in the view of both armies, and ever after reverted with pride to his conduct as a soldier says he entered St John's College, Cambridge, but there is no evidence that either before or after his military escapade he was enrolled of the university-for, about the age of twenty, he is found married, and an actor in London. He made his début at a low theatre near Clerkenwell, and, as his opponents afterwards reminded him, failed completely as an actor His wife was 'virtuous, but a shrew,' and they lived apart for a number of years None of the children survived their father As early 15 1595 he was engaged writing for the stage, either by himself or conjointly with others He quarrelled with another performer, killed his antagonist in some kind of fight or duel, and being imprisoned, pled guilty, and was released through benefit of clergy. At this time he became a Roman Catholic, and did not return to the Anglican communion for twelve years. On regaining his liberty, he produced, in 1596, his Every Van in his Humour, which, revised, was brought out at the Globe Theatre in 1598. Shakespeare, who was one of the performers, had produced some of his finest comedies by this time, but Jonson wis no imitator of his great rival Ionson opened a new line in the drama he felt his strength, and the public cheered him on with its Queen plaudits Llizabeth patron ised the new poet, and ever afterwirds he was 'a m in of mark and likelihood' In 1599 appeared I very Man out of his Humo ir, less notable than predecessor Conthua's Revels and the Postaster followed, and the fierce rivalry and contention which clouded Jonson's after-life fairly begun. He had attacked Marston and Dekker, two of his brotherdramatists, in these plays (see page 423) Dekker replied with spirit in his Satiromastix, and Ben was silent for two years, 'living upon one Townsend, and scorning the world, as is recorded in the diary of a contemporary. In 1603 he tried 'if tragedy had a more kind aspect,' and produced his classical drama Sejanus Shortly after the accession of king James, a comedy called East-vard Hie was written conjointly by Jonson, Chap man, and Marston Some passages in this piece reflected on the Scottish nation, and the matter was represented to the king by one of his courtiers -Sir James Murry -in so strong a light that the authors were thrown into prison, and threatened with the loss of their ears and noses. They were not tried, and when Ben was set at liberty he gie an entertainment to his friends-Selden and Camden being of the number. His mother was I present on this joyous occasion, and was reported to have produced a paper of poison which she intended to give her son in his liquor, rather than that he should submit to personal mutilation and disgrace, and another dose which she meant afterwards to have taken herself. Jonson's own conduct in this affair was spirited. He had no considerable share in the composition of the piece, and was, besides, in such favour that he would not have been molested, 'but this did not satisfy him,' savs Gifford. 'and he, there fore, with a high sense of honour. voluntarily accompanied his two friends to prison, determined to share their fate' Wι cannot now be certain what precisely was the deadly satire that moved the patriotic indignation of James, it was doubtless soft ened before pub lication, but in some copies of Eastward Hoe (1605) there 15 2 passage in which the Scots are said to be 'dispersed over the face of the whole earth,' and the dramatist sarcastically adds 'But as for them, there are no greater friends to Englishmen and England, when they are out on't, in the world, than they are, and, for my part, I would a hundred thousand of them were there [1 e. had been transported to Virginial, for we are all one countrymen now, you know, and we should find ten times more comfort of them there than we do here' The offended nationality of James must have been laid to rest by subse quent adulation in court-masques, in which Jonson eulogised the conceited monarch as destined to raise the glory of England higher than Elizabeth! Jonson's three great comedies, Volpone, or the Fox, Epicane, or the Silent Woman, and The Ilchemist, were his next serious labours, his second classical tragedy, Catiline, appeared in His fame had now reached its zenith, but he produced several other comedies and a vast number of masques, learned pageants, and court entertainments ere his star began visibly to decline. In 1618 he made a journey on foot to Scotland, where he had many friends. He was well received by the Scottish gentry, wrote a poem on Edinburgh (now lost), and meditated a pastoral or fisher play with its scene laid on Loch Lomond—which he did not visit but had described to him The last of his visits was made to Drummond of Hawthornden, with whom he lived three weeks, and Drummond kept notes of his conversation, which were long after communicated to the world. Drummond entered in his journal the following very candid friend's character of Ben himself

'He is a great lover and praiser of himself, a contemner and scorner of others, given rather to lose a friend than a jest, jealous of every word and action of those about him, especially after drink, which is one of the elements in which he liveth, a dissembler of ill parts which reign in him, a bragger of some good that he wanteth, thinketh nothing well but what either he himself or some of his friends and countrymen hath said or done, he is passionately kind and angry, careless either to gain or keep, vindictive, but if well answered, at himself, for any religion, as being versed in both, interpreteth best sayings and deeds often to the worst, oppressed with fantasy, which hath ever mastered his reason, a general disease in many poets'

This character is far from flattering, and though doubtless unconsciously surcharged (owing to the recluse habits and staid demeanour of Drummond), is probably substantially correct. Inured to hardships and to a free, boisterous life in his early days, Jonson contracted a marked roughness of manner and habits of intemperance Priding himself immoderately on his classical acquirements, he was apt to slight and condemn his less learned associates, he was, and shows himself in his works, somewhat provokingly self-complacent, while the conflict between his limited means and his love of social pleasures rendered him severe and saturnine in temper Whatever he did was done with labour, and hence was highly appraised His contemporaries seemed fond by himself of mortifying his pride, and he was often at war with actors and authors With the celebrated architect, Inigo Jones, who was joined with him in the management of the court masques, Jonson waged a long and bitter feud. The old story that he was so jealous of Shakespeare as to be 'maligmant' towards him it is impossible to reconcile with his own words, but it had been constantly reaffirmed, with the support of proofs from words and allusions in the plays perverted to that sense, until Gifford annihilated the contention by an examination of the so-called 'proofs' When his better nature prevailed, Jonson was capable of a generous warmth of friendship, and of just discrimination of génius and character

By James I Jonson was appointed court-poet or laureate, and a little later he seems to have refused the honour of knighthood His literary reputation, his love of conviviality, and his colloquial powers now made his society much courted, and he became the centre of a band of wits Walter Raleigh had founded a club, known to all posterity as the Mermaid Club, at which Jonson, Shakespeare, Beaumont and Fletcher, and other poets had exercised themselves with 'wit-combats' more sparkling than their wine. Fuller says 'Many were the wit-combats betwixt Shakespeare and Ben Jonson, which two I behold like a Spanish great galleon and an English man ofwar Master Jonson, like the former, was built far higher in learning, solid, but slow in his Shakespeare, with the English performances man-of-war, lesser in bulk, but lighter in sailing, could turn with all tides, tack about and take advantage of all winds, by the quickness of his wit and invention' Another of their haunts was the Falcon Tavern, near the theatre in Bankside, Southwark. This society was now disbanded, but in a circle of younger contemporaries Jonson was a kind of venerated chief, a literary dictator, a Great Cham of the world of wits. The younger poets were mostly his 'sons,' or were 'sealed of the tribe of Ben'-Carew, Shackerley Marmion, Brome, Herrick, Cleveland, Suckling, and many others. The later days of Jonson were dark and Attacks of palsy confined him to his house, and his necessities compelled him to write for the stage when his pen had lost its vigour and his work lacked the charm of novelty In 1629 he produced his comedy the New Inn, which was damned by the audience. The king sent him a present of £100, and raised his laureate pension to the same sum per annum, adding a yearly tierce of Canary Next year, however, we find Jonson, in an Epistle Mendicant, soliciting assistance from the Lord-Treasurer He continued writing to the last Dryden styled the later works of Jonson his dolages, some are certainly unworthy of him, but the Sad Shepherd, which he left unfinished, exhibits the poetical spontaneity of a youthful creation. He died on the 6th of August 1637, and was buried in the Poets' Corner in Westminster Abbey The political confusions that followed prevented the erection of a sumptuous monument, but on the slab which covers his remains a visitor subsequently caused to be engraved the memorable epitaph, 'O RARL BEN IONSON!'

Jonson founded a style of regular English comedy, massive, of permanent interest, yet not very attractive in its materials. His works consist of about fifty dramatic pieces, but by far the greater part are masques and interludes. His principal comedies are four in number—Every Man in his Humour, Volpone, the Silent Woman, and the Alchemist. After them come Bartholomew Fair, The Devil is an Ass, and The Staple of News. Jonson came forward with a conscious and deliberate intention—fully indicated in the

Prologue to Every Man it has Hunoir-to revolutionise English dramatic art. His work towards the effectual carrying out of his scheme is conscious, iggressive, unmistakable. Shakespeare, a more conspicuously original genius, he did not, could not, sympathetically enter into other men's labours. He had formed a definite theory of his irt, and to that he resolutely adhered, deleting is soon as might be the contributions by others to Sejanus and any other of his plays disappro es the rhetoric of the Senecan plays, he disapproves even more the crudeness of the popular tragedy and the popular contedy. Strong -too strong-delineation of character is the most stril ing feature in Jonson's comedies, many of which might be called 'psychological dramas' The voluptuous Volpone is drawn with great breadth and freedom, and generally his portraits of eccentric characters-men in whom some pecularity or humour, as he called it, has grown to in egregious excess-are impressive as well as ludicrous. His scenes and characters show the labour of the artist, of the artist with rich resources, in acute and vigorous intellect, great knowledge of life, down to its lowest haunts, wit, a wealth of lofty declamation, and a power of dramatising his knowledge and observation with singular skill and effect. He was one of the most learned men of his time Sejanus and Catiline show conscientious and scholarly research, as well as dramatic power and skilful characterisation, but his pedantry is often misplaced and even ridiculous He frequently denounces the devices of some contemporaries as bad taste and base pandering to love of popularity Cynthia's Revels, it once allegorical and satirical, amorphous and tedious, is an appeal against prevailing bad taste to the principles of taste and criticism. His comic theatre is a gallery of strange, clever, original portraits, powerfully drawn and skilfully disposed, but many of them repulsive in expression or so exaggerated as to look like caricatures or libels on humanity We have little deep passion or winning tenderness to link the beings of his drama with those we love or admire, or to make us sympathise with them as actual men and women Alike in his satire and his comedy Ben Jonson deals too often with figures who are neither flesh and blood nor men of like passions with ourselves, but with personified ibstrictions, single ideas half incarnated, visualised conceptions illustriting bu one engagerited eccentricity, who are accordingly not even types or conventional chiracters. There is the mouthing briggidocio who does nothing but mouth, the silly toady who is niught clse in the world, the doting husband who is for ever doting on a senseless, exacting wile, and dotes to an extent that is wholly merchble Then again and again we have the court or who is a more object hanger on, the fop who is little but the framework for fine clothes, and he took her top who can only imitate the other fops. It should be added, however, that braggadocios, dotards, fops, and toadies can all talk-talk copiously, cloquently, learnedly, forcibly, and wittily, though in the end they become tiresome, masmuch as there is too often next to no intelligible plot. Amidst the flood of clever talk, the play does not seem to advance, and one is irritated to find in a new play the old characters repeating themselves under other names Bobadill of Every Man reappears with little qualification as Tucca in the Poctaster, and Albius is Deliro reproduced rather to the general confusion. But when the great artist escapes entirely from his elaborate wit and personified humours into the region of fancy —as in the lyrical passages of Cynthia and the whole pastoral of the Sad Shepherd-we are struck with the contrast it exhibits to his ordinary manner He thus presents two natures one hard, rugged, gross, and sarcastic—'a mountain belly and a rocky fice,' as he described his own person, the other airy, fanciful, and graceful, as if its possessor had never combated with the world and its wild passions, but nursed his intellect and fancy in poetical seclusion and contemplation

Every Man in his Humour has a place of its own in dramatic literature, Professor Ward regards it as 'the first important comedy of character produced on the English stage,' in which, with a too slight plot, Jonson gives us a curiously interesting group of personages marked out by their eccentricities, peculiarities, or 'humours.' Every Man out of his Humour, an over-elaborate sequel, works out the theory that every humour is curable by its own excess 'Humour' he thus defines for himself

In every human body
The choler, melancholy, phlegm and blood,
By reason that they flow continually
In some one part and are not continent,
Receive the name of humours. Now thus far
It may by metaphor apply itself
Unto the general disposition
As when some one peculiar quality
Doth so possess a man that it doth draw
All his effects, his spirits, and his powers
In their confluxions all to run one way,
This may be truly said to be a humour

Volpone is a fierce satire against toadies, parasites, and false friends, as also against the magnificent but senseless extravagance of such characters as Sir Epicure Mammon The Alchemist exposes gross imposture encouraged by superstition and credulity Coloridge calls Epicane, or the Silent Woman, 'the most entertaining of Jonson's comedies,' Dryden discussed it at length as the best of English comedics As Professor Ward says, it is rather a farce on the incredible plot that a peace loving misogynist marries, for t very silent woman, an intolerably talkative person (who finally turns out a boy) Bartholomew Fair is a unique picture, full of gusto and rich dramatic humour, of coarse but characteristic contemporary manners—a picture that may well have been known to Bunyan and have given him hints for his Vanity Fair, this, though the most notable thing in the extraordinary panorama of the historic London festival, is a mirth-provoking caricature of a canting Puritan. Some account Every Man in his Humour Jonson's masterpiece, some the Alchemist. The New Inn, though it failed on the stage, contains some of its author's most eloquent writing.

The Fall of Catiline

Petreus The straits and needs of Catiline being such As he must fight with one of the two armies That then had near inclosed him, it pleased Fate To make us the object of his desperate choice, Wherein the danger almost poised the honour And as he rose, the day grew black with him, And Fate descended nearer to the earth, As if she meant to hide the name of things Under her wings, and make the world her quarry At this we roused, lest one small minute's stay Had left it to be inquired what Rome was. And (as we ought) armed in the confidence Of our great cause, in form of battle stood, Whilst Catiline came on, not with the face Of any man, but of a public ruin His countenance was a civil war itself. And all his host had, standing in their looks, The paleness of the death that was to come. Yet cried they out like vultures, and urged on, As if they would precipitate our fates. Nor stayed we longer for them, but himself Struck the first stroke, and with it fled a life, Which cut, it seemed a narrow neck of land Had broke between two mighty seas, and either Flowed into other, for so did the slaughter, And whirled about, as when two violent tides Meet and not yield The Furies stood on hills, Circling the place, and trembling to see men Do more than they, whilst Piety left the field, Grieved for that side, that in so bad a cause They knew not what a crime their valour was. The Sun stood still, and was, behind the cloud The battle made, seen sweating, to drive up His frighted horse, whom still the noise drove backward And now had fierce Enyo, like a flame, goddess of war Consumed all it could reach, and then itself, Had not the fortune of the commonwealth Come, Pallas like, to every Roman thought. Which Catiline seeing, and that now his troops Covered the earth they'd fought on with their trunks. Ambitious of great fame, to crown his ill, Collected all his fury, and ran in-Armed with a glory high as his despair-Into our battle, like a Libyan lion Upon his hunters, scornful of our weapons, Careless of wounds, plucking down lives about him, Till he had circled in himself with Death Then fell he too, t embrace it where it lay And as in that rebellion 'gainst the gods, Minerva holding forth Medusa's head, One of the grant brethren felt himself Grow marble at the killing sight, and now, Almost made stone, began to inquire what flint,

What rock it was that crept through all his limbs, And, ere he could think more, was that he feared So Catiline, at the sight of Rome in us, Became his tomb, yet did his look retain Some of his fierceness, and his hands still moved, As if he laboured yet to grasp the state With those rebellious parts

Cato
A brave bad death '
Had this been honest now, and for his country,
As 'twas against it, who had e'er fall'n greater?

(Catiline, Act v. sc. vi.)

On Love-from the 'New Inn.'
LOVEL and HOST of the New Inn

Lovel There is no life on earth but being in love! There are no studies, no delights, no business, No intercourse, or trade of sense, or soul, But what is love! I was the laziest creature, The most unprofitable sign of nothing, The veriest drone, and slept away my life Beyond the dormouse, till I was in love! And now I can outwake the nightingale, Outwatch an usurer, and outwalk him too, Stalk like a ghost that haunted 'bout a treasure, And all that phant'sied treasure, it is love!

Host But is your name Love-ill, sir, or Love well?

I would know that

Lov I do not know 't myself

Whether it is. But it is love hath been

The hereditary passion of our house,

My gentle host, and, as I guess, my friend,

The truth is, I have loved this lady long, And impotently, with desire enough, But no success for I have still forborne To express it in my person to her Host How then?

Low I have sent her toys, verses, and anagrams, Trials of wit, mere trifles she has commended, But knew not whence they came, nor could she guess.

Host This was a pretty ridding way of woong!

Lov I oft have been too in her company,

And looked upon her a whole day, admired her,

Loved her, and did not tell her so, loved still, [sighed,

Looked still, and loved, and loved, and looked, and

But, as a man neglected, I came off,

And unregarded

Host Could you blame her, sir,
When you were silent, and not said a word?

Lov Oh, but I loved the more, and she might read it Best in my silence, had she been—

Host As melancholic

As you are! Pray you, why would you stand mute, sir?

Lov O thereon hangs a history, mine host
Did you e'er know or hear of the Lord Beaufort,
Who served so bravely in France? I was his page,
And, ere he died, his friend I followed him
First in the wars, and in the times of peace
I waited on his studies, which were right.
He had no Arthurs, nor no Rosicleers,
No Knights of the Sun, nor Amadis de Gauls, Primalions, Pantagruels, public nothings,
Abortives of the fabulous dark cloister,
Sent out to poison courts, and infest manners
But great Achilles', Agamemnon's acts,
Sage Nestor's counsels, and Ulysses' sleights,
Tydides' fortitude, as Homer wrought them

In his immortal phant'sy, for examples Of the licioic virtue Or as Virgil, That master of the Epic poem, limned Prous Eneas, his religious prince, Bearing his aged parent on his shoulders, Rapt from the flames of Troy, with his young son And these he brought to practice and to use He gave me first my breeding, I acknowledge, Then howered his bounties on me, like the Hours, That open handed sit upon the clouds, And press the liberality of Heaven Down to the laps of thankful men! But then The trust committed to me at his death Was above all, and left so strong a tie On all my powers, as Time shall not dissolve, Till it dissolve itself, and bury all ' The care of his brave heir and only son Who, being a virtuous, sweet, young hopeful lord, Hath cast his first affections on this lady And though I know, and may presume her such, As out of humour, will return no love, And therefore might indifferently be made The courting stock for all to practise on, As she doth practise on us all to scorn Yet out of a religion to my charge, And debt professed, I have made a self decree, Ne'er to express my person, though my passion Burn me to cinders. (From Act 1 sc. L)

From 'Every Man in his Humour'—A Fencing Lesson from Bobadill.

(The shabb) but vamplernous Bobadill is visited in his mean lodging by the simpleton Matthew]

Matthew Save you, sir, save you, captain Bobadill Gentle Master Matthew! Is it you, sir?

Please you to sit down

Mat Thank you, good captain, you may see I am somewhat audacious.

Bob Not so, sir I was requested to supper last night by a sort of gallants, where you were wished for, and drunk to, I assure you.

Mat Vouchsafe me, by whom, good captain?

Bob Marry, by young Wellbred and others.—Why, hosters, a stool here for this gentleman.

Mat No haste, sir, 'tis very well

Bob Body o' me '—it was so late ere we parted last night, I can scarce open my cyes yet, I was but new risen, as you came. How passes the day abroad, sir?—you can tell

Mit Faith some half hour to seven. Now, trust me, you have an exceeding fine lodging here, very neat and private!

Rob Ay, sir Sit down, I pray you Master Matthew, in any case, possess no gentleman of our acquaintance with notice of my lodging

Mr. Who! I, sir?-no

Bob Not that I need to care who know it, for the cabin is convenient, but in regard I would not be too popular, and generally visited as some are

Mat True captain, I conceive you.

Beb For, do you see, sir, by the heart of valour in me except it be to some peculiar and choice spirits, to a horn I am extraordinarily engaged as yourself, or so, I could not extend thus far

Ma' O Lord, sir! I resolve so

B.5 I confess I love a cleanly and quiet privacy, above all the tumult and roar of fortune. What new book ha' you there? What 'Go by, Hieronymo''

Mat Ay, did you ever see it acted? Is t not well penned?

Bob Well penned! I would fain see all the poets of these times pen such another play as that was!—they'll prate and swagger, and keep a stir of art and devices, when (as I am a gentleman), read 'em, they are the most shallow, pitiful, barren fellows that live upon the face of the earth again [While MATTHEW reads, BOBADILL makes himself ready]

Mat Indeed, here are a number of fine speeches in this book 'O eyes, no eyes, but fountains fraught with tears!' There's a conceit!—fountains fraught with tears! 'O life, no life, but lively form of death!' another 'O world, no world, but mass of public wrongs!' a third 'Confused and filled with murder and misdeeds!' a fourth. O the Muses! Is't not excellent? Is't not simply the best that ever you heard, captain? Ha! how do you like it?

Bob 'Tis good

Mat 'To thee, the purest object to my sense,

The most refined essence heaven covers, Send I these lines, wherein I do commence The happy state of turtle billing lovers

If they prove rough, unpolished, harsh, and rude, Haste made the waste Thus mildly I conclude.'

Bob Nay, proceed, proceed. Where's this?

Mat This, sir? a toy o' mine own, in my nonage, the infancy of my Muses. But when will you come and see my study? Good faith, I can shew you some very good things I have done of late—That boot becomes your leg passing well, captain, methinks

Bob So, so, it's the fashion gentlemen now use.

Mat Troth, captain, and now you speak o' the fashion, Master Wellbred's elder brother and I are fallen out exceedingly. This other day, I happened to enter into some discourse of a hanger, which, I assure you, both for fashion and workmanship, was most peremptory beautiful and gentleman like, yet he condemned and cried it down for the most pied and ridiculous that ever he saw

Bob Squire Downright, the half brother, was't not? Mat Ay, sir, he

Bob Hang him, rook! he! why, he has no more judgment than a malt horse. By St George, I wonder you'd lose a thought upon such an animal, the most peremptory absurd clown of Christendom, this day, he is holden. I protest to you, as I am a gentleman and a soldier, I ne'er changed words with his like. By his discourse, he should eat nothing but hay he was born for the manger, pannier, or pack saddle! He has not so much as a good phrase in his belly, but all old iron and rusty proverbs '—a good commodity for some smith to make hobbails of

Mat Ay, and he thinks to carry it away with his manhood still, where he comes he brags he will gi' me the bastinado, as I hear

Bob How? he the bastinado? How came he by that word, trow?

Mat Nay, indeed, he said cudgel me, I termed it so for my more grace.

Rob That may be, for I was sure it was none of his word But when? when said he so?

Mat Faith, yesterday, they say, a young gallant, a friend of mine, told me so

Bob By the foot of Pharaoh, an 'twere my case now, I should send him a chartel presently. The bastinado! A most proper and sufficient dependence, warranted by the great Caranza. Come hither, you shall chartel him, I'll shew you a trick or two, you shall kill him with at pleasure, the first stoccata, if you will, by this air

Mat Indeed, you have absolute knowledge i' the mystery, I have heard, sir

Bob Of whom?—of whom ha' you heard it, I beseech you?

Mat Troth, I have heard it spoken of divers, that you have very rare, and un in one breath utter able skill, sir

Bob By Heaven! no, not I, no skill i' the carth, some small rudiments i' the science, as to know my time, distance, or so I have profest it more for noblemen and gentlemen's use than mine own practice, I assure you — Hostess, accommodate us with another bed staff here quickly lend us another bed staff the woman does not understand the words of action—Look you, sir, exalt not your point above this state, at any hand, and let your point amintain your defence, thus (Give it the gentleman, and leave us), so, sir Come on O twinc your body more about, that you may fall to a more sweet, comely, gentleman like guard, so, indifferent hollow your body more, sir, thus, now, stand fast o' your left leg, note your distance, keep your due proportion of time. Oh, you disorder your point most irregularly!

Mat How is the bearing of it now, sir?

Bob Oh, out of measure ill a well experienced hand would pass upon you at pleasure.

Mat How mean you, sir, pass upon me?

Bob Why, thus, sir (make a thrust at me)—[MASTER MATTHEW pushes at BOBADILL], come in upon the answer, control your point, and make a full career at the body, the best practised gallants of the time name it the passado, a most desperate thrust, believe it

Mat Well, come, sir

Bob Why, you do not manage your weapon with any facility or grace to invite me! I have no spirit to play with you, your dearth of judgment renders you tedious

Mat But one venue, sir

Bob Venue' fie, most gross denomination as ever I heard Oh, the 'stoccata,' while you live, sir, note that. Come, put on your cloak, and we'll go to some private place where you are acquainted—some tavern or so—and have a bit I'll send for one of these fencers, and he shall breathe you, by my direction, and then I will teach you your trick, you shall kill him with it at the first, if you please Why, I will learn you by the true judgment of the eye, hand, and foot, to control any enemy's point i' the world Should your adversary con front you with a pistol, 'twere nothing, by this hand, you should, by the same rule, control his bullet, in a line, except it were hul shot, and spread.—What money ha' you about you, Master Matthew?

Mat Faith, I ha' not past a two shillings, or so

Bob 'Tis somewhat with the least but come, we will have a bunch of radish, and salt to taste our wine, and a pipe of tobacco, to close the orifice of the stomach, and then we'll call upon young Wellbred perhaps we shall meet the Corydon his brother there, and put him to the question (From Act 1 se. iv)

*Go by Hieronymo is one of Jonson's many hits at kyd's Samura Tragedy (see page 319). Caranza was a sisteenth-century writer on the duel. During Bobadill's speech Tib enters, goes out, re-enters, and retires again.

Bobadill on Disarmament

Bobadill I will tell you, sir, by the way of private, and under seal, I am a gentleman, and live here obscure, and to myself, but were I known to her Majesty and the Lords (observe me), I would undertake, upon this poor head and life, for the public benefit of the state, not only to spare the entire lives of her subjects in general, but to save the one half, nay, three parts of her yearly charge in holding war, and against what enemy soever. And how would I do it, think you?

Knowell Nay, I know not, nor can I conceive.

Bob Why, thus, sir I would select nineteen more, to myself, throughout the land, gentlemen they should be of good spirit, strong and able constitution, I would choose them by an instinct, a character that I have and I would teach these nineteen the special rules, as your punto, your reverso, your stoccata, your imbroccato, your passado, your montanto, till they could all play very near, or altogether as well as myself. This done, say the enemy were forty thousand strong, we twenty would come into the field the tenth of March, or thereabouts. and we would challenge twenty of the enemy, they could not in their honour refuse us, well, we would kill them challenge twenty more, kill them, twenty more, kill them, twenty more, kill them too, and thus would we kill every man his twenty a day, that's twenty score, twenty score, that's two hundred, two hundred a day, five days a thousand, forty thousand, forty times five, five times forty, two hundred days kills them all up by computation And this will I venture my poor gentle man like carcass to perform, provided there be no treason practised upon us, by fair and discreet manhood, that is, civilly by the sword (From Act 15 sc. v)

Advice to a Reckless Youth

What would I have you do? I'll tell you, kinsman Learn to be wise, and practise how to thrive, That would I have you do, and not to spend Your coin on every bauble that you fancy, Or every foolish brain that humours you I would not have you to invade each place, Nor thrust yourself on all societies, Till men's affections, or your own desert, Should worthily invite you to your rank He that is so respectless in his courses, Oft sells his reputation at cheap market. Nor would I you should melt away yourself In flashing bravery, lest, while you affect To make a blaze of gentry to the world, A little puff of scorn extinguish it, And you be left like an unsavoury snuff, Whose property is only to offend I'd ha' you sober, and contain yourself, Not that your sail be bigger than your boat, But moderate your expenses now (at first) As you may keep the same proportion still. Nor stand so much on your gentility, Which is an airy and mere borrowed thing, From dead men's dust and bones, and none of yours, Except you make or hold it (From Act L se L)

L) The Demogorgon, a primordial deity, is described in Boccaccio's Genealogia Deorum

In 1616 Ben Jonson collected the plays he had then written, adding at the same time a book of epigrams and a number of poems, which he entitled The Forest and The Underwoods. The whole were comprised in one folio volume, which Jonson dignified with the title of his Works, a circumstance which exposed him to the ridicule of some of his contemporaries. He wrote many elegies, epistles, love poems, epigrams, and epitaphs, as a song writer he had few equals. He grafted a classic grace and musical expression on parts of his masques and interludes which could hardly have been expected from his massive and ponderous hand. In some of his songs he equals Carew and Herrick in picturesque images, and in portraying the fascinations of love. A taste for nature is strongly displayed in his fine lines on Penshurst, that ancient seat of the Sidneys. His prose, especially the Discoveries, is distinguished by admirable judgment, critical insight, and force and purity of diction.

To Cella-from The Forest.'

Drink to me only with thine eyes,
And I will pledge with mine,
Or leave a kiss but in the cup,
And I'll not look for wine.
The thirst that from the soul doth rise,
Doth ask a drink divine,
But might I of Jove's nectar sup,
I would not change for thine.

I sent thee late a rosy wreath,
Not so much honouring thee,
As giving it a hope that there
It could not withered be.
But thou thereon didst only breathe,
And sent'st it back to me,
Since when, it grows, and smells, I swear,
Not of itself, but thee.

Richard Cumberland was surprised to find that Jonson's famous song was based on the Greek of Philostratus, and Gifford was surprised at his But the fact is seldom sufficiently remembered, and nobody who does not look up the Greek will believe how close the noble English lync is to the florid prose of the Greek sophist, Philostratus of Lemnos, who lived about 170-250 1,D He is probably best known in England by his Life of Apollonius of Tyana, part of which was translated and annotated by Charles Blount, the freethinler, in 1680, and issued as a freethinking attack on Christianity Other works were Lives of the Sophists, sixty four Imagines, a Heroicus, and twenty-four epistles, mostly amatory and full of ingenious but strained conceits. These letters, mostly quite short, are variously arranged, but in three of the epistles (Nos 24, 30, and 31 in some old editions, in Kayser's ed, Teubner, 1870-71, Nos 33, 2, and 46) occur the following sentences, providing the ideas of the first half of the first verse, and of both halves of verse 2 (there is no close parallel for the second part of verse I)

Ευσι δι μετεις πρόποι τῶς ἔμματιν, ὧε καὶ ο Ζιὺς γιυσαυτιες οιεχεου παριστεκατε τι δὶ βουλιι, τον μὶν οἶτον μη παρα πελλυς, μονου δὶ ἰμβαλοῦνα εδατος καὶ τῶς χιιλισι προσφερου και αλνερυ φιλευατων το ἵκπωμα και οὖτως δίδου τοῦς διιμινοις

The Sweet Neglect—from 'Epicœne, or The Silent Woman.'

[From the Latin of Jean Bonnefons, French erotic poet, 1554-1614.]

Still to be neat, still to be drest,
As you were going to a feast,
Still to be powdered, still perfumed
Lady, it is to be presumed,
Though art's hid causes are not found,
All is not s veet, all is not sound.

All is not siveet, all is not sound.

Give me a look, give me a face,
That makes simplicity a grace,
Robes loosely flowing, hair as free,
Such sweet neglect more taketh me
Than all th' adulteries of art
They strike mine eyes, but not my heart.

To Celia-from 'Volpone' [Suggested by Catullus see page 401]

Come, my Celia, let us prove While we can the sports of love, Time will not be ours for ever, He at length our good will sever Spend not then his gifts in vain, Suns that set may rise again, But if once we lose this light, 'Tis with us perpetual night. Why should we defer our joys? Fame and rumour are but toys. Cannot we delude the eyes Of a few poor household spies? Or his easier ears beguile, So removed by our wile? 'Tis no sin love's fruit to steal, But the sweet theft to reveal To be taken, to be seen, These have crimes accounted been,

Hymn to Diana-from 'Cynthia's Revels.'

Queen and huntress, chaste and fair,
Now the sun is laid to sleep,
Seated in thy silver chair,
State in wonted manner keep Hesperus entreats thy light,
Goddess excellently bright.
Earth, let not thy envious shade

Earth, let not thy envious shade
Dare itself to interpose,
Cynthia's shining orb was made
Heaven to clear when day did close,
Bless us then with wished sight,
Goddess excellently bright

Lay thy bow of pearl apart,
And thy crystal shining quiver
Give unto the flying hart
Space to breathe, how short soever,
Thou that mak'st'a day of night,
Goddess excellently bright

To Night-from 'The Vision of Delight,'

Break, Phant'sie, from thy cave of cloud,
And spread thy purple wings,
Now all thy figures are allow'd,
And various shapes of things,
Create of air, forms a stream,
It must have blood, and nought of phlegin,
And though it be a waking dream,

Yet let it like an odour rise
To all the senses here,
And fall like sleep upon their eyes,
Or mu ic in their ear

Song-from 'Underwoods,'

Oh, do not wanton with those eyes,

Lest I be sick with seeing,

Nor cast them down, but let them rise,

Lest shame destroy their being

Oh, be not angry with those fires,
For then their threats will kill me,
Nor look too kind on my desires,
For then my hopes will spill me.

Oh, do not steep them in thy tears,
For so will sorrow slay me,
Nor spread them as distraught with fears,
Mine own enough betray me

An Epitaph on Salathiel Pavy, a Child of Queen Elizabeth's Chapel.

Weep with me, all you that read This little story And know, for whom a tear you shed Death's self is sorry Twas a child that so did thrive In grace and feature. As heaven and nature seem'd to strive Which own'd the creature. Years he number'd scarce thirteen When fates turn'd cruel. Yet three fill'd zodiacs had he been The stage's jewel, And did act, what now we moan, Old men so duly. As, sooth, the Parcæ thought him one, He play'd so truly So by error to his fate They all consented. But vicwing him since, alas too late! They have repented, And have sought, to give new birth. In baths to steep him, But being so much too good for earth Heaven vows to keep him.

The Triumph of Charis.

See the chariot at hand here of Love,
Wherein my Lady rideth!
Each that draws is a swan or a dove,
And well the car Love guideth
As she goe, all hearts do duty
Unto her beauty,
And enamour'd do wish, so they might
But enjoy such a sight,
That they still were to run by her side,
Through swords, through seas, whither she would ride.

Do but look on her eyes, they do light
All that Love's world compriseth!
Do but bok on her hair, it is bright
As Lo e's star when it riseth!
Do but mark, her forehead's smoother
Than words that soothe her
Ard from her arched brows such a grace
Sheds it elf through the face,

As alone there triumphs to the life All the gain, all the good of the elements' strife.

Have you seen but a bright hily grow,
Before rude hands have touch'd it?
Have you mark'd but the fall o' the snow
Before the soil hath smutch'd it?
Have you felt the wool of the bever?
Or swan's down ever?

Or have smelt o' the bud of the briar?

Or the nard in the fire?

Or have tasted the bag of the bee?
O so white! O so soft! O so sweet is she!

Epigram.—To my Bookseller

Thou that mak'st gain thy end, and wisely well Call'st a book good or bad as it doth sell,
Use mine so too, I give thee leave—but crave,
For the luck's sake, it thus much favour have,
To lie upon thy stall, till it be sought,
Not offer'd, as it made suit to be bought,
Nor have my title leaf on posts or walls,
Or in cleft sticks, advanced to make calls
For termers, or some clerk like serving man,
Who scarce can spell th'hard names, whose knight less can.
If without these vile arts it will not sell,
Send it to Bucklers bury, there 'twill well.

Epigram -To Dr Donne

Donne, the delight of Phoebus and each Muse, Who to thy one all other brains refuse, Whose every work of thy most early wit Came forth example, and remains so yet Longer a knowing than most wits do live, And which no affection praise enough can give! To it, thy language, letters, arts, best life, Which might with half mankind maintain a strife, All which I meant to praise, and yet I would, But leave, because I cannot as I should!

My Picture, left in Scotland.

I now think, Love is rather deaf than blind,
For else it could not be,
That she.

Whom I adore so much, should so slight me,
And cast my suit behind
I'm sure my language to her was as sweet,
And every close did meet
In sentence of as subtle feet,
As hath the youngest he,

That sits in shadow of Apollo's tree.

Oh! but my conscious fears,
That fly my thoughts between,
Tell me that she hath seen
My hundreds of gray hairs,
Told seven and forty years,
Read so much waste, as she cannot embrace
My mountain belly and my rocky face,

And all these through her eyes have stopt her ears.

From 'The Poet to the Painter'

Why, though I seem of a prodigious waist, I am not so voluminous and vast, But there are lines, wherewith I might be embrac'd 'Tis true, as my womb swells, so my back stoops, And the whole lump grows round, deform'd, and droops, But yet the Tun at Heidelberg had hoops.

You were not tied by any painter's law To square my circle, I confess, but draw My superficies that was all you saw

Which if in compass of no art it came To be described by a monogram, With one great blot you had form'd me as I am.

Good Life, Long Life

It is not growing like a tree
In bulk, doth make man better be,
Or standing long an oak, three hundred year,
To fall a log at last, dry, bald, and sear
A hly of a day

Is fairer far in May,
Although it fall and die that night,
It was the plant and flower of light!
In small proportions we just beauties see
And in short measures life may perfect be.

Epitaph on the Countess of Pembroke.

Underneath this sable herse Lies the subject of all verse, Sidney's sister, Pembroke's mother Death! ere thou hast slain another, Learn'd and fair, and good as she, Time shall throw a dart at thee.

This epitaph on Sidney's noble and accomplished sister, the Countess of Pembroke, for whose delectation the Arçadia was written, was first printed as Jonson's by Whalley in his edition of 1756 'This delicate epitaph is universally attributed to our author, though it hath never yet been printed with his works, it is, therefore, with some pleasure that I have given it a place here.' But about a hundred years before Aubrey had expressly said that the epitaph was by William Browne of Tavistock. Critical opinion is divided as to the provenance, Mr Bullen takes it as Browne's, Mr Sidney Lee as Jonson's

Epitaph on Elizabeth L. H.

Wouldst thou hear what man can say In a little?—reader, stay

Underneath this stone doth lie As much beauty as could die, Which in life did harbour give To more virtue than doth live.

If at all she had a fault,
Leave it buried in this vault.
One name was Elizabeth,
The other, let it sleep with death
Fitter where it died to tell,
Than that it lived at all Farewell.

On My First Daughter

Here lies, to each her parents' ruth,
Mary, the daughter of their youth
Yet all heaven's gifts being heaven's due,
It makes the father less to rue.
At six months' end she parted hence
With safety of her innocence;
Whose soul Heaven's queen, whose name she bears,
In comfort of her mother's tears,

Hath placed among her virgin train Where, while that severed doth remain, This grave partakes the fleshly birth, Which cover lightly, gentle earth!

To Penshurst [the home of the Sidneys].

Thou art not, Penshurst, built to envious show

Of touch or marble, nor canst boast a row Of polished pillars or a roof of gold Thou hast no lantern, whereof tales are told, Or stair, or courts, but stand'st an ancient pile, And these grudged at are reverenced the while. Thou joy'st in better marks of soil, of air, Of wood, of water, therein thou art fair Thou hast thy walks for health as well as sport, Thy mount to which the Dryads do resort, Where Pan and Bacchus their high feasts have made Beneath the broad beech, and the chestnut shade, That taller tree which of a nut was set At his great birth where all the Muses met. There, in the writhed bark, are cut the names Of many a sylvan, taken with his flames. And thence the ruddy satyrs oft provoke The lighter fauns to reach thy Lady's Oak. Thy copse, too, named of Gamage, thou hast here, That never fails, to serve thee, seasoned deer, When thou wouldst feast or exercise thy friends The lower land that to the river bends, Thy sheep, thy bullocks, kine, and calves do feed The middle ground thy mares and horses breed Each bank doth yield thee conies, and the tops Fertile of wood, Ashore and Sydney's copse, To crown thy open table, doth provide The purpled pheasant with the speckled side The painted partridge hes in every field, And for thy mess is willing to be killed And if the high swoln Medway fail thy dish, Thou hast thy ponds that pay thee tribute fish, Fat aged carps that run into thy net, And pikes, now weary their own kind to eat, As loth the second draught or cast to stay, Officiously at first themselves betray Bright eels that emulate them, and leap on land Before the fisher, or into his hand. Thou hast thy orchard fruit, thy garden flowers, Fresh as the air, and new as are the hours The early cherry with the later plum, Fig, grape, and quince, each in his time doth come The blushing apricot and woolly peach Hang on thy walls that every child may reach. And though thy walls be of the country stone, They're reared with no man's ruin, no man's groan, There's none that dwell about them wish them down, But all come in, the farmer and the clown, And no one empty handed, to salute Thy lord and lady though they have no suit. Some bring a capon, some a rural cake, Some nuts, some apples, some that think they make The better cheeses, bring them, or else send By their ripe daughters, whom they would commend This way to husbands, and whose baskets bear An emblem of themselves, in plum or pear But what can this (more than express their love) Add to thy free provisions, far above The need of such? whose liberal board doth flow With all that hospitality doth know!

No v, Penshurst, they that vill proportion thee With other edifices, when they see

Those proud ambitious heaps, and nothing else,
Ma say their lords have ballt, but thy lord dwells

To the Memory of my beloved Master William Shakespeare and what he hath left us [Ongmails to the First Force of Shakespeare 1623.]

To draw no envy, Shakespeare, on thy name, Am I thus ample to thy book and fame, While I confess thy writings to be such Is neither man nor Muse can praise too much. 'Tis true, and all men's suffrage. But these ways Were not the paths I meant unto thy praise For secliest ignorance on these may light. Which, when it sounds at best, but echoes right Or blind affection, which doth no er advance The truth, but gropes, and urges all by chance Or crafty malice might pretend this praise, And think to ruin, where it seemed to raise These are as some infamous bawd or whore Should praise a matron, what could hurt her more? But thou art proof against them, and, indeed, Above the ill fortune of them, or the need I therefore will begin. Soul of the age! The applicase, delight, the wonder of our stage ! My Shakespeare, rise! I will not lodge thee by Chaucer, or Spenser, or bid Beaumont lie A little further off, to make thee room I hou art a monument without a tomb. And art alive still, while thy book doth live, And we have wits to read and praise to give. That I not mix thee so, my brain excuses I mean with great but disproportioned Muses For if I thought my judgment were of years, I should commit thee surely with thy peers, And tell how far thou didst our Lyly outshine, Or sporting Kyd, or Marlowe's mighty line And though thou hadst small Latin and less Greek, I rom thence to honour thee I will not seek For names, but call forth thund'ring /Eschylus, Europides, and Sophocles to us, Pactivias, Accius, him of Cordova dead. Seneca To live again, to hear thy buskin trend, And shake a stage or when thy socks were on. Leave thee alone for the comparison Of all that insolent Greece or haughty Rome Sent forth, or since did from their ashes come. Triumph, my Britain, thou hast one to shew, To whom all scenes of Lurope homage one He was not of an age, but for all time! In I all the Muses still were in their prime When like Apollo he came forth to varm Our cars, or like a Mercury to charm ! Nature herself was proud of his designs, And joyed to vear the dressing of his lines! Which were so richly spun, and woven so ht, Is since she will vouchsafe no other wit. The merry Greek, tart Anstophanes, Neat Terence, witty Plantus, now not please I' it antiquated and described lie, As his nere not of nature's family Let must I not go e nature all, thy art, My sentl. Shakespeare, must enjoy a part

For though the poet's matter nature be, His art doth give the fashion, and that he Who casts to write a living line must sweat (Such as thine are) and strike the second heat Upon the Muses' anvil, turn the same, And himself with it, that he thinks to frame, Or for the laurel he may gain a scorn. For a good poet's made as well as born And such wert thou! Look how the father's face Lives in his issue, even so the race Of Shakespeare's mind and manners brightly shines In his well turned and true filed lines In each of which he seems to shake a lance. As brandished at the eyes of ignorance Sweet Swan of Avon! what a sight it were To see thee in our waters yet appear, And make those flights upon the banks of Thames That so did take Eliza and our James! But stay, I see thee in the hemisphere Advanced, and made a constellation there! Shine forth, thou Star of Pocts, and with rage Or influence chide or cheer the drooping stage. Which since thy flight from hence hath mourned like night, And despairs day but for thy volume's light!

On the Portrait of Shakespeare.

[Under the Portrait by Droeshout in the First Folio.]

This figure that thou here seest put, It was for gentle Shakespeare cut, Wherein the graver had a strife With nature, to outdo the life O could he but have drawn his wit, As well in brass, as he hath hit His face, the print would then surpass All that was ever writ in brass But since he cannot, reader, look Not on his picture, but his book.

Jonson's prose other than in drama may be illustrated by three paragraphs containing his judgment on Lord Bacon, taken from his Discoveries, which are in part a commonplace book of suggestions, in part a series of short essays on very various subjects, somewhat on the Baconian model

From 'Discoveries.'

Dominus Verulamius -One, though he be excellent, and the chief, is not to be imitated alone for no imitator ever grew up to his author, likeness is always on this side truth. Yet there happened in my time one noble speaker, who was full of gravity in his speaking. His language (where he could spare or pass by a jest) was No man ever spake more neatly, more nobly censorious pressly, more weightily, or suffered less emptiness, less idleness in what he uttered No member of his speech but consisted of his own graces. His hearers could not cough or look aside from him without loss. He com manded where he spoke, and had his judges angry and pleased at his devotion No man had their affections more in his power The fear of every man that heard him was, lest he should make an end

Scriptorum Catalogus—Cicero is said to be the only wit that the people of Rome had equalled to their empire Ingenium far imperio. We have had many, and in their several ages (to take in but the former centum) six

Thomas Moore, the elder Wiat, Henry earl of Surrey, Chaloner, Smith, Eliot, B Gardiner, were for their times admirable, and the more, because they began cloquence with us. Sir Nicholas Bacon was singular and almost alone in the beginning of queen Elizabeth's time. Sir Philip Sidney and Mr Hooker (in different matter) grew great masters of wit and language, and in whom all vigour of invention and strength of judgment The earl of Essex, noble and high, and sir Walter Raleigh, not to be contemned either for judg ment or style Sir Henry Savile, grave, and truly lettered, sir Edwin Sandys, excellent in both, lord Lgerton, the chancellor, a grave and great orator, and best when he was provoked. But his learned and able (though unfortunate) successor is he who hath filled up all numbers, and performed that in our tongue, which may be compared or preferred either to insolent Greece or haughty Rome. In short, within his view and about his times were all the wits born that could honour a language or help study. Now things daily fall, wits grow downward, and eloquence grows backward that he may be named, and stand as the mark and why of our language.

De Augmentis Scientiarum —Julius Ciesar —Lord St Alban —I have ever observed it to have been the office of a wise patriot, among the greatest affairs of the state, to take care of the commonwealth of learning. For schools, they are the seminaries of state, and nothing is worthier, the study of a statesman than that part of the republic which we call the advancement of letters. Witness the care of Julius Cresar, who in the heat of the civil war writ his books of Analogy and dedicated them to Tully. This made the late lord St Alban entitle his work Vorum Organium which though by the most of superficial men, who cannot get beyond the title of nominals, it is not penetrated nor understood, it really openeth all defects of learning whatsoever, and is a book

Qui longum roto scriptori proroget avum

My conceit of his person was never increased toward him by his place or honours—but I have and do reverence him for the greatness that was only proper to himself, in that he seemed to me ever, by his work, one of the greatest men and most worthy of admiration that had been in many ages. In his adversity I ever prayed that God would give him strength, for greatness he could not want. Neither could I condole in a word or syllable for him, as knowing no accident could do harm to virtue, but rather help to make it manifest.

It was Ben who said—what is better applicable to another court than he knew—'A virtuous court a world to virtue draws,' 'Contempt of fame begets contempt of virtue,' 'Apes are apes though clothed in scarlet,' 'Posterity pays every man his honour,' and who spoke of one 'plagued with an itching leprosy of wit.' 'Spread yourself on his bosom publicly whose heart you would eat in private' is one of his most cynical phrases, only less caustic is ''Tis the common disease of all your musicians that they know no mean to be entreated either to begin or end.'

The standard edition of Jonson is the far from perfect one of Gifford (9 vols. 1816, reissued with some additional notes by Colonel Cunningham in 1875) a selection of the plays was edited by Brinsley Nicholson and C. H. Herford for the 'Mermaid Series' (3 vols. 1893-95) there are selections of plays and poems by Morley (1834) and J A. Symonds (1836), and Mr Wheatley's edition of Every Map in his Humour has a valuable introduction. See the Life by Gifford, Symonds's Ben Jonson in the English Worthes series (1886), Mr Swinburne's brilliant Study of Ben Jonson (1890), and the valuable section on Jonson in Dr A. W. Ward's English Dramatic Literature (new ed. 1899).

John Donne, gallant and courtier, wit and poet, lived to be one of the greatest preachers of the English Church, and died the saintly Dean of St Paul's He was born in London in 1573, his father, a prosperous ironmonger, being possibly of Welsh descent. His mother, daughter of John Heywood, epigrammatist and writer of interludes (supra, page 153), was descended from Sir Thomas More's sister, the family on both sides were devout Catholics, and several of them suffered danger and exile for the Catholic cause. John Donne, whose father died in 1576, leaving his widow with six chil dren, was sent to Hart Hall, Oxford, but graduated at Cambridge, and was entered at Lincoln's Inn in He read much law and controversial theology, was bookish but sprightly and even wild, and allowed his exuberant vitality to carry him into unbecoming dissipations. His early poems, manyof them outspokenly sensual and at times cruelly cynical, are held by Mr Gosse to contain a sincere autobiographical record of a scandalous liaison with a married woman, besides other lesser irregularities He travelled abroad, took part in Essex's Cadiz expedition, and on his return was appointed secretary to the Lord-Keeper, Sir Thomas Egerton, afterwards Lord Ellesmere and Chancellor now came to know many of the most eminent men of the day, and wrote, without printing it, great part of his poetry. A characteristic poem of this time, The Progress of the Soul (1601), or Metempsychosis, pursues a deathless soul through its transmigrations into many bodies, including those of a sparrow, a fish eaten by a pike, which is swallowed by a bird, and that by a whale. He fell violently in love with a niece of the Lord-Keeper's wife, and the pair were clandestinely married at the end of 1601, in consequence Donne was dismissed, and even for a time imprisoned. In the trying years of poverty that followed he showed an amount of servility to unworthy courtiers, such as Somerset and Buckingham, that even the custom of the age cannot justify, he did much of Somerset's dirty work in securing the divorce of his paramour, the afterwards so infamous Countess of Essex, and even wrote a gushing epithalamium for their remarriage Having become an Anglican, Donne helped Dean (afterwards Bishop) Morton in his controversial writings against the Catholics, and himself indited a volume on the Catholics and the oaths of allegiance (The Pseudo-Martyr) and against the Jesuits (Ignatius his Conclave) Buthanatos, also a prose work, proved suicide to be no very hemous sin. Donne's Divine Poems mostly belong to this period, and include Holy Sonnets and A Litany The first poem he printed was an elegy (1611) on Sir Robert Drury's daughter, a child of fifteen, whom he had never seen, this he followed next year by another (The Anatomy of the IVorld), and yet a third, all containing beautiful and even splendid passages, but marred by overmultiplied and overstrained conceits and atterly preposterous hyperbole -'cnormous and disgusting hyperboles' is a phrase of Dr Johnson's Thus Donne declares death now

> Can find nothing after her to kill, Except the world itself, so great as she

the world could better have spared the sun, and by reason of this dimsel's death is now a mere cripple and the ghost of its former self! But the elegies so commended the clegist that Drury give him and his wife free quarters in his house, and took the poet abroad with him It was at Paris that Donne saw the vision of his wife with a dead child in her arms, afterwards proved a veritable fact. Donne had cre this offered to go into the Church if he could thus secure patronage, and now in 1615 he did so, after mysterious de lays and hesitations, credited by Wilton to his remorse for youthful sins, but open-partly at least -to a less gracious reference to worldly calculations and ambitious hopes Γ hc king encouraged him to take English orders Lither now, as one would hope, or, as Mr Gosse thinks, after his wife's death (1617), his deeper nature was stirred to true religious zeal, and theology was no longer a hobby or a professional exercise. Walton's story that Donne had fourteen livings offered him in his first year of derical life is shown by Mr Gosse to be quite incredible, but sersonable preferments came furly soon. In 1616 he received the livings of Keyston in Huntingdon and Sevenorks in Kent. but he never lived in either parish Various preacherships he also held, and in 1621 became Denn of St Paul's. Charles I had resolved to make him a bishop, but Donne died on the 31st of March 1631, before this purpose was carried out. He was buried in St Paul's, and by and by that eccentre monument was erected from the painting made in the list month of the Dean's life-the invalid solumnly posing to the artist sheeted in a l

shroud and standing on an urn in a specially warmed room From his ordination till near his end Donne wrote few poems, his trenchant thought, his brilliant fancy, his profound insight, and his command of the English tongue finding outlet in his sermons

Donne's poems-songs and quatorzains, satires, elegies, religious poems, complimentary epistles in verse, epithalamiums, epigrams, and miscellaneous meditations in metre-were many of them diligently handed about in manuscript from the beginning, but were not collected and published In virtue of his early poems, whose erotic sensualism he in later days regretted-

> though he preserved the MSS, as Beza, another Churchman, republished his erotic verse-Donne ranks in a sense with earlier contemporary Elizabethans, but seems to have consciously revolted against their mellifluous monotonies, their pscudo classi cal nomenclature, their pastoral and other conventions. Hıs hard and crabbed style is to some extent deliberrtely rdopted, we may even congratulate ourselves that so much perfect and melodious verse took that shape as it were in spite of him be hanged,' and that he would perish from not being understood. It must be accounted a glory to Donne that George Herbert and his brother of Cherbury were, for good or evil, his pupils, and the mystic Crashaw, too, Carew was another enthusiastic admirer In Dryden's judgment Donne was 'the greatest wit though not the best poet of our nation,' for of course Dryden sympathised with the contrary influences represented by Waller, Donne was discredited Denham, and Cowley in the later seventcenth century and all the eighteenth But Mr Gosse traces Donne's influ ence in Pope (who 'versified' Donne's Sittres), and thinks modern appreciation of the 'metaphysical poet' began with Browning, who put the Mandrake Song to music. Now it is agreed that, amidst roughness and obscurity, far-fetched allusion, contorted imagery and allegory, and unrhythmical wit, Donne often presents us with poetry of a high order, in expression as well as in thought

He

With Hill, Donne was one of the first English saturists on the regular Latin model. Buch inan's satires were in Latin, and Skelton and Lyndsay belong to a different category Dryden, Pope, and Young took over and smoothed Donne's type of rhyming couplet, and Pope, acting on Dryden's hint, modernised some of Donne's satires swift transitions from voluptuous ecstasies to meditation on the mystery of life and death, and his profound but at times not a little fantastic specul i tions, no doubt contributed to securing for Donne the epithet-seldom precisely used-of 'metaphysical' His intellect was active and keen, his fancy vivid and picturesque, his wit playful and yet caustic. His too great terseness and prodigality of ideas breeds obscurity, the uneven and crabbed versification, with superfluous syllables to be slurred over, and accents that must be thrown on the wrong syllables-however much a part of his conscious design—is puzzling you have to understand the poem before you can scan his verse. The conceits are often not merely striking but suggestive and beautiful, lightly and Mr Gosse praises especially gracefully handled

Doth not a Teneriffe or higher hill Rise so high like a rock that one might think The floating moon would shipwreck there and sink.

On the other hand, Donne constantly piles up Ossas upon Pelions of metaphors, prefers such as are puerile or grotesque—defying the good taste of his own time as well as ours—and over elaborates them to wearisomeness. Thus, treating of a broken heart, he runs off into a play on the expression 'broken heart.' He entered a room, he says, where his mistress was present, and

Love, alas At one first blow did shyver yt [his heart] as glasse.

Then, insisting on the idea of a heart broken to pieces, he goes on to exhaust the conceit and make it tedious

Yet nothing can to nothing fall,

Nor any place be emptye quyte,

Therefore I think my brest hath all

Those peeces still, though they do not unyte:

And now as broken glasses showe

A thousand lesser faces, soe

My raggs of hart can like, wish, and adore,

But after one such love can love no more.

Address to Bishop Valentine, on the Day of the Marriage of the Elector Palatine to the Princess Elizabeth

Hail, Bishop Valentine, whose day this is,
All the air is thy diocis,
And all the chirping choristers
And other birds are thy parishioners
Thou marryest every year
The lyrique larke, and the grave whispering dove,
The sparrow, that neglects his life for love,
The household bird with the red stomacher,
Thou mak'st the blackbird speed as soon
As doth the goldfinch or the halcion,
This day more cheerfully than ever shine,
This day, which might inflame thyself, old Valentine.

Valediction forbidding Mourning

As virtuous men pass myldly away,
And whisper to their sowles to goe,
Whilst some of their sad freinds doe say,
Now his breath goes, and some say, noc,

Soc let us mult, and make no noise,
No tear floods nor sigh tempests move,
'Twere prophanation of our joyes
To tell the faictic our love

Movinge of th' earth brings harms and feares, Men reckon what it did, and meant, But trepidations of the sphæres, Though greater farr, are innocent

Dull sublunary Lovers' love,
Whose sowle is sence, cannot admytt
Absence, for that it doth remove Those things which elemented it

But we, by a love so far refynde
That ourselves know not what it is,
Inter assured of the mynde,
Care less eyes, hpps, and hands to miss.

Our two sowles therefore, which are one,
Though I must go, indure not yet
A breach, but an expansion,
Like gould to aerye thinness beat.

If they be two, they are two soe
As styff twynn compasses are two,
Thy sowle, the fixt foote, makes no showe
To move, but doth if th' other doe

And though it in the center sytt,
Yet when the other fair doth roine,
It leans and hearkens after it,
And growes erect, as thit comes home.

Such will thou be to me, who must,
I ske th' other foote, obliquely runn,
Thy formness riakes my circles just,
And makes me end where I begunn.

The Will

Before I sigh my last gaspe, let me breath,
Great Love, some legacies. I heere bequeath Myre eyes to Argus, if myne eyes can see,
If they be blynd, then, Love, I give them thee,
My tongue to Fame, to 'embassadors myne eares,
Fo women, or the sea, my tears.
Thou, Love, hast taught me heretofore
By making me love her who 'had twentie more,
That I should give to none but such as had too much before.

My constance I to the plannets give,
My truth to them who at the Court doe live,
Mine ingenuitie and opennesse
To Jesuits, to buffoones my pensivenes
My sylence to any who abroad have been,
My money to a Capuchin
Thou, Love, taught'st mee, by appointing mee
To love her where no love receiv'd can bee,
Only to give to such as have an incapacitye
My faith I give to Romane Catholiques,
All my good woorkes unto the schismatiques
Of Amsterdam, my best civilitie

And courtshipp to an Universitie,

My modestic I give to souldiers bare,

My patience lett gamesters share

Thou, Love, taught'st me, by making mee

Love her, that houlds my love disparitie,

Only to give to those that count my guifts indig

Only to give to those that count my guists indignitie.

My reputation I give to those

Which were my friends, mine industry to foes, To Schoolmen I bequeath my doubtfulnes, My sicknes to phisitians, or excess, To Nature all that I in rithme have writt,

And to my company my witt.

Thou, Love, by making me adore

Her who begot this love in me before,

Taught'st me to make as though I gave, when I do but restore

To him for whom the passing bell next toles

I give my phisik books, my written roles
Of morrill counsells I to Bedlam give,
My brazen meddalls unto them which live
In want of bread, to them which passe amonge
All foranners, myne English toungue

Thou, Love, by makinge me love one
Who thynks her friend-hipp a fitt portionn
For younger lovers, dost my guift thus disproportion.

Therefore I'le give not more, but I le undoe The world by dyinge, because Love dyes too Then all your bewties wilbe no more worth Then gold in mynes, when none doe draw it forth,

And all your graces no more use will have Then a sun-dyall in a grave.
Thou, Lo e, taught'st me, by appointing mee
To love her who doth neglect both mee and thee,
T' invent and practice that one way t' annihilate all three

Character of a Bore-from Donne's Fourth Satire.

Towards me did runne
A thing more strange than on Nile's slime the sunne L'er b ed, or all which in a Noah, arke came,
A thing which would have pos'd Adam to name.

Than Africks monsters, Guiana's rarities,
Stranger than strangers. One who for a Dane
In the Danes massacre had sure beene slaine,
If he had liv'd then, and without helpe dies
When next the Prentises 'gainst Strangers rise
One whom the watch at noone scarce lets goe by,
One to whom th' examining justice sure would cry
'Sir, by your priesthood, tell me what you are?'
His clothes were strange though coarse, and black though bare,
Sleevelesse his jerkin was, and it had bin
Velvet, but 'twas now (so much ground was seene) Become Tuff taffaty, and our children shall'
See it plain rashe awhile, then nought at all

Stranger than seven Antiquaries studies,

And onely knoweth what to all States belongs
Made of th' Accents and best phrase of all these,
He speakes one language. If strange meats displease,
Art can deceive, or hunger force my taste,
But Pedants motley tongue, souldiers bumbast,
Mountebanks drug tongue, nor the termes of law,
Are strong enough preparatives to draw
Me to beare this Yet I must be content
With his tongue, in his tongue call'd compliment

The thing hath travail'd, and saith, speaks all tongues,

He names me, and comes to me. I whisper, 'God! How have I sinn'd, that thy wraths furious rod, This fellow, chooseth me?' He saith 'Sir, I love your judgment—whom do you prefer For the best Linguist?' And I seelily Said that I thought Calepines Dictionarie 'Nay, but of men, most sweet sir?'—Beza then, 'Some Jesuits, and two reverend men

He stopt me, and said 'Nay, your Apostles were Pretty good linguists, and so Panurge was, Yet a poor gentleman all these may pass By travel' Then, as if he would have sold His tongue, he praised it, and such wonders told, That I was faine to say 'If you had lived, sir,

Of our two academies, I named. Here

Time enough to have been Interpreter
To Babels bricklayers, sure the Fower had stood?
He adds 'If of court life you knew the good,
You would leave lonenesse.' I said 'Not alone

My lonenesse is, but Spartans fashion To teach by painting drunkards doth not taste Now, Aretine's pictures have made few chaste, No more can princes' courts—though there be few Better pictures of vice—teach me vertue'

'Tis sweet to talke of kings!' 'At Westminster,'
Said I, 'the man that keeps the Abbey tombes,
And for his price doth, with whoever comes,

He, like to a high stretcht lute string, squeakt 'O sir,

Of all our Harries, and our Edwards talke, From King to King, and all their kin can walke Your cares shall heare nought but Kings, your eves

Kings onely, The way to it is King's street' He smack'd, and cryd, 'He's base, mechanique, coarse, So are all your I nglish men in their discourse'

'Are not your I regish men in their discourse'
'Are not your I rench men neat?' 'Mine? as you see,

I have but one, Sir, looke, he followes me Certes, they are neatly cloath'd.' I, of this minde am,

Your onely wearing is your Grogaram.'
'Not so, Sir, I have more' Under this pitch

He would not the I chaff'd him, But as itch

Scratch'd into smart, and as blunt Iron grownd Into an edge, hurts worse, so I (foole 1) found Crossing hurt me. To fit my sullennesse, He to another key his stile doth dresse, And askes, what newes? I tell him of new playes He takes my hand, and, as a Still which stayes A semibriefe 'twixt each drop, he niggardly, As loath to mrich me, so tels many a ly, More than ten Hollensheads, or Halls, or Stowes, Of triviall houshold trash, He knowes he knowes When the queen frown d or smil'd, and he knows what A subtile Statesman may gather of that He knowes who loves, whom and who by poyson Hasts to an Offices reversion He knows who 'hath sold his land, and now doth beg A license, old iron, bootes, shooes, and egge Shells to transport, Shortly boyes shall not play At span counter or blow point, but shall pay Toll to some Courtier, and wiser than all us, He knows what Lady is not painted. Thus

An early poetic allusion to the Copernican system occurs in Donne

As new phylosophy arrests the sun, And bids the passive earth about it run

He with home meats cloyes me.

This simile was often repeated by later poets

When goodly, like a shipp in her full trimme, A swann so white, that you may unto him Compare all whitenes, but himselfe to none, Glided along, and, as hee glided, watched, And with his arched neck this poore fish catch't It mooved with state, as if to looke upon Low things it scorn'd.

The second of Donne's five 'Prebend Sermons,' preached at St Paul's in 1625, 'a long poem of victory over death,' is, as Mr Gosse says, 'one of the most magnificent pieces of religious writing in English literature, and closes with a majestic sentence of incomparable pomp and melody'

As my soule shall not goe towards Heaven, but goe by Heaven to Heaven, to the Heaven of Heavens, so the true joy of a good soule in this world is the very joy of Heaven, and we goe thither not that being without joy we might have joy infused into us, but that, as Christ sayes, Our joy might be full, perfected, sealed with an everlastingnesse for as he promises That no man shall take our joy from us, so neither shall Death itselfe take it away, nor so much as interrupt it or discontinue it, but as in the face of Death, when he layes hold upon me, and in the face of the Devil when he attempts me, I shall see the face of God (for everything shall be a glasse, to reflect God upon me), so in the agonies of Death, in the anguish of that dissolution, in the sorrowes of that vale diction, in the irreversiblenesse of that transmigration, I shall have a joy which shall no more evaporate than my soule shall evaporate, a joy that shall passe up and put on a more glorious garment above, and be joy superinvested in glory Amen

Donne's poems were posthumously collected and published in a one volume quarto in 1633, his son issued a fuller edition in 1649. The son published also successive collections of sermons, prose works and letters. Alford's edition of the poems (1839) is singularly unsatisfactory, Grosart's (in the Fuller Worthes Library') is the fullest. There is an edition by E. K. Chambers (1896), with critical introduction by Professor Saintsbury Izaak Walton's Life, a re markable masterpiece of biography, was originally prefixed to some of the sermons published in 1640, and was afterwards enlarged but Walton had insufficient information on some parts of Donne's life. Dr Jessopp's John Donne, constitute Dean of St Paul's (1847) dwel's mainly on the theological side of the man then the same author's article in the Dictionary of National Biography is note worthy. But when Mr Gosse undertook h's Life and Lett rs ne could justly say that it was 'perhaps the most imposing task left to the student of Elizabethan and Jacobean literature. The work, issued in two volumes in 1699, is a triumph of biographical skill and literary insight. Mr Gosse arranged the letters for the first time, and shed much light on various parts of Donne's career. The bibliographical and critical information brought together by Mr Gosse is mapproached elsewhere in value.

Joseph Hall (1574-1656), born at Ashby-dela-Zouch, in Leicestershire, studied at Cambridge, and rose through various church preferments to be Bishop of Exeter (1627) and then of Norwich (1641) In 1617 he went with James to Scotland in the design of establishing Episcopacy, and next year was a deputy to the Synod of Dort. He was accused of Puritanism, was at enmity with Laud, and in 1641, as a prelate claiming his rights in the House of Lords, was imprisoned in the Tower for His revenues were sequestrated seven months and his property pillaged, and in 1647 he retired to a small farm near Norwich, where he lived till his death. His principal works were theological and devotional-Christian Meditations, The Con templations on the New Testament and On the Holy Story, and a Paraphrase of Hard Texts His sermons have a rapid, vehement eloquence well fitted to arouse and impress He wrote against Papists and Brownists with equal fervour In 1608 he published a remarkable series of Characters of Vertues and Vices, similar to the famous Characters of Overbury (1614) Hall's Epistles are also numerous Fuller, who says that 'for his pure, full, plain style' Hall was called the English Seneca, judges him 'not ill at controversies, more happy at comments, very good in his characters, better in his sermons, best of all in his meditations.' He is, however, best remembered in literature for his satires, published under the title of Virgidemiarum, Sixe Bookes, in 1597-98, before he was in holy orders In them he followed Latin models, but is rather vigorous, witty, and even scurrilous than polished Archbishop Whitgift condemned them to be burned as licentious with works by Marlowe and Marston, but the judgment was withdrawn Pope thought them the best poetry and the truest satire in the English language, while Hallam pronounces them rugged, obscure, and ungrammatical. Hall boldly claims to be the first English satirist

> I first adventure, follow me who list And be the second English satirist

He means probably the first regular satirist, following Latin models, and even then Marston was enraged by Hall's claim Donne and Marston seem to have written about the same time, Lodge's Fig for Monus was some years earlier Wyatt and Gascoigne, too, might claim to be reckoned, and Nash, whether or no he was Greene's 'Young Juven il, that being saturest,' even though Skelton were regarded as too irregular and ribald, and Pers Platania was, of course, very far removed from classical models. In Scotland, Dunbar and Lyndsia, were persistent saturests in vernacular verse, and Buchanan both in Latin verse and Scottish prose.

Upon the Sight of a Tree Full-blossomed.

Here is a tree overlaid with blossoms. It is not possible that all these should pro per, one of them must needs rob the other of moisture and growth. I do not love to see an infancy over hopeful, in these pregnant beginnings one faculty starves another, and at last leaves the mind sapless and barren. As, therefore, we are wont to pull off some of the too frequent blossoms, that the rest may thrive, so it is good wisdom to moderate the early excess of the parts, or progress of over forward childhood. Neither is it otherwise in our Christian profession, a sudden and lavish ostentation of grace may fill the eye with wonder, and the mouth with talk, but will not at the last fill the lap with fruit. Let me not promise too much, nor raise too high expectations of my undertakings, I had rather men should complain of my small hopes than of my short performances

Upon a Redbreast coming into his Chamber

Pretty bird, how cheerfully dost thou sit and sing, and yet knowest not where thou art, nor where thou shalt make thy next meal, and at night must shroud thyself in a bush for lodging! What a shame is it for me, that see before me so liberal provisions of my God, and find myself set warm under my own roof, yet am ready to droop under a distrustful and unthankful dulness! Had I so little certainty of my harbour and purveyance, ho v heartles, should I be, how careful! how little list [inclina tion] should I have to make music to ther or myself! Surely thou comest not hither without a Providence. God sent thee not so much to delight as to shame me, but all in a conviction of my sullen unbelief, who, under more apparent means, am le., cheerful and confident. Reason and faith have not done so much in me, as in thee mere instinct of nature, want of foresight makes thee more merry, if not more happy here, than the foresight of better things maketh me. O God thy providence impaired by those powers thou hast given me above these brute things, let not my greater helps hinder me from a holy security, and comfortable reliance on thee.

Upon hearing of Music by Night

How sweetly doth this music sound in this dead eason! In the daytime it would not it could not so much affect the car. All harmonious sounds are advanced by a silen darkness. Thus it is with the lad tidings of salvation, the gospel never sounds so sweet as in the might of preservation, or of our own private adjection. It is ever the same, if e difference is in our disposition to receive it O God! whose pruse it is to 'give songs in the night,' make my prosperity conscionable, and my crosses cheerful.

Upon the Sight of an Owl in the Twilight.

What a strange melancholic life doth this creature lcad, to hide her head all the day long in an ivy bush, and at night, when all other birds are at rest, to fly abroad, and vent her harsh notes I know not why the uncients have sacred this bird to wisdom, except it be for her safe closeness and singular perspicacity, that when other domestical and airy creatures are blind, she only hath inward light to discern the least objects for her own advantage. Surely thus much wit they have taught us in her. That he is the wisest man that would have least to do with the multitude, That no life is so safe as the obscure, That retiredness, if it have less comfort, yet less danger and vexation, lastly, That he is truly wise who sees by a light of his own, when the rest of the world sit in an ignorant and confused dark ness, unable to apprehend any truth save by the helps of an outward illumination. Had this fowl come forth in the daytime, how had all the little birds flocked wondering about her, to see her uncouth visage, to hear her untuned notes! She likes her estate never the worse, but pleaseth herself in her own quiet reserved ness. It is not for a wise man to be much affected with the censures of the rude and unskilful vulgar, but to hold fast unto his own well-chosen and well fixed reso lutions Every fool knows what is wont to be done, but what is best to be done, is known only to the wise.

Upon the Sight of a Great Library

What a world of wit is here packed up together! I know not whether this sight doth more dismay or comfort me it dismays me to think that here is so much that I cannot know, it comforts me to think that this variety yields so good helps to know what I should. There is no truer word than that of Solomon-there is no end of making many books this sight verifies There is no end, indeed, it were pity there should God hath given to man a busy soul, the agitation whereof cannot but through time and experience work out many hidden truths, to suppress these would be no other than injurious to mankind, whose minds, like unto so many candles, should be kindled by each other thoughts of our deliberations are most accurate, these we vent into our papers. What a happiness is it that without all offence of necromancy, I may here call up any of the ancient Worthies of Learning, whether human or divine, and confer with them of all my doubts ! -that I can at pleasure summon whole synods of reverend fathers and acute doctors from all the coasts of the earth, to give their well studied judgments in all points of question which I propose! Neither can I cast my eye casually upon any of these silent masters but I must learn somewhat. It is a wantonness to complain of choice No law binds me to read all, but the more we can take in and digest, the better liking must the mind needs be blessed be God that hath set up so many clear lamps in his Church, now none but the wilfully blind can plead darkness, and blessed be the memory of those his faithful servants, that have left their blood, their spirits, their lives, in these precious papers, and have willingly wasted themselves into these during monuments, to give light unto others!

(Paradise-The Gospel of Labour)

Every earth was not fit for Adam, but a garden, a paradise. What excellent pleasures, and rare varieties, have men found in gardens planted by the hands of men! And yet all the world of men cannot make one twig, or leaf, or spire of grass. When he that made the matter undertakes the fashion, how must it needs be, beyond our capacity, excellent! No herb, no flower, no tree, was wanting there, that might be for ornament or use, whether for sight, or for scent, or for taste. The bounty of God wrought further than to necessity, even Why are we niggardly to to comfort and recreation ourselves, when God is liberal? But for all this, if God had not there conversed with man, no abundance could have made him blessed Yet, behold ! that which was man's storchouse was also his workhouse, his pleasure was his task paradise served not only to feed his senses, but to exercise his hands. If happiness had con sisted in doing nothing, man had not been employed, all his delights could not have made him happy in an idle life. Man, therefore, is no sooner made than he is set to work neither greatness nor perfection can privilege a folded hand, he must labour, because he was happy, how much more we, that we may be! This first labour of his was, as without necessity, so without pains, with out weariness, how much more cheerfully we go about our businesses, so much nearer we come to our paradise.

The Hypocrite.

A hypocrite is the worst kind of player, by so much as he acts the better part which hath always two faces, ofttimes two hearts that can compose his forehead to sadness and gravity, while he bids his heart be wanton and careless within, and, in the mean time, laughs within himself, to think how smoothly lie hath cozened the beholder in whose silent face are written the characters of religion, which his tongue and gestures pronounce, but his hands recant that hath a clean face and garment, with a foul soul whose mouth belies his heart, and his fingers belie his mouth. Walking early up into the city, he turns into the great church, and salutes one of the pillars on one knee, worshipping that God which at home he cares not for while his eye is fixed on some window, on some passenger, and his heart knows not whither his lips go he rises and, looking about with admiration, complains of our frozen charity, commends the ancient. At church he will ever sit where he may be seen best, and in the midst of the sermon pulls out his tables in haste, as if he feared to lose that note, when he writes either his forgotten errand or nothing then he turns his Bible with a noise, to seek an omitted quotation, and folds the leaf. as if he had found it, and asks aloud the name of the preacher, and repeats it, whom he publicly salutes. thanks, praises, invites, entertains with tedious good counsel, with good discourse, if it had come from an honester mouth. He can command tears, when he speaks of his youth, indeed because it is past, not because it was sinful himself is now better, but the times are worse. All other sins he reckons up with detestation, while he loves and hides his darling in his bosom. All his speech returns to himself, and every occurrent draws in a story to his own praise. When he should give, he looks about him, and says, 'Who sees me?' No alms, no prayers fall from him, without a witness, belike, lest God should deny, that

The Busy-body

His estate is too narrow for his mind, and therefore Le is fun to make himself room in others' affairs, vet ever in pretence of love. No news can stir but by his door neither can be know that which he must not tell What every man ventures in Guiana voyage, and what they gained, he knows to a hair. Whether Holland will ha a peace, he knows, and on what conditions, and with what success, is familiar to him ere it be concluded No post can pass him without a question, and rather than he will lose the news, he rides back with him to appoar [question] him of tidings and then to the next man he meets, he supplies the wants of his hasty intel ligence, and makes up a perfect tale, wherewith he so haunteth the patient auditor that after many excuses he is fain to endure rather the censure of his manners in run ning away, than the tediousness of an impertment dis course. His speech is oft broken off with a succession of long parentheses, which he ever your to fill up ere the conclusion, and perhaps would effect it, if the others' car were as unweariable as his tongue. If he see but two men talk and read a letter in the street, he runs to them, and asks if he may not be partner of that secret relation, and if they deny it, he offers to tell, since he may not hear, wonders, and then falls upon the report of the Scottish Mine, or of the great fish taken up at Lynn, or of the freezing of the Thames, and, after many thanks and dismissions, is hardly entreated silence He undertakes as much as he per forms little. John Day, dramatist, has since 1897 been identified with John Dev, who, according to college records, was the son of a yeoman at Cawston in Norfolk, born 1571, and entered Casus College, Cambridge, as a sizar in 1592 Of his work practically nothing was known till 1881, save that with Chettle he produced the extant play, The Blind Beggar of Bednal Green, which owes but little to the well-known ballad in Percy's Reliques He had a share in over a score of plays, often in collaboration with Chettle, Dekker, Haughton, and others. But little of his handiwork was accessible till in 1881 Mr Bullen reprinted five plays by him, an allegorical masque, The Parliament of Beis, in which the Humble Bee, the Hornet, the Drone, &c, are arraigned, and an allegorical tract called Peregrinatio Scholastica The Ile of Guls is a mixture of romance, allegory, and fun, without much dramatic consistency Humour out of Breath is an Arcadian play, slight in texture, dealing with the adventures of the daughters of a banished Duke of Mantua and of the sons of his enemy, the Duke of Venice. Day shows everywhere more grace and fancy than constructive The academic trilogy power or consistency The Pilgrimage to Parnassus and the Returne (quoted below) have also been attributed, on no sufficient grounds, to Day

See Mr Bullen's Introduction to Day's Plays (1881), Ward's Dramatic Literature, and Mr Swinburne's article on Day in the Vineteenth Century for October 1897

The Pilgrimage to Painassus -A play of this name was acted at St John's College, Cambridge, at Christmas of 1598, a sequel, called the Returne from Parnassus, in 1599, and a second part of the Returne in 1601 This second part of the Returne has often been reprinted, the two earlier plays of this academic series were only known by name till, found in Hearne's collection by Mr Macray, they and their sequel were published by him in 1886, a complete Parnassian trilogy They may be taken as the most notable specimen of the academic plays which were a conspicuous feature of the time. Sometimes the classical plays merely were acted by the students, gradually new Latin plays on classical models became common, and by-and-by, in spite of academic and court prohibi tions, the new plays came to be wholly or partly in These especially shed a strange and vivid light on contemporary university life, and give a melancholy picture of the misery and humiliation of those who then sought to make a precarious livelihood by learning or letters

In the Pilgrimage to Parnassus we have the travels to the Mountain of the Muses of Philomusus and Studioso through Logic Land and Rhotoric Land and Philosophy Land in spite of the seductions of Madido and his wine cup, Stupido, and Amoretto The Returne from Parnassus, in two parts, shows the struggles of the same pilgrims to find, after their sojourn in the heights of poetry, a footing in this worksday world—as tutor, physician, fiddler, or shepherd. The plays are most frequently quoted for their references (not always complimentary) to dramatists of the period—to Shakespeare, Jonson, Daniel, Lodge, Drayton, Marston, Marlowe, Nash, to the poets Spenser and Constable, and to the actors Kemp and Burbage.

Thus Gallio effusively praises Shakespeare as author of Venus and Adonis and Romeo and fullet, but Gallio is a vulgar, purse-proud upstart, an ignorant pretender to culture. It is Kemp the actor who says to Burbage, 'Why, here's our fellow Shakespeare puts them all down, 13, and Ben Jonson too' And other allusions to Shakespeare suggest that Shakespeare was 'the favourite of the rude half educated strolling players as distin guished from the refined geniuses of the university' The construction is singular and irregular Pilgrimage is only half the length of the first part of the Returne, and the second part is more than twice the length of the first. There is abundant wit and humour throughout, and not a little coarseness, the carrier (Hobson, celebrated by Milton), tapster, and churchwarden are as entertaining character sketches as those of the principal The following is from the second characters and the third 'Actus' of the Pilgrimage

Enter MADIDO alone, reading Horace Epistles

Made O pocet Horace! if thou were alive I woulde bestowe a cupp of sacke on thee for these liquid verses, theise are not drie rimes like Cato's, Si deus est animus, but the true moist issue of a poeticall soule. O if the tapsters and drawers knewe what thou sayest in the commendation of takinge of liquoure, they would score up thy prayses upon everie but and barrell, and, in faith, I care not if I doe for the benefite of the unlearned bestowe some of my English poetrie uppon thy Latin runes, that this Romane tonge maye noe longer outface our poore Englishe skinkers. He onlie rouse up my muse out of her den with this liquid sacrifice, and then, have amongste your, poets and rimers! common people will now thinke I did drincke, and did nothinge but conferr with the ghostes of Homer, Ennius, Virgill, and they rest that dwell in this watterie Marke, marke ' here springs a poeticall par tridge! Zouns! I want a worde miserablely! I must looke for another worde in my dictionarie. I shall noc sooner open this pinte pott but the worde like a knave tapster will one, Anon, Anon, Su ! Ey marye Sir ! nowe I am fitt to write a Look! Woulde ame leaden Mydas, anie mossie patron, have his asses ears deified, let him but come and give mee some prettie sprinkling to main taine the expences of my throate, and He dropp out suche an encomium on him that shall imortalize him as long as there is ever a booke binder in Englande. But I had forgotten my frind Horace Take not in snuffe (my prettie verses!) if I turne you out of youre komane coate into an Englishe gaberdine.

[Enter PHILOMUSUS and STUDIOSO]

Philom In faith, Madido, thy poetrie is good, Some gallant Genius doth possess thy corps.

Stud I think a furie rayisheth thy braine, Thou art in such a sweet phantasticke vaine.

But tell mee, shall wee have thy companie Throughe this craggie ile, this harsh rough waye? Wilt thou be pilgrime to Parnassus' hill?

Madi I had rather be a horse to grinde in mill.

Zouns! I travell to Parnassus? I tell thee its not a pilgrimage for good wits. Let slowe brainde Athenians travell thither, those drie sober youths which can away to reede dull lives, fustic philosophers, dustic logicians. Ile turne home, and write that that others shall reade, posteritie shall make them large note books out of my writings. Naye, there is another thing that makes mee out of love with this jorney, there is scarce a good taverne or alchouse betwixt this and Parnassus, why, a poeticall spirit muste needs starve!

Philom Naye, when thou comes to high Parnassus'

Of Hellicons pure stream drincke thou thy fill Stud There Madido may quaff the poets boule, And satisfie his thirstie dryed soule.

Mads. Nay, if I drinke of that pudled water of Hellicon in the companie of leane Lenten shadowes, let mee for a punishement converse with single beare see long as I live! This Parnassus and Hellicon are but the fables of the poets there is noe true Parnassus but the third lofte in a wine taverne, noe true Hellicon but a cup of browne Will youe travell quicklie to Parnassus? doe bastard but carie youre drie feet into some drie taverne, and straight the drawer will bid youe to goe into the Halfe Moone or the Rose, that is into Parnassus, then call for a cup of pure Hellicon, and he will bringe youe a cup of pure hypocrise, that will make youe speake leap inge lines and dauncinge periodes. Why, give mee but a quart of burnt sacke by mee, and if I doe not with a pennie worth of cantiles make a better poeme than Kinsaders Satyrs, Lodge's Fig for Monius, Bastard's Epigrams, Leichfild's Trimming of Nash, Ile give my heade to anie good felowe to make a memento mora of! O the genius of xijd! A quart will indite manic livelie lines in an houre, while an ould drousie Aca demicke, an old Stigmaticke, an ould sober Dromeder, toiles a whole month and often scratcheth his witts' head for the bringings of one miserable period into the worlde! If therefore you be good felowes or wise felowes, travell noe farther in the craggie way to the fained Parnassus, returne whome with mile, and wee will hire our studies in a taverne, and ere longe not a poste in Paul's churchyarde but shall be acquainted with our writings.

Philom Nay then, I see thy wit in drincke is drounde, Wine doth the beste parte of thy soule confounde

Stud. Let Parnass be a fond phantasticke place, Yet to Parnassus Ile hould on my pace But tell mee, Madido, how camest thou to this ile?

Made Well, He tell youe, and then see if the phisicke of good counsel will worke upon youre bodies. I tooke shippinge at Qui milit discipulus, and sailed to Propria quae maribus, then came to 4s in praesenti, but with great danger, for there are certaine people in this cuntrie caled schoolmaisters, that take passingers and sit all day whippinge pence out of there tayls, these men tooke mee prisoner, and put to death at leaste three hundred rodes upon my backe. Henc traveled I into the land of Sin taxis, a land full of joyners, and from thenc came I to Provolia, a litell iland, where are men of 6 feete longe, which were never mentioned in Sir John Mandefilde's cronicle. Hence did I set up my unluckie feete in this ile

D de 'ad, where I can see nothinge but idees and phan to may, as oone as I came hither I began to reade lemm ms mapp, Dial chia est, Co., then the slovenhell nave presented mee with such an unsavone worde that I dare not name it unless I had some frankensence reade to performe voure noses with after. Upon this I threw away the mapp in a chafe, and came home, cursing my these head that woulde suffer my headless fecte to take such a tedfods journey.

Prilone The harder and the craggier is the waye The joy will be more full another day Ofte pleasure got with paine wee dearlie deeme, Things dearlie boughte are had in great esteeme

Made Come on, Come on, Tullic's sentences! Leave your pulinge of prouerbs, and hearken to him that knowes whats good for youe. If you have anic care of your eyes, blinde them not with goinge to Parnassus, if you love youre feete, blister them not in this craggie waye. State with mee, and one pinte of wine shall inspire youe with more with than all they nine muses. Come on! He lead you to a meme companie!

Stad Fie, Philomusus! 'gin thy loitinge feet To faint and tire in this so faire a waie? Fish marchant for a base inglorious prize hears not with ship to plowe the ocean, And shall not wee for learnings glorious meede To Parnass hast with swallowe winged speede?

Patlom. I'frithe, Studioso, I was almost wonne To cleave unto yonder wett phantasticke crewe! I & the pinte pott is an oratoure! The burnt sacke made a sweet oration Againste Appollo and his followers, Discourate howe schollers unregarded walke, Like threedbare impecunious animals, Whiles servinge men doe swagger it in silks, and each earth creepinge peasant russet coate Is in requeste for his well lined pouche Tolde us howe this laborious pilgrimage Is wonte to eate mens marrowes, drye there bloude, And make them seem leant shadowles pale ghostes. This counsell made mee have a staggeringe minde. Untill I sawe there beastlic bezolinge, There drowned soules, there idle meriment. Voyde of sounde solace and true hartes content And now I love my pilgrimage the more, I love the Muses better than before, But tell mee, what lande do wee travell in? Mee thinks it is a pleasante fertile soil.

In the second part of the Returne Ingenioso and Judicio discuss Spenser, and Ingenioso gives his 'cersure' in these lines

A streeter swan than ever sung in Poe,
A shriller in shtingale than ever blest.
The prouder groses of selfe admiring Rome.
Bitthe was each vally, and each shepheard proud.
While he did chaunt his rurale ministralsie.
Attentive was full many a dainty care.
Att, hearer hung upon his melting tong,
While sveetly of the Faiery Queene he sung,
While to the waters fall I e tuned her faire,
And in each larke engraved Elizaes name.

Thomas Dekker, born in London about 1579, was a most prolific dramatic author, but only a few of his plays were printed. His life was irregular, and he spent some years in the King's Bench and other prisons as a prisoner for debt. In 1600 he published The Shoeheard of in 1637 maker's Holiday, or the Gentle Craft, and The Pleasant Comedy of Old Fortunatus The first of these pieces is one of the most entertaining of the old comedies, though it is based on the incredible assumption that a soldier, nobly born, has deserted an important military command in the French wir and become a Dutch speaking journeyman to a London shoemaker on the very slender chance that, being thus in London, he may prosecute his suit to the Lord Mayor's daughter. But the ricy, somewhat Falstaffian, talk of Simon Eyrc and his journeymen is the feature of the play, sometimes inconsequent rattle, sometimes pithy sense when the Lord Mayor says to Simon, 'Ha, lia, ha! I had rather than a thousand pounds I had an heart but half so light as yours,' the shoemaker replies, 'Why, what should I do, my Lord? pound of care pays not a dram of debt. Hum, let's be merry whiles we are young old age, such and sugar will steal upon us ere we be aware.' Forturatus, the second comedy, abounds in poetry of Dekker's next play was Satiromaster rire beauty (1602), which held up to indicule Ben Jonson, with whom he had collaborated and quarrelled. 1603 Dekker published a pamphlet, The Wonderful Year, which gives a heart-rending account of the plague In the very unusing tract, The Bachelor's Banquet, he describes the ills of henpecked hus-His most powerful writing is in The Honest Whore (1604, Part 11 1630), an uncompromising picture of contemporary manners which at times be Middleton seems to have comes prinfully realistic assisted Dekker in the first part. With Webster he wrote the Famous History of Sir Thomas Wyat, Westward Ho, and Vortnward Ho Bellman of London (1608) pamphlet gives a lively account of London vagabonds, and the subject is pursued in Lanthorn and Candlelight (1608) In both of these works Dekker made a free use of A Caveat or Warering for Commen Cursciors Vulgarely called Vagabones, published in 1566 or 1567 by Thomas Harman, a Kentish squire, and accordingly did not escape the charge of plagiarism In The Gull's Hornbook (1609) the life of a town gallant is racily depicted after a German model. The brisk comedy, The Roaring Girl (1611), is partly by Dekker, but chiefly by Middleton. With Massinger he wrote the Virgin Martyr, Lamb was doubtless right in ascribing to Dekker the The Sun's Darling is most beautiful scene (II 1) partly by Ford. The Whore of Rabylon (1607) is a coarsely vehement exhibition of Protestantism by way of allegory on the Spanish Armida. A powerful tragedy, The Witch of Edmonton (post humously published in 1658), was written by Dekker, Ford, and (probably) Rowley (see below at page 478) Charles Lamb says Dekker has poetry enough for anything, Mr A H Bullen thinks 'his best plays rank with the masterpieces of the Elizabethan drim i,' and Mr Swinburne finds the 'wild wood notes of passion and fancy and pathos in Dekker's best moments' remind him of Shakespeare, while Dr Ward holds that, spite of his lyrical gift, his humour, and his pathos, he lacks distinction, and is limited in inventive imagination, rude in form, and coarse in thought. In the Poclaster Jonson, in the character of Horice, very pointedly satirised Dekker and Marston, charging Dekker with urrogancy, impudence, and other faults. In Dekkers reply there is naturally more raillers and abuse than wit or poetry, but it was well received by the play-going public

Horace is thus amusingly introduced as in the act of concocting in ode

Horace by-and by complains that his lines were often maliciously misconstrued and misapplied, complacently remarking

The error is not mine, but in their eye That cannot take proportions.

Dekker, happily enough, makes his Crispinus reply

Horace, Horace,
To stand within the shot of galling tongues
Proves not your guilt, for could we write on paper
Made of those turning leaves of heaven, the clouds,
Or speak with angels' tongues, yet wise men know That some would shake the head, though saints should sing,

Some snakes must hiss, because they're born with sting

Do we not see fools laugh at heaven and mock
The Maker's workmanship? Be not you grieved
If that which you mould fair, upright, and smooth,
Be screwed awry, made crooked, lame, and vile,
By racking comments and calumnious tongues.
So to be bit it rankles not, for Innocence
May with a feather brush off the foul wrong
But when your dastard wit will strike at men
In corners, and in riddles fold the vices
Of your best friends, you must not take to heart
If they take off all gilding from their pills,
And only offer you the bitter core

Delker's Honest Whore was enthusiastically prused by Hazlitt, as combining 'the simplicity of prose with the graces of poetry', 'simplicity and extravagance, homeliness and quaintness, tragedy and comedy'. Passages like the following, spoken by a long suitering husband whose patience has been sore taxed by a capricious wife, are memorable.

Duke What comfort do you und in being so calm?

There is something like Marlowe in much of Dekker's blank verse, something Shakespearean in some turns of his thought, and single phrasis linger in the memory—'O what a heaven is love' O what a hell'' 'Honest labour bears a lovely face'

Of Dekker's prose tracts and works, as various in subject as descriptions of the plague in London or of the rogueries of horse dealers, and highly devotional exercises, the best known is The Gull's Hornbook (1609), containing descriptions of the manners and customs of the times. This work is largely indebted to Dedekind's Grobianus (Frankfort, 1549), a Latin satire on drunkenness and the debaucheries of the time, translated into German rhyming couplets and expanded by Scheidt in 1557 Dekker had translated part of the Latin version into English verse, but, on reflection, not liking the subject, he says, he 'altered the shape, and of a Dutchman fashioned a mere Englishman,' assuming the character of a guide to the fashionable follies of the town, but only on purpose to ridicule them

The Old World and the New weighed together

Good clothes are the embroidered trappings of pride, and good cheer the very ervngo root 1 of gluttony, so that fine backe and ful bellies are coach horses to two of the seven deadly sins, in the boots of which coach Lechery and Sloth sit like the waiting maid. In a most desperate state therefore do tailors and cooks stand by means of their offices, for both these trades are apple squires? to that couple of sins. The one invents more fantastic fashions than France hath worn since her first stone was laid, the other more lickerish epicurean dishes than were ever served up to Gallonius's 3 table. Did man, think you, come wrangling into the world about no better matters, than all his lifetime to make privy searches in Birchin Lane for whalebone doublets, or for pies of nightingales' tongues in Heliogabalus's kitchen? No, no, the first suit of apparel that ever mortal man put on came neither from the mercer's shop nor the merchant's warehouse Adam's bill would have been taken then, sooner than a knight's bond now, yet was he great in nobody's books for satin and velvets silkworms had something else to do in those days than to set up looms, and be free of the weavers, his breeches were not so much worth as King Stephen's, that cost but a poor noble, for Adam's holyday hose and doublet were of no better stuff than plain fig leaves, and Eve's best gown of the same piece there went but a pair of shears between them. An antiquary in this town has yet some of the powder of those leaves dried to show Tailors then were none of the twelve companies their hall, that now is larger than some dorpes among the Netherlands, was then no bigger than a Dutch butcher's shop they durst not strike down their customers with large bills. Adam cared not an apple paring for all their lousy hems. There was then neither the Spanish slop, nor the skipper's galligaskin, the Danish sleeve sagging down like a Welsh wallet, the Italian's close strosser, 3 nor the French standing collar your treblequadruple dadahan ruffs, nor your stiff necked rabatos, 6 that have more arches? for pride to row under than can stand under five London bridges, durst not then set themselves out in print, for the patent for starch could by no means be signed Fashions then was counted a disease, and horses died of it but now, thanks to folly, it is held the only rare physic, and the purest golden asses live upon it

As for the diet of that Saturnian age, it was like their attire, homely A salad and a mess of leek porridge was a dinner for a far greater man than ever the Iurk was. Potato-pies and custards stood like the sinful suburbs of cookery, and had not a wall so much as a handful high built round about them. There were no daggers then, nor no chairs. Crookes's ordinary, in those parsimonious days, had not a capon's leg to throw at a dog. O golden world! The suspicious Venetian carved not his meat with a silver pitchfork, neither did the sweet toothed Englishman shift a dozen of trenchers at one meal, Piers Ploughman laid the cloth, and Simplicity brought in the voider How wonderfully is the world altered! And no marvel; for it has lain sick almost five thousand years, so that it is no more like the old theatre du monde than old Paris Garden is like the king's garden at Paris

Being weary with sailing up and down alongst these shores of Barbaria, here let us cast our anchor, and nimbly leap to land in our coasts, whose fresh air shall be so much the more pleasing to us, if the ninnyhammer, whose perfection we labour to set forth, have so much foolish wit left him as to choose the place where to suck in, for that true humorous gallant that desires to pour himself into all fashions, if his ambition be such to excel even compliment itself, must as well practise to diminish his walks as to be various in his salads, curious in his tobacco, or ingenious in the trussing up of a new Scotch hose, all which virtues are excellent, and able to main tain him, especially if the old worm eaten farmer, his father, be dead, and left him five hundred a year only to keep an Irish hobby,2 an Irish horseboy, and himself like a gentleman. He therefore that would strive to fashion his legs to his silk stockings, and his proud gait to his broad garters, let him whist down these observations.

Your mediterranean isle³ is then the only gallery wherein the pictures of all your true fashionate and complemental gulls are and ought to be hung up Into that gallery carry your neat body, but take heed you pick out such an hour when the main shool of islanders are swimming up and down. And first observe your doors of entrance, and your exit, not much unlike the players at the theatres—keeping your decorums, even in phantasticality. As for example—if you prove to be a northern gentleman, I would wish you to pass through the north door, more often especially than any of the other, and so, according to your countries, take note of your entrances.

Now for your venturing into the walk. Be circumspect and wary what pillar you come in at, and take heed in any case, as you love the reputation of your honour, that you avoid the serving man's log,4 and approach not within five fathom of that pillar, but bend your course directly in the middle line, that the whole body of the church may appear to be yours, where, in view of all, you may publish your suit in what manner you affect most, either with the slide of your cloak from the one shoulder, and then you must, as 'twere in anger, suddenly natch at the middle of the inside, if it be taffeta at the least, and so by that means your costly lang a Lewrayed, or else by the pretty advantage of compliment. But one note by the way do I especially woo you to, the reglect of which makes many of our b llants cheap and ordinary, that by no means you be seen above four terms, but in the fifth make yourself away, c'her in some of the seamsters' shops, the new tobacco office, or amongst the booksellers, where, if you canno read, exercise your smoke, and inquire who has a rit against this divine weed, &c. For this with dra ving yourself a little will much benefit your suit, which else by too long walking, would be stale to the hole spectators, but howsoever, if Paul's jacks 6 be once up with their elbovs, and quarrelling to strike eleven, as soon as ever the clock has parted them, and ended the fray with his hammer, let not the Duke's gallery contain you any longer, but pals away apace in open view, in which departure, if by chance you either encounter, or aloof off throw your inquisitive eye upon any knight or aquire, being your familiar, salute him not by his name of Sir such a one, or so, but call him Ned, or facl, &c. This will set off your estimation with great men, and if, though there be a dozen companies Letween you, 'tis the better he call aloud to you, for that is most genteel, to know where he shall find you at two o'clock, tell him at such an ordinary, or such, and be sure to name those that are dearest, and whither none but your gallants resort. After dinner you may appear again, having translated yourself out of your La lish cloth cloak into a light furkey grogram, if you ha c that happiness of shifting, and then be seen, for a turn or two, to correct your teeth with some quill or silver instrument, and to cleanse your gums with a wrought handkerchief, it skills not whether you dined or no that is best known to your stomach, or in what place you dired, though it were with cheese, of your own mother's making, in your chamber, or study

No. if you chance to be a gallant not much crossed amon, citizens, that is, a gallant in the mercer's books, exilted for satin, and velvets, if you be not so much blessed to be crossed (as I hold it the greatest blessing in the world to be great in no man's books), your Paul's wals is your only refuge the Duke's tomb? is a sanc tuary, and will keep you alive from worms and land rais that long to be feeding on your careass, there you may spend your legs in winter a whole afternoon, converse, plot, laugh, and talk anything, jest at your creditor, even to his face, and in the evening, even by lamp light, steal out, and so cozen a whole covey of abonimable catchpoles.

For do but con der that an excellent thing sleep is to so the timable a je tel, that, if a tyrant would cave his cross for an lours slumber, it cannot be bought of to trainful a shape is it that, though a man live with an empre. In heart cannot be at quiet till he leaves her embracements to be at rest with the other year, so greatly are we indebted to this kinsman of death, that we owe the better tributary half of our life to him, and there is good cause why we should do so, for sleep is that golden chain that ties health and our bodies together. Who complains of want, of wounds, of cares, of great men's oppressions, of captivity, whilst he sleepeth? Beggars in their beds take as much pleasure as kings. Can we therefore surfeit on this delicate ambrosia? Can we drink too much of that, whereof to taste too little, tumbles us into a churchyard, and to use it but indifferently throws us into Bediam? No, no Look upon Endymion, the moon's minion, who slept threescore and fifteen years, and was not a hair the worse for it?

Dekker's plays were collected by R. H. Shepherd in 4 vols. (1873), and his pamphlets in 5 vols of Dr Grosart's 'Huth Library (1884-86). Mr Rhys edited five plays for the 'Mermand Series (1887)' See Mr Swinburne's Essay (1887)

John Webster.—The name of John Webster is the type of the obscurity which broads over so many of the poets of the Elizabethan and Jacobean There is no one, of equal eminence, in the range of English literature of whom so little is Not a positive fact, not a reminiscence, not an anecdote, brings this shadowy figure before us for a moment, and we have to construct our impression of him entirely from his works onc born free of the Merchant-Tailors' Company,' according to Gildon, who wrote nearly a century later, he was clerk of St Andrew's parish in Hol born It is thought that he began to write for the stage in 1602, the first examples of his work which we know that we possess are the 'additions' he made to Marston's Malcontent in 1604, of these the fine 'induction' is the most notable. It has been supposed that he joined Dekker in writing Westward Ho in 1603 and Northward Ho in 1605, but these comedies were not printed until 1607 In the first of these Dekker's genius is predominant, the second, which is written in harsh prose, offers nothing characteristic of either poet. Webster was associated with Dekker in 1607 in the tragical history of Sir Thomas Wyat Casar's Fall and The Two Harpies, still earlier collaborations, have disappeared altogether

It is conjectured that The White Devil, or the Life and Death of Vittoria Corombona, was acted in 1608, but it was not printed until 1612. It was followed on the boards by Appens and Verginia (published in 1654), by The Devil's Law case (published in 1623), and The Duchess of Malfi (probably acted in 1612, although not printed until 1623) These four are the plays upon which Webster's reputation is supported, and they belong to the period immediately succeeding upon the retirement of Shakespeare to the country. By the time of Shakespeare's death Webster had in all probability ceased to produce dramatic work of importance. The City pageant of 1624 was finvented and written by John Webster, merchanttailor,' and he is supposed to be the cloth-worker of that name who died in 1625 It will be seen that this brief account is full of contestable matter, yet it contains all that can even be safely guessed as to the life of Webster (For his debt to Sidney's Arcadia, see Notes and Queries, Sept -Oct. 1904.)

Webster achieved little success in his own age, and was the object of no curiosity to the next. He was unknown until the beginning of the nineteenth century, when Lamb and Hazlitt called attention to his merit. Since that time the fame of Webster has been more and more assured, and he holds a place below none of Shakespeare's satellites except Ben Jonson and Marlowe. Indeed, in the elements of pure tragedy he comes nearest to the master himself, and the Duchess of Malfi is unquestion ably the most elevated tragic poem in the language not written by the pen of Shakespeare. 'No poet,' says Mr Swinburne, ascending to a still higher flight of praise, 'has ever so long and so successfully sustained at their utmost height and intensity the expressed emotions and the united effects of terror and pity' This is, indeed, the main quality of Webster, its subtlety of pathetic horror hardly critical, however, in any comparative consideration of this poet, to omit to acknowledge his dramatic shortcomings His plays are exceedingly ill constructed, most of them are mere clusters of scenes, violently put together, and eked out with dumb show, in a manner so primitive that we seem to have gone back a generation, and to be listening to a poet ignorant of what Shakespeare, and even Jonson and Fletcher, had added to the capacities of stage effect

A bewildering inequality of execution is charactenstic of every play of Webster's, this is less marked in Appius and Virginia, and perhaps in the Duchess of Malfi, than in the others We are told that he was an extremely slow and painstaking writer, so that this apparent want of skill is not the result of heedlessness But it invades even his versification, which is by turns among the best and among the worst which has come down to us from The subjects which the early seventeenth century attracted Webster were all of an Italian source and character, he was attracted by the vehement types and issues provoked by a condition of society at once highly civilised and insolently lawless found exactly what he wanted in several contem porary stories of intrigue and murder in the courts He was perhaps a poet who by force of circumstances was forced on to the stage, rather than a born dramatist, for he seems to crowd too many incidents into each scene, too much variety of psychological passion into each character, for the simplicity of dramatic action. It will be felt by most unprejudiced readers that the scenes of horror which close his two great tragedies have been too readily applauded by Lamb and those who have succeeded him. It is, surely, not in the somersaults of these scuffling and yelling marionettes that Webster does real justice to his noble genius as a tragic poet. He is often a sort of exalted Mrs Radcliffe in his unrestrained affection for all the nightmares of romance, but it is not for | I have kept this twenty year, and every day his poisoned daggers and clanking chains that we follow him spell-bound.

Webster owes the exalted station which has at length been successfully claimed for him by his admirers to his penetration into the troubled sources of human emotion In the White Devil and the Duchess of Malfi, his two great tragical poems, this quality is seen displayed with least reserve. It saves Webster from the mere bloodand-thunder rhetoric of some of his contemporaries because it displays to him those tender and pitiful incidents which spring up like flowers along the road of crime, and not merely lighten its horror, but add to it an exquisite pathos The fourth act of the Duchess of Malfi, where the fortitude of the Duchess is put to so many awful and unprecedented tests, and the terror and pity of the audience is augmented at every change of scene, is one of the most amazing passages of funtastic tragedy ever composed in any language. It reaches its climax in the dark colloquy between Bosola, disguised as an old man, and the hunted woman who is 'Duchess of Malfi still' The same effects, in cruder form, are to be met with in the White Devil, where the demons drag Vittoria downward, with her last cry,

'I am lost forever!'

ringing in our ears This penetration and inventive power concentrated on violent emotion give Webster a unique place among poets He would be still more amazing than he is were it possible for us to believe that he was not influenced by the But although he owes tragedies of Shakespeare much to this overwhelming predecessor, Webster has a character among English poets entirely his own, he is the highest expression that we possess of the sinister pursuit of moral beauty in the literature of crime and horror

Bosola Look you, here's the picce from which 'twasta'en. He doth present you this sad spectacle, That, now you know directly they are dead,

Hereafter you may wisely cease to grieve

For that which cannot be recovered

Duch There is not between heaven and earth one wish I stay for after this (From Act IV sc. L)

Afterwards, in aggravation of his cruelty, the brother sends a troop of madmen from the hospital to make a concert round the duchess in prison After they have danced and sung Bosola enters, disguised as an old man

Duch Is he mad too?

Bos I am come to make thy tomb

Duch Ha! my tomb?

Thou speak'st as if I lay upon my death bed, Gasping for breath Dost thou perceive me sick?

Bos Yes, and the more dangerously, since thy sickness is insensible

Duch Thou art not mad sure dost know me?

Bos Yes.

Duch Who am I?

Bos Thou art a box of worm seed, at best but a salvatory of green mummy What's this flesh? a little crudded milk, fantastical puff paste Our bodies are weaker than those paper prisons boys use to keep flies in, more contemptible, since ours is to preserve earthworms. Didst thou ever see a lark in a cage? Such is the soul in the body this world is like her little turf of grass, and the heaven o'er our heads, like her look ing glass, only gives us a miserable knowledge of the small compass of our prison.

Duch Am not I thy duchess?

Bos Thou art some great woman, sure, for riot begins to sit on thy forehead, clad in gray hairs, twenty years sooner than on a merry milkmaid's Thou sleepest worse than if a mouse should be forced to take up her lodging in a cat's ear a little infant that breeds its teeth should it lie with thee, would cry out as if thou wert the more unquiet bedfellow

Duch I am Duchess of Walfi still

Bos That makes thy sleeps so broken Glories, like glow worms, afar off shine bright, But, looked to near, have neither heat nor light.

Duch. Thou art very plain. Bor My trade is to flatter the dead, not the living

I am a tomb-maker Duch And thou comest to make my tomb?

Bos Yes.

In mere superfluity of maghtiness the women seek their own dishonour, and a stage 'Puritan' eagerly agrees to cirry out every illains proposed to him. But we may say of his brave bless'd decease, He died in war and yet he died in peace.

There is a comple redition of Cyril Tourneur by Churton Collins (107) at I of the two plays with two of Websters, by J. A. Symon is ("Merican Series 1 85).

Thomas Heywood, himself an actor, was the most indefatigable of dramatic writers. He had, as he informs his readers, 'an entire hand, or at least a maine finger,' in two hundred and twenty He wrote also a long series of other works in prose or verse, or in both, including translations from Lucian and other classics, defences of the stage, books of biography and theology, epitaphs and elegies. Most of the few facts we know about Heywood's life and history have been gleaned from his own writings and the dates of his plays time of his birth is not known, but he seems to have been born about 1575, he was a native of Lincolnshire, and is said to have been a fellow of Peterhouse, Cambridge, he wrote his first play about 1600, and he continued to exercise his ready pen down to the year 1641 In one of his prologues he adverts to the various sources of his multifarious labours

To give content to this most curious age,
The gods themselves we've brought down to the stage
And figur'd them in planets, made even hell
Deliver up the Furies, by no spell Saving the Muses' rapture further, we Have traffick'd by their help, no history
We have left unrifled, our pens have been dipt,
As well in opening each hid manuscript,
As tracts more vulgar, whether read or sung
In our domestic or more foreign tongue.
Of fairy elves, nymphs of the sea and land,
The lawns and groves, no number can be scann'd
Which we've not given feet to.

Charles Lamb's startling epithet for Heywood, 'a sort of prose Shakespeare,' is, even when qualified by Lamb's rather serious deduction-'but we miss the poet'-usually treated as one of his least happy appreciations, as a misleading paradox bred of the kindly critic's enthusiasm for his old dramatists, emphatic almost in proportion as they were neglected by the world Lamb further says of Heywood 'He possessed not the imagination of Shakespeare, but in all those qualities which gained for Shakespeare the attribute of gentle he was not inferior to him-generosity, courtesy, temperance in the depths of his passion, sweetness, in a word, and gentleness, Christianism, and true hearty Anglicism of feelings shaping that Christianism, shine throughout his beautiful writings in a manner more conspicuous than in those of Shakespeare' This is high praise, but Mr Addington Symonds declares 'the verdict is in many points a just one Heywood, while he lacks the poetry, philosophy, deep insight into nature, and consummate art of Shakespearethose qualities, in a word, which render Shakespeare supreme among dramatic poets-has a sincerity, a tenderness of pathos, and an instinctive perception of nobility that distinguish him among the playwrights of the seventeenth century Dekker, he wins our confidence and love. We keep a place in our affection for his favourite characters.' And Mr Symonds calls Heywood's masterpiece, A Woman Killed with Kindness, 'the finest bourgeois tragedy of our Elizabethan literature.' Yet it is admitted that his first play, The Four Prentices of London, is absurd, and justly open to the caricature of it in Fletcher's Knight of the Burning Pestle, that his historical plays are mere chronicles hastily and perfunctorily dramatised to supply the immediate wants of the stage, that some of his plays are feeble and in bad taste, that he lacks the highest artistic instinct, and that in all his work-including his domestic, his romantic, and his classical or pseudo classical plays—he is almost everywhere careless, and never produced one play reasonably perfect in dramatic form or any character self consistent throughout. He resembled Shakespeare, certainly, in writing his plays to be acted rather than read. and in being strangely careless as to what became of them in the long-run With Greene he was one of the earliest of English professional writers for the press, and he was not seldom a mere hackwriter, he wrote too freely, too constantly, and too much it is recorded of him that, somewhat like Anthony Trollope, 'he obliged himself to write a sheet every day for several years together' Ready invention, a certain lightness of touch, and directness were his gifts rather than creative power or the art of breathing into his characters the breath of life. His best things are single scenes, passages, or fragments But he is very strong in his pictures of English home life, of the ways of English country gentlemen, and of English sailors His pathos is sometimes forced sentiment, but is sometimes marvellously simple, true, and effective. He usually mixed prose and verse, and his English style is generally free and natural, though, like many contemporaries, he liked to set out his story with pedantic phrases and fantastic coinages There is genuine poetry here and there in most of his pieces His songs are many of them fresh, flowing, and musical, and linger in the memory

Of Heywood's huge dramatic library, only twentyfour plays have come down to us, the best of which perhaps are A Woman Killed with Kindness (1603),
The Rape of Lucrece (1608), The Fair Maid of the Exchange (1607), The English Traveller (1633),
A Challenge for Beauty (1636), Love's Mistress
(1636), and The IVise IVoman of Hogsdon (1638)
Edward IV follows pretty closely the old ballads of the 'Tanner of Tamworth' and of 'Jane Shore'
The Rape of Lucrece, spite of its subject, is so little classical in tone that one of the songs, for which it is chiefly noteworthy, begins

Shall I woo the lovely Molly, She s so fair, so fat, so jolly?

and another, in imitation-Dutch gibberish, has the eminently unclassical refrain

Skerry merry vip, Skerry merry vap

In The Fair Maid of the West (1617, acted 1631), and in Forture o; Landar d Sea (1655), partly written b. William Royler, he gives spirited descriptions of scaughts Love's Mistress (1636), the tale of Cupid and Psyche, is a sort of masque In The Royall King and Loyill Subject (1637) the doctrine of passive obedience to kingly authority is The Captives, discarried to extreme lengths covered by Mr Bullen, was printed by him in The Late Lancashire Witches, partly by Richard Brome, is farcical and rather vulgar Heywood was also the author of an historical poem, Troja Britannica (1609), an Apology for Actors (1612). Nine Bookes of Various History concerntuge Women (1624), a poem in folio, The Hierarchie of the Blessed Angells (1635), a volume of rhymed translations from Lucian, Erasmus, Ovid, &c, various pageants, tracts, and treatises, and The L fe of Imbrosius Werlin (1641) In virtue of his General History of Women, 'containing the Lives of the most Holy and Profane, the most I amous and Infimous in all Ages' (1624, 2nd ed 1657), and his Exemplary Lives of Aine the most Worthy Women of the World (1640), Heywood may be regarded as the father of all those who compile 'Lives of Twelve Bad Men' and 'Lives of I welve Good Women' -sometimes thought a very modern enterprise.

The following extracts will show Heywood at his best in trigedy, and will explain the title of his masterpiece, A Woman Killed with Kindness Frankford, discovering that he has been wronged by his wife and his friend, instead of slaving them both as they expected, makes an unusually gentle return (note the kindly 'O Nan!' to which he by and by recurs)

Mrs Frankford O, by what words, what title, or what Shall I entreat your pardon? Pardon! Oh! I am as far from hoping such sweet grace, As I ucifer from heaven. To call you husband-O me mos wretched! I have lost that name I am no more your wife.

He returns with CRANWELL. She falls on her knees

Fran My words are register'd in heaven already With patience hear me I'll not martyr thee, Nor mark thee for a strumpet, but with usage Of more humility torment thy soul, And kill thee even with kindness.

Cranwell Mr Frankford

Fran Good Mr Cranwell -- Woman, hear thy judg-

Go make thee ready in thy best attire, Take with thee all thy gowns, all thy apparel Leave nothing that did ever call thee mistress, Or by whose sight, being left here in the house, I may remember such a woman was Choose thee a bed and hangings for thy chamber, Take with thee everything which hath thy mark, And get thee to my manor seven miles off, Where live, 'tis thine, I freely give it thee My tenants by shall furnish thee with wains To carry all thy stuff within two hours, No longer will I limit thee my sight Choose which of all my servants thou likest best, And they are thine to attend thee

Mrs Fran A mild sentence

Fran But as thou hopest for heaven, as thou believest Thy name's recorded in the book of life, I charge thee never after this sad day To see me or to meet me, or to send By word, or writing, gift, or otherwise, To move me, by thyself, or by thy friends, Nor challenge any part in my two children So farewell, Van! for we will henceforth be As we had never seen, ne'er more shall see

Fran Come, take your coach, your stuff, all must along

Servants and all make ready, all be gone. It was thy hand cut two hearts out of one.

(From Act IV sc. vi.)

Ultimately the unhappy woman dies of revived tenderness and remorse, with the forgiving kiss of her husband on her lips

The following description of Psyche, from Love's Mistress, is in his more elaborate manner

Admetus Welcome to both in one! Oh, can you tell What fate your sister hath?

Astro-he and Petrea Psyche is well.

Adm So among mortals it is often said
Children and friends are well when they are dead

Astroche But Psyche lives, and on her breath attend Delights that far surmount all earthly joy,
Music, sweet voices, and ambrosian fare,
Winds, and the light winged creatures of the air,
Clear channeled rivers, springs, and flowery meads
Are proud when Psyche wantons on their streams,
When Psyche on their rich embroidery treads,
When Psyche gilds their crystal with her beams.
We have but seen our sister, and, behold!
She sends us with our laps full brimmed with gold.

Morning Ditty from 'Lucrece'

Pack, clouds, away, and welcome day,
With night we banish sorrow
Sweet air, blow soft, mount, lark, aloft,
To give my love good morrow
Wings from the wind to please her mind,
Notes from the lark I'll borrow
Bird, prune thy wing, nightingale, sing,
To give my love good morrow
To give my love good morrow,
Notes from them all I'll borrow

Wake from thy nest, robin redbreast,
Sing, birds, in every furrow,
And from each bill let music shrill
Give my fair love good morrow
Blackbird and thrush in every bush—
Stare, linnet, and cock sparrow—
You pretty elves, amongst yourselves,
Sing my fair love good morrow
To give my love good morrow,
Sing, birds, in every furrow

Song from the 'Fair Maid of the Exchange.'

Ye little birds that sit and sing
Amidst the shady valleys,
And see how Phillis sweetly walks
Within her garden alleys,
Go, pretty birds, about her bower,
Sing, pretty birds, she may not lower
Ah me, muthinks I see her frown!
Ye pretty wantons, warble.

Go tell her through your chirping bulls
As you by me are bidden,
To her is only known my love,
Which from the world is hidden,
Go, pretty birds, and tell her so,
See that your notes strain not too low,
For still methinks I see her frown!
Ye pretty wantons, warble

Go tune your voices' harmony,
And sing I am her lover,
Strain loud and sweet, that every note
With sweet content may move her,
And she that hath the sweetest voice,
Tell her I will not change my choice
Yet still methinks I see her frown!
Ye pretty wantons, warble

O fly make haste, see, see, she falls
Into a pretty slumber,
Sing round about her rosy bed
That waking she may wonder,
Say to her 'tis her lover true
That sendeth love to you, to you
And when you hear her kind reply,
Return with pleasant warblings.

Vivid similes, not always in the happiest taste, often occur, as in

My friend and I Like two chain bullets side by side will fly Through the jaws of death, and in

Astonishment, Fear, and amazement beat upon my heart, Even as a madman beats upon a drum

Mr Symonds has pointed out that Love's Mistress contains early specimens of classical burlesque

The boy by chance upon her fan had spilled A cup of nectar oh, how Juno swore 'I told my aunt I'd give her a new fan To let Jove's page be Cupid's serving man—hardly sounds like the style of 1636 It is rather startling to find in The Fair Maid of the Exchange—though Heywood is in nowise responsible for our surprise—that the 'amorous gallant,' who is far from careful of delicacy either in speech or deed, is called Bowdler—an odd example of the irony of history before the event!

A curious specimen of Heywood's miscellaneous work-interesting in various ways, though really a very poor specimen of metrical bookmaking-is The Hierarchie of the Blessed Angells (1635) of its name, this odd folio is much more detailed in its account of the unblessed angels, of diabolic possession, of enchantments, necromancy, astrology, white magic, black magic, levitation, unholy pacts with the devil, witchcraft, incubi and succubre, and the stories of 'magitions' such as Faust and Cornelius Agrippa. Satan's invisible kingdom is indeed displayed at greater length than the kingdom of grace. The work, usually called a poem, is really a disquisition in nine books, half of each book being in very wooden verse, followed by a 'theologicall, philosophicall, poeticall, historicall, apothegmaticall, hierogliphicall, and emblematicall' commentary, continuation, or expansion in excellent prose. The books are named after nine orders of celestial beings-Seraphim, Cherubim, Thrones, Dominations, Vertues, Powers, Principates, Arch angels, and Angels proper, following exactly the arrangement in Dionysius the Areopagite, De Calesti Hierarchia (compare Milton's favourite 'Thrones, dominations, princedoms, virtues, powers') wood's 'Lucifer charg'd with insolence and spleene' mentably suggests Milton's sons of 'Belial flown with insolence and wine,' and makes it likely that Milton knew Heywood's book, the plan of which The first book, for is carrordinarily clastic example, treats the arguments for the being of God, refutes at great length the 'tenents of Athersme and Saducisme, deals with false gods. idolates in general, and the 'malice of the divell' The second book discusses the nature of God, the Frinity, and the deity of Christ in such verses as the following

The sacred Scriptures are sufficient warrant Ly many texts to make the Trine apparant, As from the first creation we may prove—God did create, God said, the Spirit did more.
Create imports the Father, said the Sonne,
The Spirit that mored, the Holy Ghost—This done,
Come to the Gospell, to Saint Paul repaire,
Of him, through him, and for him all things are,
To whom be everlasting praise. Amen!
In which it is observed by Origen,
Of, through, and for three Persons to imply,
And the word him the Godhead's Unity

Room is found, in prose or verse, for discussing the creation of sun, moon, and stars, and their motions, the constellations, and the myths in vol cd, astrology, the creation of man and the fall of the angels, the fall of man, the redemption, and Scripture story, together with the torments of hell, sketches of the ancient philosophical systems, mediaval theology, Mahomet and his 'Alcaron,' the hideous superstition of the Ethnicks, Finlanders, Liplanders, and 'Bothnienses' Heywood's own views are supported by copious citations and trunslations from Homer, Lucian, Virgil, Mahomet, Avicenna, Abenzoar, the Jewish Rabbis, Albertus Magnus, Thomas Aquinas, Hermes Trismegistus, Dionysius the Arcopagite, Olaus Magnus, Dante, and hundreds of less known authors ('Hear Faustus Andrehmus, an excellent poet'l he says, meaning Andreling an Italian writer of Latin verse who died His (Itilian) quotations from Dante m 1518) prove him to have been one of the earliest English students of Dinte. And there is room not merely for innumerable blood curding witch stories, but for apparently any pleasing anecdote or sound observation that occurs to him, often utterly arrele a int to the argument in hand. Thus, apropos of a meditation on death, comes a singular glimpse of contemporary treatment of English poets

Win life's a Goale and Death end of the race, And thousand sundry wayes point to the place I or now the conqueror with the captive's spread. On one bare carth a on the common bed. The servint with the master, and the maid. Stretcht by her mistre a both their heads are laid. Up a a common pillor. B'inde Homer in the grave I es doubly darle, Asam t him no v base Joylus dares not barke.

From this he suddenly goes off to complain that, though Homer's fame is undisputed, in modern England 'impudent sycophants and ballading knaves' overbear 'meriting men'. Further, whereas 'past ages did the antient poets grace' by giving them their full style, often adding to their name the place of their birth or the nature of their work, so that with their worth encreast their stiles, the most grac'd with three names at least,' in England it is quite otherwise. Then he seems inconse quently to justify the usage. And after quoting George Buchanan on the poverty of poets, he grumbles that now 'the puny assumes the name of poet,' and shamelessly

Taskes such artists as have took degree
Before he was a fresh man, and because,
No good practitioner in the stage lawes,
He miss'd the applause he aim'd at, hee'l devise Another course his name to immortalise,
Imploring divers pens, failing in's owne,
To support that which others have cried down

Incapable poets and dramatists in his time, in fact, were not merely insolent to their seniors who had been moderately successful, but having failed themselves, had recourse to log-rolling, no less. This is the principal part of the excursus

Dodsley included only two of Heywood's plays (1744) The old Shakespeare Society printed a dozen (1842-51). Not till 1874 was there a complete edition of all the plays then known—twenty three —in 6 vols. by Mr Pearson The Captires as we have said, was printed by Mr Bullen in 1885. The Merimaid edition, edited by Mr Symonds (1888), contains tive plays. See also Symonds Shake speare's Predecessors, and Ward, History of the English Drama.

Robert Burton.

Robert Burton, the author of the Anatomy of Melancholy, was born at Lindley, in Leicestershire, 8th February 1577, entered Brasenose College, Oxford, in 1593, and in 1599 was elected student of Christ Church In 1614 he took his BD, and two years later was presented by his college to the vicarage of St Thomas at Oxford, and about 1630 by Lord Berkeley to the rectory of Segrave in his native county Both livings he kept 'with much ado to his dying day,' and appears to have continued all his life at Christ Church, where he died 25th January 1639, and was buried in Christ Church Cathedral death took place very near the time he had long since foretold by the calculation of his own nativity-for he believed in and practised the art of judicial astrology hence arose, as we learn from Anthony Wood, a false report that he had 'sent up his soul to heaven thro' a slip about his neck.' Burton is thus described by Wood 'He was an exact mathematician, a curious calcu lator of nativities, a general read scholar, a thro' paced philologist, and one that understood the surveying of lands well. As he was by many accounted a severe student, a devourer of authors, a melancholy and humorous [i.e. subject to 'the humours'] person, so by others, who knew him well, a person of great honesty, plain dealing, and charity I have heard some of the antients of Christ Church often say that his company was very merry, facete, and juvenile, and no man in his time did surpass him for his ready and dextrous interlarding his common discourses among them with verses from the pocts or sentences from classical authors, which being then all the fashion in the university made his company more acceptable.' Little is known of his life, but according to Bishop Kennet's Register and Caronich (1728), 'In an interval of Vapours he would be extremiely pleasant, and ruse Laughter in any Company Yet I have heard that nothing at list could make him laugh, but going down to the Bridge foot in Oxford, and hearing the Barge men scold and storm and swear at one another, it which he would set his Hands to his Sides, and laugh most profusely! There is, however, a strong presumption that the anecdote is a mythical transference to Burton of the idiosyncratic relaxation he says his prototype permitted himself (page 437)

The first edition of the Inatomy of Melancholy, by 'Democritus Junior' (1621), was in quarto, and four more editions in folio were published within the author's lifetime, each with successive alterations and additions. The final form of the book was the sixth edition (1651-52), printed from the author's annotated copy. It is divided into three divisions, each subdivided into sections, members, and subsections. Part I treats of the causes and symptoms of melancholy, Part II of the cure of melancholy, and Part III of love melancholy and religious melancholy. In the long and interesting preface, 'Democritus to the Reader,' Burton gives an account of himself and his studies, and is his own best critic 'I have laboriously collected this Cento out of divers Writers, and that sine injuria, I have wronged no authors, but given every man his own' Of his style he says 'I neglect phrases, and labor wholly to inform my reader's understand ing, and not to ple ise his ear, tis not my study or intent to compose neatly, which an Oritor requires, but to express myself readily and plainly as it happens So that as a River runs sometimes pre cipitate and swift, then dul and slow, now direct, then per ambages, now deep, then shallow, now muddy, then clear, now broad, then narrow, doth my stile flow now serious, then light, now comical, then satyrical, now more elaborate, then remisse, as the present subject required, or as it that time I was affected?

This stringe book is far more systematic than the superical reader is upt to imagine. It is indeed a farrago from all, even the most out of the wi, classical and mediaval writers, yet not one quolation out of ill his ponderous learning but lends a renath or illustration to his argument. Every page is marked by keen irony, profound and often gloomy humour and by strong and excellent ansa, while throughout the book there runs a deep undertone of carnestness that fits well with its concluding sentences, and at times rises into e grave cloquence of quite singular charm 'funtastic old great man' is certain of immortality as one of the greatest English writers Johnson said Burton's Anatomy of Welancholy was the only bool that ever tool him out of bed two hours sooner than he wished to rise, and Charles Lamb shows plainly its influence on his own style as well as in his direct imitation, the 'curious Fragments,' professedly extracted from Burton's Common Place Milton's L'Allegro and Il Penseroso owed much to 'The Author's Abstract of Melancholy' prensed (in crse) to his book, and Ferriar in 1798 pointed out to the world the indebtedness of Sterne Byron speaks of its great value as materials for literary conversation,' but Wood had long before pointed out this merit "I's a book so full of viriety of reading, that gentlemen who have lost their time and are put to a push for invention, may furnish themselves with matter for common or scholastical discourse and writing?

But in spite of Burton's prophylactic apology, Democritus has some right to complain of the use made of his name the learned recluse of Christ Church did not follow the best authoritics on Democritus, and would hardly have called himself 'Democritus Junior' had he fully realised how wide and deep was the gulf between himself and the philosopher of Abdera. meant by calling himself Democritus was that he laughed at the follies of mankind so happens that this tradition about the original Democritus is lite and unauthentic, so is the confitte one that opposes him, as 'the laughing philosopher,' to Heraclitus, 'the weeping philosopher' Democritus (senior) seems to have been a man of a healthy, happy disposition, who hilatuilly looked at the cheerful side of things the filse proverb is but a perversion of this fact Democritus Isushed, not because he was crustic, bitter, satirical, but bee cuse he was good humoured Democritus, the predecessor of Epicurus, was a thorough soing atomist—his gods were but aggre gations of atoms a degree or two more powerful thin men, and there is no design in naturewhereas Burton was an orthodox, if not perferved, Christian and Churchman Democritus was the greatest traveller of his time, Burton spent all his life in his college. Democritus learnt from living men, not from books, Burton was the very ling of book erms. But both were exceptionally safted, learned, good men, and Burton may be excused for follo in g the multitude in til-ing Democritus is characteristically 'a laugher at human follies' to be ranked with the Ecclesiast, with Buddhist sages, with Schopenhauer, and with Hartmann. He did not regard life as essentially and unre deemably evil the scholar who wrote to relieve his own depression, who devoted one great division of his work to the cure of melancholy, obviously regarded the miseries that do accompany and flow from love, hypochondriasis, superstition, mad ness, lealousy, and solitude as separable accidents of human nature, or aberrations that ought to be, and can be, guarded against 'He was a man sub ject to 'the vapours,' in short, and though between whiles cheerful enough, had the moody tempera ment which led him to dwell on the darker side of life, especially after he had constituted the Anatomy of Melancholy his life-work. And he set himself calmly, not unsympathetically, but candidly, learnedly, even facetiously, to anatomise humin folly and perversity To a man of his ingenuity it was possible to bring almost everything to bear on his pet subject, and hence in his great work we have the most marvellous olla body ula that exists in book form, yet a book with a very definite plan and an unmistakable purpose The multitudinous quotations, that look at times as if discharged at random from a series of commonplace books, are never wholly irrelevant any more than the frequent and amazing digressions, which are a feiture of the book And though the piles of citations make many of the sentences mordinately long, formless, and almost structurcless, Burton when he is writing 'out of his own head' writes tersely, smoothly, and melodiously beyond many of his contemporaries He is profoundly humorous in another sense thin Wood's, his grave and profound humour is, like Sir Thomas Browne's, a marked characteristic.

In the copious preface, 'Democritus to the Reader,' Burton explains his choice of a pseudonym or nom de guerre, and incidentally gives an interesting account of himself and his studies (we follow the text and spelling of the fifth edition of 1638)

Democritus, as he is described by Hippocrates and Lacrins, was a little wearish [withered] old man, very melancholy by nature, averse from company in his latter dates, and much given to solitarinesse, a famous philoso pher in his age, coavies with Socrates, wholly addicted to his studies at the last, and to a private life, writ many excellent works, a great divine, according to the divinitie of those times, an expert physician, a politician, an ex cellent mathematician, as Diacosmus and the rest of his works do witness. He was much delighted with the studies of husbandrie, saith Columella, and often I find him cited by Constantinus and others treating of that He knew the natures, differences of all beasts, plants, fishes, birds, and, as some say, could understand the tunes and voyces of them. In a word, he was omnifariam doctus, a general scholar, a great student, and, to the intent he might better contemplate, I find it related by some that he put out his eyes, and was in his old age voluntarily blinds, yet saw more than all Greece besides, and writ of evene subject. Wihil in toto opigeto natura de quo non scrifsit a man of an excellent wit, profound concert, and to attain knowledge the better, in his younger years he travelled to Egypt and Athens, to conferre with learned men, admired of some, despised of others. After a wandring life, he setled at Abdera, a town in Thrace, and was sent for thither to be their law maker, recorder, or town clerke, as some will, or as others, he was there bred and born Howsoever it was, there he lived at last in a garden in the suburbs, wholly betaking himself to his studies and a private life, saving that sometimes he would walk down to the haven, and laugh heartily at such varieties of ruliculous objects, which there he saw. Such a one was Democritus.

But, in the mean time, how doth this concerne me, or upon what reference doe I usurpe his habit? I confesse, indeed, that to compare my self unto him for ought I have yet said, were both impudencie and arrogancie. I do not presume to make any parallel. Antistat mihi millibus trecentis parvus sum, nullus sum, altum nec spiro, nec spero Yet thus much I will say of my self, and that I hope without all suspicion of pride or self conceit I have lived a silent, sedentary, solitary, private life, milit et Musis, in the university, as long almost as Yenocrates in Athens, ad senectam fere, to learne wisdome as he did, penned up most part in my studie for I have been brought up a student in the most flourishing colledge of Europe, augustissimo collegio, and can bragge with Jovius, almost, in ed luce domicilis Vaticani, totius orbis celeberrini, per 37 annos multa opportunaque didici, sor thirty years I have continued (having the use of as good libraries as ever he had) a scholar, and would be therefore loth either, by living as a drone, to be an unprofitable or unworthie member of so learned and noble a societie, or to write that which should be any way dishonourable to such a royall and ample foundation. Something I have done though by my profession a divine, yet turbine raptus ingenii, as he said, out of a running wit, an unconstant, unsetled mind, I had a great desire (not able to attain to a superficiall skill in any) to have some smattering in all, to be aliquis in omnibus, nullus in singulis, which Plato commends, out of him Lipsius approves and furthers, as fit to be imprinted in all curious wits, not to be a slave of one science, or dwell altogether in one subject, as most do, but to rove abroad, centum puer artium, to have an oare in every mans boat, to taste of every dish, and to sip of every cup, which, saith Mon taigne, was well performed by Aristotle, and his learned countrey man Adrian Furnebus This roving humor (though not with like successe) I have ever had, and, like a ranging spaniell that barks at every bird he sees, leaving his game, I have followed all, saving that which I should, and may justly complain and truly, que ubique est, nusquam est, which Gesner did in modesty, that I have read many books, but to little purpose, for want of good method, I have confusedly tumbled over divers authors in our libraries with small profit, for want of art, order, memorie, judgement. I never travelled but in map or card, in which my unconfined thoughts have freely expatiated, as having ever been especially delighted with the study of cosmography Saturn was lord of my geni ture, culminating, &c., and Mars principal significator of manners, in partile conjunction with mine ascendent, both fortunate in their houses, &c. I am not poore, I am not rich , mhil est, mhil deest , I have little, I want nothing all my treasure is in Minerva's tower Greater preferment as I could never get, so am I not in debt for it I have a competency (laus Deo) from my noble and munificent patrons. Though I live still a collegiat student, as Democritus in his garden, and lead a monastique life, tpse milit theatrum, sequestred from those tunults and troubles of the world, et tamq tam in specula positus (as he said), in some high place above you all, I hear and see what is done abroad, how others run, ride, turmoile, and macerate themselves in court and countrey, far from those wrangling law suits, aula vanitatem, fori ambitionem, ridere mecum soleo I laugh at all, only secure, lest my suit go amisse, my ships perish, corn and cattle miscarry, trade decay, I have no wife nor children, good or bad, to provide for, a meere spectator of other mens fortunes and adventures, and how they act their parts, which me thinks are diversely presented unto me, as from a common theatre or scene. I hear new news every day. and those ordinary rumours of war, plagues, fires, inun dations, thefts, murders, massacrus, meteors, comets, spectrums, prodigies, apparitions, of towns taken, cities besieged in France, Germany, Turky, Persia, Poland, &c., daily musters and preparations, and such like, which these tempestuous times affoord, battles fought, so many men slain, monomachies, shipwracks, piracies, and sea fights, peace, leagues, stratagems, and fresh alarums vast confusion of vows, wishes, actions, edicts, petitions, law suits, pleas, laws, proclamations, complaints, griev ances are daily brought to our ears. New books evene day, pamphlets, currantoes [gazettes], stories, whole cata logues of volumes of all sorts, new paradoxes, opinions, schismes, heresies, controversies in philosophie, religion, Now come tidings of weddings, maskings, main meries, entertainments, jubilies, embassies, tilts, and tournaments, trophies, triumphs, revels, sports, playes then again, as in a new shifted scene, treasons, cheating tricks, robberies, enormous villanies in all kinds, funerals burials, death of princes, new discoveries, expeditions, now comicall, then tragicall matters. To day we hear of new lords and officers created, to morrow of some great men deposed, and then again of fresh honors conferred one is let loose, another imprisoned one purchaseth, another breaketh he thrives, his neighbour turns bankrupt, now plentie, then againe dearth and famine, one runs, another rides, wrangles, laughs, weeps, &c. Thus I daily hear, and such like, both private and publike news. Amidst the gallantrie and miserie of the world, jollitie, pride, perplexities and cares, simplicitie and villanie, subtletie, knaverie, candor and integritie, mutually mixt and offering themselves, I rub on privus privatus as I have still lived, so I now continue statu quo prius, lest to a solitary life, and mine own domestick discontents, saving that sometimes, ne quid mentiar, as Diogenes went into the citie and Democritus to the haven, to see fashions, I did for my recreation now and then walk abroad, look into the world, and could not choose but make some little observation, non tam sagax observator ac simplex recitator, not as they did, to scoffe or laugh at all, but with a mixt passion

Bilem, sæpe jocum vestri movere tumultus

I did sometime laugh and scoffe with Lucian, and satyrically taxe with Menippus, lament with Heraclitus, sometimes again I was petulanti splene eachinno, and then again, urere bilis jecur, I was much moved to see that abuse which I could not amend in which passion howsoever I may sympathize with him or them, 'tis for no such respect I shroud my self under his name, but either in an unknown habit to assume a little more libertie and treedome of speech, or if you will needs know, for that reason and only respect which Hippocrates relate, at large in his epistle to Damegetus, wherein he doth exprese how, comming to visit him one day, he fo and Domecratus in his garden at Abdera, in the suburbs, under a shadie bower, with a book on his knees, busic it his studie, sometime writing, sometime walking subject of his book was melancholy and madnes about him lay the careasses of many several beasts, newly by him cut up and anatomized, not that he did contenin God's creatures, as he told Hippocrates, but to find out the seat of this atra bilis, or melancholy, whence it pro eccels, and how it was engendred in mens bodies, to the intent he might better cure it in himself, by his writings and observations teach others how to prevent and avoid Which good intent of his Hippocrates highly com mended, Democritus Junior is therefore bold to imitate, and, becau e he left it imperfect, and it is now lost, quasi su centuralor Democriti, to revive again, prosecute, and finish in this treatise

If any man except against the matter or manner of treating of this my subject, and will demand a reason of it, I can alleage more than one. I write of melancholy, by being busic to avoid melancholy. There is no greater cause of inclancholy than idlenesse, no better cure than beisinesse, as khasis holds, and howbeit stultus labor est in prarum, to be busied in toyes is to simil purpose, yet hear that divine Seneca better aliud agere quam inful, better doe to no end than nothing. I writ therefore and busied myself in this playing labour, otiosaque diligentia, ut situarem terporem feriandi, with Vectius in Macrobius, at que oftum in utile verterem negotium,

-Simul et jucunda et idonea dicere vita, Lectorem delectando simul atque monendo

Fo this end I write, like them, saith Lucian, that re cite to trees and declaime to pillers, for roant of auditors. as Prulus Egineta ingenuously confesseth, not that any thing ca unknown or omitted, but to exercise my self (which course if some took, I think it would be good for their bodies, and much better for their souls), or per adventure as others do, for fame to show myself (Scire tunn nilil est, nist te seire no. seiat alter). I might be of Thucydides opinion, to kno v a thing and not to expresse it is all one as if le knew it not. When I first took this to k in hand, et, quo l'ait ille, impellente gemo negotium secept, this I ayined at, "il ut lemrem animum scribendo, to case my minde by writing, for I had gravidum cor. fiture taful a lind of impo tume in my head, which I we very destrous to be unladen of and could imagine no fitter execuation than this. Be ides I might not well refrum, for, ub dolor, ibi digitus, one must needs scratch where it itches. I was not a little offended with this maladie, shall I say my mistris melanehois, my Fgeria, or an malus genius and for that caus, as he that is tung with a scorpion, I would expel clargent clarge, com fort one sorrow with another idlenes with idlene, it er if rf th rizemi, make an antidote out of that which was the prime cause of my disease. Or as he did, if whom belix Plater speaks, that thought he had some of Aristophanes from in his belly, still crying Brainer car core, it my and for that cause stathed physick leven year, and travelled over most part or Europe, to case himself. To do my self g of I timed over such physicians as our libraries would affoord, or my private friends impart, and have taken this pains.

Symptomes of Love

Bocace hath a pleasant tale to this purpose, which he borrowed from the Greekes, and which Beroaldus hath turned into Latine, Bebelius in verse, of Cymon and Iphigenia. This Cymon was a foole, a proper man of person, and the governour of Cyprus' sonne, but a very asse, insomuch that his father being ashamed of him. sent him to a farme house he had in the country, to bee brought up, where by chance, as his manner was, walk in alone, hee espied a gallant young gentlewoman named Iphigenia, a burgomaster's daughter of Cyprus, with her maid, by a brooke side, in a little thicket, fast asleepe in her smock, where she had newly bathed her sulfe When Cymon saw her, he stood leaning on his stuffe, gaping on her immoreable, and in a maze at list he fell so farre in love with the glorious object, that he began to rouze himselfe up, to bethinke what he was, would needs follow her to the citty, and for her sake begin to be civill, to learne to sing and dance, to play on instru ments, and got all those gentleman like qualities and complements, in a short space, which his friends were most glad of In bricfe, hee became from an idiot and a clowne, to bee one of the most compleat gentlemen in Cyprus, did many valorous exploits, and all for the love of Mistris Iphigenia. In a word, I may say this much of them all, let them be never so clownish, rude and horrid, Grobians and sluts, if once they be in love, they will be most neat and spruce, for, Omnibus rebus, et miulis interibus antevenit amor, they will follow the fashion, beginne to tricke up, and to have a good opinion of themselves, venustatum enum mater Venus, a ship is not so long a rigging, as a young gentlewoman a trimining up her selfe against her sweet heart comes. A painter's shop, a flowry meadow, no so gracious aspect in Nature's storehouse as a young maid, nubilis puella, a Novitsa [novica is a Venetian word for a new married leide] or Venetian bride, that lookes for an husband, or a young man that is her suiter, composed looks, composed gate, cloathes, gestures, actions, all composed, all the graces, elegances, in the world, are in her face. Their best robes, ribbines, chaines, iewels, lawnes, linnens, laces, spangles, must come on, prater quam res patitur student elegantue, they are beyond all measure coy, nice, and too curious on a sudden 'Tis all their study, all their busines, how to wear their clouthes neat, to be polite and terse, and to set out themselves. No sooner doth a young man see his sweet heart comming, but he sinugges up himselfe, pulls up his cloake, now falne about his shoulders, ties his garters, points, sets his band, cuffs, slicks his hair, twires his beard, &c.

Study a Cure for Melancholy

Amongst exercises or recreations of the minde within doors, there is none so generall, so aptly to be applyed to all sorts of men, so fit & proper to expell idlenesse and melancholy, as that of study studia senectatem olectant, adolescentiam againt, secundas res ornant, ad eriis perfugium et solatium probent, domi delectant, & finde the rest in Fully pro Archia Poeta What so full of content as to read, walke, and see mappes, pictures, statues, jewels, marbles, which some so much magnific as those that Phidias made of old, so exquisite and pleasing to be beheld, that, as Chrysostome thinketh, if any man be sickly, troubled in minde, or that cannot sleep for griefe, and shall but stand over against one of Phidias' images, he will forget all care, or whatsoever else may molest him, in an instant?' There bee those as much taken with Michael Angelo's, Raphael de Urbino's, Francesco Francia's pieces, and many of those Italian and Dutch painters which were excellent in their ages, and esteeme of it as a most pleasing sight to view those neat architectures, devices, scutchions, coats of armes, read such bookes, to peruse old coynes of severall sorts in a faire gallery, artificiall workes, perspective glasses, old reliques, Roman antiquities, variety of colours. A good picture is falsa veritas, it muta poesis, and though (as Vives saith), artificialia delatant sal mox fastidimus, artificiall toyes please but for a time, yet who is he that will not be moved with them for the present? When Achilles was tormented and sad for the losse of his dear friend Patroclus, his mother Thetis brought him a most elaborate and curious buckler made by Vulcan, in which were engraven sunne, moone, starres, planets, sea, land, men fighting running riding, women scolding, hils, dales, towns, castles, brooks, rivers, trees, &c., with many pretty landskip and perspective peeces with sight of which he was infinitely delighted

King James (1605), when he came to see our university of Oxford, and amongst other ædifices, now went to view that famous library, renued by S Thomas Bodley, in imitation of Alexander, at his departure, brake out into that noble speech 'If I were not a king, I would be an university man, and if it were so that I must be a prisoner, if I might have my wish, I would desire to have no other prison then that library, and to be chained together with so many good authors' So sweet is the delight of study, the more learning they have-as hee that hath a dropsie, the more he drinks, the thirstier hee is-the more they covet to learne, and the last day 13 prioris discipulus, harsh at first, learning is radices amara, but fructus dulces, according to that of Isocrates, pleasant at last, the longer they live, the more they are enamoured with the Muses. Heinsius, the keeper of the library at Leiden in Holland, was mewed up in it all the year long, and that which, to thy thinking, should have bred a loathing, caused in him a greater liking "I no sooner, saith he, 'come into the library, but I bolt the doors to mee, excluding Lust, Ambition, Avarice, and all such vices, whose nurse is Idlenesse, the mother of Ignorance, and Mclancholy her selfe, and in the very lap of eternity, amongst so many divine souls, I take my seat, with so lofty a spirit and sweet content, that I pity all our great ones and rich men, that know not this happi nesse! I am not ignorant in the meanetime, notwith standing this which I have said, how barbarously and basely for the most part our ruder gentry esteeme of libraries and books, how they neglect and contemne so great a treasure, so mestimable a benefit, as Æsop's cocke did the jewell her found in the dunghill, and all through error, ignorance, and want of education. And tis a wonder withall to observe how much they will runely end away in unnecessary expences, quot modis fer unt (south Erosmus) magnatibus fee inue, quantum ibsumant alea, scorta, competationes, prosectiones nen naessaruz, femf e, bella quest'a, ambito, celax, merio, lulu, &, what in hawker, hounds, law suites, viine building, gurmundizing, drinking, sports, places, pas times, &c. (Prom Part it seet il.)

Love of Gaming and Pleasures Immoderate

It is a wonder to see how many poore, distressed, miserable wretches one shall meet almost in every path and street, begging for an almes, that have been well descended, and sometimes in flourishing estate, now ragged, tattered, and ready to be starved, lingring out a painfull life in discontent and griefe of body and minde. and all through immoderate lust, gaming, pleasure, and riot. Tis the common end of all sensuall epicures and bruitish prodigals, that are stupified and carried away headlong with their severall pleasures and lusts. Cebes, in his Table, S. Ambrose in his second booke of Ibel and Cain, and amongst the rest, Lucian, in his tract, De Mercede Conductis, hath excellent well deciphered such men's proceedings, in his picture of Opulentia, whom he faines to dwell on the top of a high mount, much sought after by many suitors. At their first comming, they are generally entertained by Pleasure and Dalliance, and have all the content that possibly may be given, so long as their money lasts, but when their meanes faile, they are contemptibly thrust out at a backe doore headlong, and there left to Shame, Reproach, Despaire at first that had so many attendants, parasites, and followers, young and lusty, richly arrayed, and all the dainty fare that might be had, with all kinds of welcome and good respect, is now upon a sudden stript of all, pale, naked, old, diseased, and forsaken, cursing his starres, and ready to strangle himself, having no other company but Repentance, Sorrow, Griefe, Dirision, Beggery, and Contempt, which are his daily attendants to his lives end. As the prodigill sonne had exquisite musicke, merry company, dainty fire at first, but a sorrowfull reckoning in the end, so have all such vaine delights and their followers (From Part r sect n)

This is the peroration of Burton's unique work

Last of all If the party affected shall certainly know this malady to have proceeded from too much fisting meditation, precise life, contemplation of Gods judgements, (for the divel deceives many by such meanes) in that other extream he circumvents melancholy it selfe, reading some books, treatises, hearing rigid preachers, %c. If he shall perceive that it hath begun first from some great loss, grievous accident disaster, sceing others in like case, or any such terrible object, let him speedily remove the cause, which to the cure of this disease Navarrus so much commends, avertat eggitationem a re scrupulosal, by all opposite meanes, art, and industry, let him, laxar, animum, by all honest recreations, refresh and recreate his distressed soule, let him divert his thoughts, by himselfe and other of his friends. Let him reade no more such tracts or subjects, hear no more such he rful tones, avoid such companies, and by all meanes open himselfe, submit himselfe to the advice of good physicians and divines, which is contratentio scrupulorum, as he calit, hear them speake to whom the Lord hath given the tongue of the learned, to be able to minister a word to him that is weary, whose words are as flagons of wire Let him not be obstinate, head strong, peevish, wiltil, self conceited (as in this malady they are), but give enre to good advice, be ruled and persuaded, and no doubt but such good counsell may prove as prosperous to his soule, is the angel vas to Peter, that opened the iron gates, loosed his bands, brought him out prison, and delivered him from bodily thraldome, they may ease his afflicted nunde relieve his wounded soule, and take him nt of the james of hell it selle. I can say no more, or the letter ad for to such as are any way distressed in the kinde, then what I have given and said. Only take the for a corolary and conclusion, as thou tenderest the one elfure in this, and all other melaneloly, thy old health of body and minde, observe this short precipt, give not way to contarmess and idleness. Be not than, le that idle.

Where God hath a temple, the Divell will have a chappel, where God hath sacrifices, the Divell will have his oblitions, where God hath ecremonics, the Divell will have his traditions, where there is any religion, the Divell will plant superstition,' is part of a memorable passage, the first clauses of which are given in a slightly different form by George Herbert in his Jacula Pru dentum, first published in 1657, thus 'No sooner 17 1 temple built to God, but the Devil builds 1 chapel hard by,' and the same winged word was versified as ve usually hear it by Defoe

> Wherever God creets a house of prayer, The Devil always builds a chapel there.

Most of Burton's verse, original or translation, is mere doggered. But The Author's Abstract of Melanel ob, prefixed (not in all the editions) to the work, talles rather higher rank, and had the honour, as Warton pointed out, of giving Milton some suggestions both for L'Allegro and for Il Penseroso

The Author's Abstract of Melancholy

When I go musing all alone,
Thinking of divers things foreknown,
When I build eastles in the air,
Voi I of sorrow, void of feare,
Pleasing myself with phantains siveet,
Methicles the time rensivery fleet.
All my joyes to this are folly,
Naught to sweet as melancholy

When I go walking all alone, Recounting that I have all done, My thoughts on me then tyrannize, Feare and orrow me surprise, Whether I tarry still, or go, Methinks the trac mo es very slow All my griefs to this are jolly, Isaught o and as melancholy When to myself I act and smile,
With pleasing thoughts the time beguile,
By a brool side or wood so green,
Unheard, unsought for, or unseen,
A thousand pleasures do me bless,
And crown my soule with happiness.
All my joyes besides are folly,
None so sweet as melancholy

When I he, sit, or walk alone,
I sigh, I grieve, making great mone,
In a dark grove or irksome den,
With discontents and Furies then,
A thousand miseries at once
Mine heavy heart and soule ensconce.
All my griefs to this are jolly,
None so sour as melancholy

Methinks I hear, methinks I see
Sweet musick, wondrous melodie,
Towns, palaces, and cities fine,
Here now, then there, the world is mine,
Rare beauties, gallant ladies shine,
Whate'er is lovely is divine
All other joyes to this are folly,
None so sweet as melancholy

Methinks I hear, methinks I see Ghosts, goblins, ficinds—my phantasie Presents a thousand ugly shapes Headless bears, black men, and apes, Doleful outcries and fearful sights My sad and dismal soule affrights. All my griefs to this are jolly, None so damned as melancholy

More than most men, Burton is identified with the one book which was the work of his life. But he wrote also a Latin comedy, Philosophaster, acted at Cambridge in 1617, and printed for the Royburghe Club in 1862, and he contributed Latin verses to various collections

Of reprints or new editions of Burton by far the most scholarly and valuable 1 that by the Rev A. R. Shilleto with an introduction by Mr A. H. Bullen (3 vols. 1893), in which most of the quotations are identified and verified.

James Ussher, or Ushfr, the celebrated Archbishop of Armagh, was born in Dublin, 4th January 1581, son of a clerk in Chancery succeeded to his father's estate, but, wishing to devote himself uninterruptedly to study, gave it up to his brother and sisters, reserving for himself only a sufficiency for his maintenance at Trinity College and for the purchase of books In 1666 he visited England, and became intimate with Camden and Sir Robert Cotton. For thirteen years (from 1607) he filled the chair of Divinity in the University of Dublin, dwelling largely on the controversies between the Protestants and Catholics At the convocation of the Irisli clergy in 1615, when they determined to assert their independence as a national Church, the articles were drain up mainly by Ussher, and by asserting in them the Calvinistic doctrines of election and reprobation, by his advocacy of the rigorous observance of the Sabbath, and by his known op nion that bishops were not a distinct order in the Church, but only superior in degree to presbyters, he exposed himself to the charge of being a favourer of Puritanism Having been accused as such to the king, he went over to England in 1619, and, in a conference with His Majesty, so fully cleared himself that he was erelong appointed to the see of Meath, and in 1623 to the archbishopric He aimed at a much needed reform of Armagh in the Irish Church, and proposed in vain a modi fication of Episcopacy to meet the objections of His well known visit to Samuel Presbytemans Rutherford at Anwoth, in Kirkcudbrightshire, may be assigned perhaps to 1638 During the political agitation of Charles's reign Ussher maintained the absolute unlawfulness of taking up arms against the king The Irish rebellion in 1641 drove him to England, where he settled at Oxford, then the residence of Charles Subsequently the civil war caused him repeatedly to change his abode, which was finally the Countess of Peterborough's seat at Reigate, where he died on 21st March 1656, at the age of seventy-five buried with great pomp in Westminster Abbey He refused to sit in the Westminster Assembly, and was for eight years preacher at Lincoln's Inn. He was a man of boundless humility, charity, and tolerance, was always loyal to the crown, but was treated with indulgence by Cromwell. He attended Strafford to the scaffold, and fainted when from Lady Peterborough's London house he saw the 'villains in vizards' put up Charles I's Most of his writings relate to ecclesiasti cal history and antiquities, and were mainly intended to furnish arguments against the Catholics, but the book for which he is chiefly celebrated is a great chronological work in Latin, the Annales, the first part of which vas published in 1650, and the second in 1654. In this chronologic cal digest of universal history from the creation of the world to the dispersion of the Jews in Vespusian's reign, received with great applause by the learned throughout Europe, and several times reprinted on the Continent, the author, by fixing the three epochs of the deluge, the departure of the Israelites from Egypt, and their return from Babylon, was held to have reconciled the chronologies of sacred and profane history chronological system, putting the creation of the world in 4004 B.C., was long that generally Ussher conformed strictly to the received. Hebrew chronology in Scriptural dates, the Septuagint version and the Samaritan Pentateuch differ greatly from it. Modern Egyptologists of course wholly disregard his limitations, recent Babylonian research has uncovered tablets held to date from six thousand to seven thousand years before Christ, geologists calmly assume that the Tertiary epoch began nincty-three million years ago But Ussher still has the glory of having done the best he could, and of having provided what was for centuries a practicable scheme for i working purposes Fuller was said to have supervised the translation of the Annales in 1658 Ussher wrote also on the ancient religion of the Irish and British, on the ecclesistical antiquities of Britain, and on the Septuagint, the Cilvinistic Body of Divinity (1645) is only partly his The unfinished and posthumously published Chronologia Sacra (1660) was meant as a guide to the study of sacred history, and as showing the grounds and calculations of the principal epochs of the Annales The opening of the opus maximum (as in the translation of 1658) shows the precision with which Ussher saw his way to fix the date of the Creation

| Julian Period | Period | In the beginning God created heaven | Period | Total | And earth, Gen I v I Which begin | ning of time, according to our chronologie, fell upon the entrance of the night preceding the twenty third day of Octob in the year of the Julian Calendar, 710.

Upon the first day therefore of the world, or Octob 23, being our sunday, God, together with the highest heaven, created the angels. Then having finished, as it were, the roofe of this building, he fell in hand with the foundation of this wonderfull fabrick of the world, he fashioned this lowermost globe, consisting of the deep, and of the earth, all the quire of angels singing together, and magnifying his name therefore. [Job 38 v 7] And when the earth was void and without forme, and darknesse covered the free of the deepe, on the very middle of the first day, the light was created, which God severing from the darknesse, called the one day, and the other night.

On the second day [October 24. being Monday] the firmament being finished, which was called heaven, a separation was made of the waters above and the waters here beneath enclosing the earth.

Upon the third day [Octob 25 Tuesday] these waters beneath running together into one place, the dry land appeared. This confluence of the waters God made a sea, sending out from thence the rivers, which were thither to return again [Eccles 1 vers. 7], and he caused the earth to bud, and bring forth all kinds of herbs and plants, with seeds and fruits. But above all, he enriched the garden of Eden with plants, for among them graw the tree of Life and the tree of Knowledge of good and evil. [Gen. 2 vers. 8, 9]

On the fourth day [Octob 26 which is our Wednes day] the sun, the moon, and the rest of the stars were created

The work of the other days is recorded with the same particularity. The method on which the archbishop proceeded in his calculation of the dates is explained in the 'Epistle to the Reader' thus

But for as much as our Christian epoch falls many ages after the beginning of the world, and the number of years before that backward is not onely more trouble some, but (unlesse greater care be taken) more livable to errour, also it hath pleased our modern chronologers, to adde to that generally received hypothesis (which asserted the Julian years, with their three cycles by a certain mathematical prolepsis, to have run down to the very beginning of the world) an artificial epoch, framed out of three cycles multiplied in themselves, for the Solar Cicle being multiplied by the Lunar, or the number of 28 by 19, produces the great Paschal Cycle of 532 years, and that again multiplied by fifteen, the number of the indiction, there arises the period of 7950 years, which wa first (if I mistake not) observed by Robert Lotharing, bishop of Hereford, in our island of brittain, and 500 cars after by Joseph Scaliger fitted for chronological uses, and called by the name of the Julian Period, because it contained a cycle of so many Julian years. Now if the series of the three minor cicles be from this present y ar extended backward unto precedent times, the 4713 ears before the beginning of our Christian account will be found to be that year into which the first year of the indiction, the first of the I unar Cicle, and the first of the Solar will fall. Having placed therefore the heads of this period in the kalends of January in that proleptick year, the first of our Christian vulgar account must be reel oned the 4714 of the Julian Period, which, being disuled by 15, 19 28, will present us with the 4 Roman indiction, the 2 Lunar Cycle, and the 10 Solar, which are the principal characters of that year

We find moreover that the year of our fore fathers, and the years of the ancient Lgyptians and Hebrews vere of the same quantity with the Julian, consisting of twelve equal moneth, every of them conteming 30 dayes, (for it cannot be proved that the Hebrews did use lunary moneths before the Babylonian Captivity) adjoying to the end of the twelfth moneth, the addition of five dayes. and every fourth year six And I have observed by the continued succession of these years, as they are delivered in holy writ, hat the end of the great Nebuchadnezars and the beginning of Evilmerodachs (his sons) reign, fell out in the 3442 year of the world, but by collation of Chaldcan history and the astronomical cannon, it fell out in the 186 year of Nabonwar, and, as by certain connection, it must follow in the 562 year before the Christian account, and of the Julian Period, the 4152 and from thence I gathered the creation of the world did fall out upon the 710 year of the Julian Period, by placing its beginning in autumn but for as much as the first day of the world began with the evening of the first day of the week, I have observed that the Sunday, which in the year 710 aforesaid came nearest the Autumnal Lquinox, by a tronomical tables (notwithstanding the stay of the sun in the dayes of Joshua, and the going back of it in the dayes of Lzekiah) happened upon the 23 day of the Julian October, from thence concluded that from the evening preceding that first day of the Julian year, both the first day of the creation and the in a motion of time are to be deduced

sir Thomas Overbury was famous as a autivand ingenious describer of 'characters'. He was for years an intimate of Robert Cirr, the minion of James I, but having opposed the favorates marriage with the infamous Countess of E see, he incurred the hatred of the pair, and through their inducate was confined in the Fower, and poi oned there on the 13th of September 1013—being then in the thirty second year of his age. Three months later Cirr, not Earl of Somerse was married to Lady Essex. The way in which, though humbler instruments were executed. the principals in this murder were screened from justice leaves a foul blot on the memory of the king Overbury wrote one very popular didactic poem, The Wife (published in 1614), on choosing a partner for life, which was imitated in The Hus band. A Wife Besporen, &c The prose Characters (1614), among the first of that kind of with descriptions of types (Hall having been in the field in 1608), were often reprinted and frequently imitated. They abound in strained conceits, but are full of epigrammatic point. It is, however, doubtful how many of them are by Overbury The number of characters was increased in successive editions, the fourth contained thirty The Tinker (here quoted) and two others first appeared in the sixth (1616), and arc by 'J Cocke' -possibly 'Jo Cooke, Gent,' whose clever drama, Greene's Tu Quoque, appeared in 1614. Still more doubtful is it whether the Crumms fal'n from King fames's Table, professedly that king's table talk, The first was to any extent Overbury's work verse of The IVife is as follows (the spelling in this and all the extracts being that of the edition of 1638)

Lach woman is a briefe of Womankind,
And doth in little even as much containe
As in one Day and Night all life we find
Of either more is but the same againe
God fram'd Her so that to her Husband She As Eve should all the World of Woman be

A faire and happy Milk-maid

Is a Countrey Wench that is so farre from making her selfe beautifull by Art, that one looke of hers is able to put all face physicke out of countenance. She knows a fairc looke is but a Dumbe Orator to commend vertue, therefore minds it not All her excellencies stand in her so silently, as if they had stolne upon her without her I nowledge. The Iming of her apparell, which is her selfe, is farre better than outsides of Tissew, for though she be not arrayed in the spoil of the Silke worme shee is deckt in innocency, a far better wearing. She doth not, with lying long abed, spoile both her complexion and con ditions nature hath taught her, too, immoderate sleepe is rust to the Soule she rises, therefore, with Chaunticleare, her dame's Cock, and at night makes the lamb her Corfew In milking a Cow, and straining the teats through her fingers, it seemes that so sweet a Milk presse makes the Milk the whiter or sweeter, for never came Almond Glove or Aromatique syntment of her palme to taint it. The golded cares of corne fall and kisse her feet when shee reapes them, as if they wisht to be bound and led prisoners by the same hand that fell'd them. Her breath is her own, which sents all the yeare long of June, like a new made Haycock. She makes her hand hard with labour, and her heart soft with pitty, and when winters evenings fall early (sitting at her mery wheele) she sings a defiance to the giddy wheele of Fortune She doth all things with so sweet a grace, it seems ignorance will not suffer her to doe ill, being her mind is to doe well Shee bestowes her yeares wages at next faire, and in chusing her garments counts no bravery i' th' world like The garden and bee have are all her Physick decency and chirurgery, and she lives the longer for't. She dares goe alone and unfold sheepe i' th' night, and feares no manner of ill, because she meanes none, yet to say truth, she is never alone, for she is still accompanied with old songs, honest thoughts, and prayers, but short ones, yet they have their efficacy, in that they are not pauled [palled, weakened] with insuing idle cognations. Lastly, her dreames are so chaste, that shee dare tell them, only a Fridaies dream is all her superstition, that she conceales for feare of anger. Thus lives she, and all her care is, she may die in the Spring time, to have store of flowers stucke upon her winding sheet.

Overbury a works were collected by Rimbault and published with a Life in 1856.

John Chalkhill .- A poem described as 'a pastoral history,' Thealma and Clearchus, was published by Izaak Walton in 1683, with a titlepage stating it to have been 'written long since by JOHN CHALKHILL, Esq, an acquaintant and friend of Edmund Spencer' Walton, who had known the author, says 'he was in his time a man generally known, and as well beloved, for he was humble and obliging in his behaviour, a gentleman, a scholar, very innocent and prudent, and, indeed, his whole life was useful, quiet, and virtuous? Thealma and Clearchus was reprinted by the Rev Samuel Weller Singer (Chiswick, 1820), who expressed an opinion that, as Walton had been silent upon the life of Chalkhill, he might be altogether a fictitious personage, and the poem be actually the composition of Walton himself, and a writer, probably Sir Egerton Brydges, in vol is of the Retrospective Review, after investigating the circumstances, came to the same con-But Mr F S Merryweather, in the Gentleman's Magazine for 1860, showed that towards the close of Elizabeth's reign an Ivon or Ion Chalkhill, Gent., was one of the coroners for the county of Middlesex, and suggested that this may have been the poet. The poetry soars above the level of Iznak's muse, who dwelt by the side of trout streams and among quiet meadows. The non de guerre of Chalkhill must also have been in old one with Walton, if he wrote Incalma, for thirty years before its publication he had inscried in his Combleat Angler two songs, signed 'lo Challhill? Inealma, though it has something Spensorian in its subject, is very unlike the work of i contemporary of Spenser probably it may date from the days of James I. The scene of this highly irtificial 'pastoral' is laid in Arcadia, and the author describes the Golden Age and all its charms, succeeded by an Age of Iron, with its ambition, avarice, and tyranny The plot is complicated and obscure, and the characters lack individuality, the interest depends on the romantic descriptions and occasional felicity of language. The versification is that of the heroic couplet, varied, like Milton's Lycidas, by breaks and pauses in the middle of the line

The Priestess of Diana.

Within a little silent grove hard by, Upon a small ascent he might espy A stately chapel, righly gilt without, Beset with shady sycumores about And ever and anon he might well hear A ound of music steal in at his car As the wind give it being so sweet an air Would strike a syren mute A hundred virgins there he might espy Prostrate before a marble deity, Which, by its portraiture, appeared to be The image of Diana on their knee They tendered their devotions, with sweet airs, Offering the incense of their praise and prayers. Their garments all alike, beneath their paps, buckled together with a silver claps, clasp And cross their snowy silken robes, they wore An azure scarf, with stars embroidered o'er Their hair in curious tresses was knit up, Crowned with a silver crescent on the top A silver bow their left hand held, their right, I or their defence, held a sharp headed flight, Drawn from their 'broidered quiver, neatly fied In silken cords, and fastened to their side Under their vestments, something short before, White buskins, fixed with ribanding, they wore It was a catching sight for a young eye, That love had fired before the might espy One whom the rest had sphere like circled round, Whose head was with a golden chaplet crowned He could not see her face, only his car Was bles with the sweet words that came from her

Edward Fairfax (c 1580-1635), translator of Fasso's Jerusalem, a son—probably illegitim iterof Sir I homas Fairfax of Denton, in Yorkshire, was born near Leeds, and spent his life mainly in literary work at Newhall, in Fewston parish, near Otley, Yorkshire. He dedicated his Godfrey of Bulloigne or the Recoverie of Jerusalem, to Queen Elizabeth (1st ed 1600, and ed 1624). The poetical beauty and freedom of this version of Tasso's Gerusalemme Liberata have been the theme of almost universal praise. Dryden ranked Fairfax with Spenser as a master of our language, and Waller said he derived from him the harmony of his numbers, though Ben Jonson said 'it was not well done.' It charmed James I and solaced the imprisonment of Charles I Hallam, admitting that it shows spirit and freedom, decides not unreasonably that it lacks the grace of the original It was not the first translation (Richard Carew translated the first five cantos, see above at page 353), and there have been over half a dozen since, but it may still claim to be the English rendering, and an essential part of English literature. In 1621 Fairfax wrote a Discourse of Witch craft (first printed in the Philobiblon Miscellanies, 1859), and in the preface to it he stites that in religion he was 'neither a fintastic Puritan nor a superstitious Papist,' but describes in full the bewitching of two of his own diaghters. He also wrote a series of Eclogues, one of whicha poor thing-was published in 1741

If the opening of the first book of the Godfrey (or ferusalem) recalls Homer and Virgil on the one hand, the English version suggests Spenser and Milton on the other

were sons of Giles I letcher, LLD (c 1549-1011), himself something of a poet, who was sent in 1508 as imbassador to Russi, and wrote Of the Ross Common Wealth (1591) and Lieta or Poenes of Love Both were clergymen, Phineas educated like his father, it Eton and King's College, Cambridge, and Giles at Westminster and Frinty Phineas (1582-1650) in 1621 became rector of Hilgay, in Norfolk, Giles (c 1588-1623) from about 1618 was rector of Alderton, Suffolk. The elder Giles was the brother of the Bishop of London, father of John Fletcher the dramatist—who was accordingly cousin of the two poet brothers

The works of Phineas consist of the Purple Island or the Isle of Man, Piscatory I degres, and miscellineous poems. The Purple Island was published in 1633, but written much carlier, as appears from allusions in it to the Lirl of Essex. The name of the poem conjures up makes of poetical and romantic beauty such is we may suppose a youthful admirer and follower of Spenser to have drawn-unless, indeed, it suggests the mass apprehension that led to its being entered in a bookseller's topographical catalogue under Man, Isle of 'A perusal of the work dispels illusons The Purple Island of Fletcher is to summy cost 'amid the melancholy main,' it is in clasoric and anatomical description of the body and mand of man, involving a po tentous allegory vluen me tibly repels the iverage cider. and he does not reject the view that 'within (viz. the liver) love bath his habitation.' Having in five cantos exhausted man's physical phenomena, he proceeds to describe the complex nature and operations of the mind Intellect is the prince of the Isle of Man, and he is furnished with eight counsellors -- Fancy, Memory, the Common Sense, and five external senses. The human fortress thus garrisound is assailed by the Vices, and a fierce contest enducs for the possession of the human soul length an angel interposes, and ensures victory to the Virtues-the angel being King James I, on whom is heaped much fulsome adulation. From the above sketch of this odd poem, it will be apparent that its worth must rest, not upon the attractions of its plot, but upon the beauty of isolated passages and particular descriptions. Some of Phineas's seven line stanzas have the flow and sweetness of Spenser's Faerie Oucene, a few of them Spenser's charm, multitudes are marred by affectation, perversities, and the tedium of long protracted allegory Giles Fletcher published only one poem of any length-Christ's Victoric and Triumph It appeared it Cambridge in 1610, and met with such indifferent success that a second edition was not called for till twenty years ifterwards. There is a massive grandeur ind carnestness about Christ's Lictorie which strikes the imagination The materials of the poem are better fused together and more hirmoniously linked than those of the Purple Island, the unusual eight line stanza contrasts with interspersed lyrics 'Both of these brothers,' said Hallam, 'are deserving of much priise, they were endowed with minds eminently poetical, and not inferior in imaginition to any of their contempo But an injudicious taste, ind in excessive fondness for a style which the public was rapidly abandoning, that of allegorical personification, prevented their powers from being effectively displayed' Campbell's criticism is not antiquated 'They were both the disciples of Spenser, and, with his diction gently modernised, retained much of his melody and luxuriant expression. Giles, inferior as he is to Spenser and Milton, might be figured. in his happiest moments, as a link of connection in our poetry between these congenial spirits, for he reminds us of both, and evidently gave hints to the litter in a poem on the same subject with Partidise Regained! These hints are indeed very plan and obvious. The appearance of Sat in as an tocd sire 'slowly footing' in the silent wilderness, the temptation of our Saviour in the 'goodly garden' and in the Bower of Vain Delight, are outlines which Milton adopted and filled up in his second epic, with a grace and power unknown to the Fletchers-for whom may be claimed ingenuity of invention, copiousness of fancy, includious numbers, and Linguige at times rich, ornate, and If Spenser had not previously lighty poetical virtuen his Bower of Bliss, Giles Fletcher's Bower of Vain Delight would have been unequalled in the factry of that day, probably, life his master, I Flinging all to the earth with her enchanted spear

Spenser, he drew from 1 asso The poems of both brothers are included in Dr Grosart's 'Fuller Worthies Library' (1868-69, four vols being given to Phineas and one to Giles), and Giles's also in his 'Early English Poets' (1876)

Decay of Human Greatness

From the Purtle Island By Phineas Fletcher

Fond man, that looks on earth for happinesse, And here long seeks what here is never found ! For all our good we hold from heav'n by lease. With many forfeits and conditions bound, Nor can we pay the fine and rentage due

Though now but writ, and scal'd, and giv'n anew, Yet daily we it break, yet daily must renew

Why should'st thou here look for perpetuall good, At every losse against heav'ns face repining? Do but behold where glorious Cities stood, With gilded tops and silver turrets shining, There now the hart fearlesse of greyhound feeds, And loving pelican in safety breeds, There schrieching Satyres fill the people's emptie steads.

Where is th' Assyrian Lion's golden hide, That all the East once graspt in lordly paw? Where that great Persian Beare, whose swelling pride The I ion's self tore out with ravenous jaw? Or he which 'twixt a Lion and a Pard, Through all the world with nimble pineons far'd, And to his greedy whelps his conquer'd kingdomes shar'd?

Hardly the place of such antiquitie, Or note of those great Monarchies we finde Onely a fading verball memoric, And empty name in writ is left behinde But when this second life and glory fades, And sinks at length in Time's obscurer shades, A second fall succeeds, and double death invades

That monstrous Beast, which nurst in Liber's fenne Did all the world with hideous shape affray, That fill'd with costly spoil his gaping denne, And trode down all the rest to dust and clay His batt'ring horns pull'd out by civil hands,

And iron teeth he scatter'd on the sands, Backt, bridled by a monk, with sev'n heads yoked stands.

And that black Vulture, which with deathfull wing O're shadows half the earth, whose dismall sight Frighted the Muses from their native spring, Already stoops, and flagges with weary flight

Who then shall look for happines beneath, Where each new day proclaims chance, change, and And life it self's as flit as is the air we breathe? (From Canto vii)

The symbolical Les pard is Alexander the Great the monstrous Beart is of course the Papacy , the black Vulture is the Furk.

Parthenia

From the Purple Island

With her her sister went, a warlike maid, Parthenia, all in steel and gilded arms, In needle's stead a mighty spear she sway'd, With which in bloudy fields and ficree alarms The boldest champion she down would bear, And like a thunderbolt wide passage tear,

Her goodly armour seem'd a garden green, Where thousand spotlesse lilies freshly blew, And on her shield the 'lone bird might be seen, Th' Arabian bird, shining in colours new It self unto it self was onely mate,

Ever the same, but new in newer date And underneath was writ, 'Such is chaste single state.'

-Thus hid in arms, she seem'd a goodly knight, And fit for any warlike exercise And when she list lay down her armour bright, And back resume her peacefull maiden's guise, The fairest maid she was, that ever yet

Prison'd her locks within a golden net, Or let them waving hang, with roses fair beset.

Choice nymph, the crown of chaste Diana's train, Thou Beautie's lilie, set in heav'nly earth, Thy fairs, unpattern'd, all perfections stain Sure heav'n with curious pencil at thy birth In thy rare face her own full picture drew

It is a strong verse here to write but true Hyperboles in others are but half thy due.

Upon her forehead Love his trophies fits, A thousand spoils in silver arch displaying, And in the midst himself full proudly sits, Himself in awfull majestic araying Upon her brows lies his bent ebon bow, And ready shafts deadly those weapons show, Yet sweet that death appear'd, lovely that deadly hlow

A bed of likes flower upon her cheek, And in the midst was set a circling rose, Whose sweet aspect would force Narcissus seek New liveries, and fresher colours choose To deck his beauteous head in snowie tire, But all in vain for who can hope t' aspire To such a fair, which none attain, but all admire?

Her rubie lips lock up from gazing sight A troop of pearls, which march in goodly row But when she deignes those precious bones undight. Soon heav'nly notes from those divisions flow,

And with rare musick charm the ravisht eares. Danting bold thoughts, but cheering modest fears The spheres so onely sing, so onely charm the spheres.

Yet all the starres which deck this beautoous skie. By force of th' inward sunne both shine and move Thron'd in his heart sits Love's high majestie. In highest majestie the highest Love

As when a taper shines in glassie frame, The sparkling crystall burns in glitt'ring flame So does that brightest Love brighten this lovely dame.

(From Canto x)

Pirthenia is defined by the poet as chastitie in the single as Agnia is chastitie in the married. The Arabian bird, the phoenix, was of course a virgin bird.

The Sorceress of Vain Delight From Christ's Victorie and Triumpa. By Giles Fletcher

The garden like a ladic faire was cut, That lay as if shee slumber'd in delight, And to the open skies her eyes did shut, The azure fields of heav n wear 'sembled right In a large round, set with the flow'rs of light

The flowr's de luce, and the round sparks of deaw, dew That hung upon the acure leaves, did shew Like twinkling starrs, that sparkle in th' cav'ning blew

Upon a hillie banke her head shee cast, On which the bowre of Vaine delight was built, White and red roses for her face wear plac't, And for her tresses mangolds wear spilt Them broadly shee displaid, like flaming guilt, Till in the ocean the glad day wear drown'd, Then up againe her yellow locks she wound, And with greene filletts in their prettie calls them bound.

What should I here depent her lillie hand, Her veines of violets, her ermine brest, Which thear in orient colours living stand, Or how her gowne with silken leaves is drest, Or how her watchmen, arm'd with boughte crest, A wall of prim hid in his bushes bears, Shaking at every winde their leavie spears, While she supincly sleeps, ne to be waked fears !

Over the hedge depends the graping elme, Whose greener head empurpuled in wine, Seemed to wonder at his bloodie helme, And halfe suspect the bunches of the vine . Least they, perhaps, his wit should undermine. For well he knowe such fruit he never bore But her weake armes embraced hun the more, And with her ruby grapes laught at her paramour

The roofe thicke cloudes did paint, from which three

Three gaping mermaides with their eawrs did feed, Whose brests let fall the streame, with sleepie noise, To lions mouths, from whence it leapt with speede, And in the rosic laver seem'd to bleed

I he naked boyes unto the water's fall, Their stonie nightingales had taught to call. When Zephyr breath'd into their watry interall.

And all about, embayèd in soft sleepe, A heard of charmed beasts aground were spread, Which the faire witch in goulden chaines did keepe, And them in willing bondage fettered, Once men they liv'd, but now the men were dead And turn'd to beasts, so fabled Homer old, That Circe with her potion, charm'd in gold, Us'd manly soules in beastly bodies to immould,

Through this false Eden, to his leman's bowre, (Whome thousand soules devoutly idolize) Our first destroyer led our Saviour Thear in the lower roome, in soleinne wise, They daune't around, and powr'd their sacrifice To plumpe Lycus, and among the rest, The jolly priest, in yvie garlands drest, Chaunted wild orgialls, in honour of the feast.

High over all Panglorie's blazing throne, In her bright turret, all of christal wrought, Like Phabus lampe, in midst of heaven, shone, Whose starry top with pride infernall fraught, Selfe-arching columns to uphold wear trught

In which her image still reflected was By the smooth christall that, most like her glasse, In beauty and in frailtie did all others passe.

A silver vande the sorceresse did sway,
And for a crowne of gold her haire she wore;
Onel, a garland of rose buds did play
About her locks, and in her hand she bore
A hollowe biobe of glasse, that long before
She full of couptinesse had bladdered,
And all the world therein depictured
Whose colours, lil e the rainbowe, ever vanished.

Such water orbicles young boyes do blowe
Out of their sopy shels, and much admire
The swimming world, which tenderly they rowe
With easte breath, till it be waved higher
But if they channed but roughly once aspire,
The painted bubble instantly doth fall.
Here where the came the draw for musique call.

Here when she came, she 'gun for musique call,
And sung this wooing song, to welcome Him withall —

I ove is the blossome whear thear blowes Livery thing that lives or growes Love doth make the heav ns to move, And the sun doth burne in love Love the strong and weake doth yoke, And makes the yere climbe the oke, Under whose shadowes lions wilde, Soft'ned by love, grow tame and mild. Love no med'eine can appease, He burnes the fishes in the seas Not all the skill his wounds can stench, Not all the sea his fire can quench Love did make the bloody spear Once a levic coat to wear, While in his leaves their shrouded lay Sweete birds for love that sing and play And of all love's joyfull flame I the bud and blossome am Onely bend Thy knee to mee, Thy wooing shall Thy winning bee.

See, see the flowers that belowe Now as tresh as morning blowe, And of all, the virgin rose, that as bright Aurora showes How they all unleaved die, I owing their virginitie, I il c unto a summer shade, But now borne, and now they fade. Livery thing doth passe may, Thear is danger in delay Come, come gather then the rose, Gather it, or it you lose All the sand of Tagus' shore Into my bosome casts his ore All the villeys's vimming corne Io my home is yearely borne, I very grape of every vine Is gladly brais'd to make me wine, While ten thousand kings, as proud To carry up my tram, have how'd, And a world of ladies send me In my chambers to attend me All the tarres in heavin that shine, And ten thou and more, are mine Onely bend Thy knee to mee, The vooing shall thy winning bee

The cont he dire Enchanness in His mirde Her guitefull hapt to have embosomed,

But He her charmes dispersed into winde,
And her of insolence admonished,
And all her optique glasses shattered
So with her sire to Hell shee took her flight,
(The starting ayre flew from the damned spright,) Whear deeply both aggree,'d plunged themselves in night,

But to their Lord, now musing in His thought,
A heavenly volie of light angels flew,
And from His Father Him a banquet brought,
Through the fine element, for well they knew,
After His Lenten fast He hungrie grew,
And, as He fed, the holy quires combine
To sing a hymne of the colestiall Trine,
All thought to passe, and each was past all thought divine.

The birds' sweet notes, to sonnet out their joycs Attemper'd to the layes angelicall, And to the birds the winds attune their noyse, And to the winds the waters hoarcely call, And Lecho back againe revoyced all, That the whole valley rung with victorie

But now our Lord to rest doth homeward fle
See how the Night comes stealing from the mountains high!

Sir John Beaumont (1582–1628) was the elder brother of the celebrated dramatist. Enjoying the family estate of Gracedieu, in Leicester shire, Sir John dedicated part of his leisure hours to the service of the Muses. He wrote, in neat enough heroic couplets, a somewhat unimpassioned poem on Bosworth Field. This is how he gives Richard's address to his troops on the eve of the decisive battle.

My fellow souldiers, though your swords Are sharpe, and need not whetting by my words, Yet call to minde those many glorious dayes In which we treasur'd up immortall prayse, If when I serv'd, I ever fled from foe, Fly ye from mine, let me be punisht so But if my father, when at first he try'd How all his sonnes could shining blades abide, Found me an eagle, whose undazled eyes Affront the beames which from the steele arise, And if I now in action teach the same, know then, ye have but chang'd your gen'rall's name, Be still your selves, ye fight against the drosse Of those that oft have runne from you with losse How many Somersets, - Dissention's brands !-Have felt the force of our revengefull hands! From whome this youth, as from a princely floud, Derives his best, yet not untrinted bloud, Have our assaults made Lancaster to droupe? And shall this Welshman with his ragged troupe Subdue the Norman and the Saxon line, That onely Merlin may be thought divine? See what a guide these fugitives have chose! Who bred among the French, our ancient foes, Forgets the English language and the ground, And I nowes not what our drums and trumpets sound

In a poem to the memory of a friend are these excellent observations in verse

Why should vaine sorrow follow him with teares, Who shakes off burdens of declining yeeres? Whole thread exceeds the usuall bounds of life, And feeles no stroke of any fatall knife? The Destinies enjoyne their wheeles to run, Untill the length of his whole course be spun. No envious cloud obscures his struggling light, Which sets contented at the point of night, Yet this large time no greater profit brings, Then ev'ry little moment whence it springs, Unlesse imploy'd in workes deserving praise, Most weare out many veeres, and live few dayes. Time flowes from instants, and of these each one Should be esteem'd as if it were alone The shortest space, which we so lightly prize When it is comming and before our cyes, Let it but slide into th' eternall maine, No realmes, no world can purchase it against Remembrance onely makes the footsteps last, When winged Time, which fixt the prints, is past

Samuel Purchas (1575?-1626), born at Thakted, in Essex, studied at St John's, Cambridge, held successively two livings in Essex, and from 1614 till his death was rector of St Martin's in Ludgate. In 1613 he published a volume called Purchas his Pilgrimage, or Relations of the World, and the Religious observed in all Agis and Places d scovered from the Creation unto this Present A second work was Purchas his Pilgrim, Microcosmus or the History of Man, Relating the Wonders of his Generation, Vanities in his Degeneration, Necessity of his Regeneration (1619) Hakluyt's papers having fallen into his hands, he issued in 1625 his best known work, Haklustus Posthumus, or Purchas his Pilgrimes containing a History of the World, in Sea Voyages and Land Travels by Englishmen and others (4 vols folio, The fourth edition of the Pilgrimage usually accompanies the Pilgrimes as if a fifth volume, although a quite distinct work. Purchas himself thus describes the two books brethren holding much resemblance in name, nature, and feature, yet differ in both the object This [the Pilgrimage] being and the subject. mine own in matter, though borrowed, and in form of words and method, whereas my Pilgrimes are the authors themselves, acting their own parts in their own words, only furnished by me with such necessaries as that stage further required, and ordered according to my rules' If we may judge by a comparison of his work with such of the 'relations' as have not perished, Purchas was neither painstaking nor conscientious as an editor, many of his stories seem to be meagre abstracts of his originals, and his tales are notable rather for a certain old world quaintness than for any exceptional literary gift. The theological disquisitions with which he interlards his narratives are at times rather amusing than edifying Vol 1 of the Pilgrimes contains voyages and travels of ancient kings, patriarchs, apostles, and philosophers, voyages of circumnavigators of the globe, and voyages along the coasts of Africa to the East Indies, Japan, China, the Philippine Islands, and the Persian and Arabian Gulfs, Vol 11., voyages and relations of Africa, Ethiopia, Palestine, Arabia, Persia, and other parts of Asia, Vol. 111, Tartary, China, Russia, North west America, and the Polar Regions, Vol iv, America and the West Indies, Vol v contains the Pilgrimage, which is substantially a theological and geographical history of Asia, Africa, and America. The editor of Churchill's Collection (supposed to have been John Locke) says of Purchas, that 'he has imitated Hakluvt too much, swelling his work into five volumes in folio,' yet, he adds, 'the whole collection is very valuable, as having preserved many considerable voyages that might otherwise have perished But, like Hakluyt, he has thrown in all that came to hand, to fill up so many volumes, and is excessive full of his own notions, and of mean quibbling and playing upon words, yet for such as can make choice of the best, the collection is very valuable.'

The Pilgrimage is also in large measure a cento from the stories of travellers and older authors, sometimes boiled down and restated in Purchas's own words Thus the thirteenth chapter of Book IV is expressly based on the travellers Plano Carpini, Rubruquis, and (especially) Marco Polo, as well as on less satisfactory authorities the thirteenth century chronicler Matthew Paris, the thirteenth-century encyclopædist Vincentius Bel lovacensis, and Sir John Mandeville! The famous paragraph in it which dominated Coleridge's daydream, and took visionary shape in his Kubla Khan, is shortened from Marco Polo's account (Book I chap Ivi) of the great Khan's summer palace at Kai-ping-fu, north of Pekin, which the Chinese called Shang-tu (i.e. upper court) Marco makes the word Chandu, Odoric Sandu, Ramusio Xandu, and Purchas Yamdu What follows about the Tebet and Kasımur, the Bacsı and Sensin, is merely abstracted from Marco Coleridge's 'Alph' is not in Purchas or his authorities, and may be the classical Alpheus which disappears in caverns of limestone and comes to light again more than The Abora of the poem is no doubt the 'admirable hill Amara' on which Purchas waxes eloquent in his seventh book-the name still seen in Amhara, the central province of Abyssinia, 4 and in Amharic, the name of the modern Abyssınıan language

In the following extract he is speaking of the manners and customs of the Tartars

Their wives are exceeding chaste and observant and though they bee many, yet can Rachel and Icah, yea ten or twentie of them, agree with a marvellous union intent unto their houshold and other businesse, whereby they are gainefull and not chargeable to their Husbands. When they marry, the Husband covenanteth with the Father of the Maide, who having given him power to take her wheresoever hee shall finde her, hee seeketh her among some of her friends, where shee hath then of purpose hidden her selfe, and by a kin le of force carrieth her away They marry with any except their owne Mother and Sister Their Widdowes sold on a marry, I coause of their service to their former Huslands in another world except the sonne marrie his fath is wise, or the bro her his brothers, because they can there in the next world bee content to resigne them to their former Husbands againe. The women buy, ell, and provide all necessaries into the house, the nich intending nothing but their Armes. Hunting. and Hawling If one hath buried a Male child, and ant her a Female, the Parents contract a marriage bet just those two, and printing in papers, Servants, Hores Clothes, and Houshold, and making writings for the confirmation of the Dower, burne these things in the are, is the smoake whereof they (in their smokie concuts) imagine all these things to be carried and con firmed to their children in the other world Parents of the two dead parties claime kindred each of other as if they indeed had married their children while they lived

In Yamdu did Cublai Can build a stately Palace, encompa ing sixteene mile of plame ground with a wall, wherein are fertile Meddowes, pleasant Springs, de lightfull Streames, and all sorts of beasts of chase and tame, and in the middest thereof a sumptious house of pleasure, which may be removed from place to place Here hee doth abide in the moneths of June, July, and August, on the eight and twentieth day whereof, hee leparteth thence to another place to doc sacrifice on this minner He hath a Heard or Drove of Horses and Marcs, about ten thousand, as white as snow, of the malke whereof none may taste, except her bee of the Houd of Cingis Can Yea, the Tartars doe these beasts great reverence, nor dare any crosse their way, or god before them. According to the direction of his Astrologers or Magicians, he on the cight and twentieth of August aforesaid, spendeth and poureth forth with his owne hands the milke of these Mares in the avre and on the earth, to give drinke to the Spirits and Idols which they wor hip, that the, may preserve the men, women, leasts, birds, corne, and other things growing on the earth

These Astrologers, or Necromancers, are in their 1rt marvellous. When the skie is cloudy and threatneth raine, they will ascend the roofe of the Palace of the Grand Can, and cause the rame and tempests to fall round about, without touching the said Palace. These which thus doe are called Tebeth and Chesmir, two sorts of holater, which delude the people with opinion of their sanctitie, impuring these workes to their dissembled holines and for this cause they goe in filthy and teastly manner, not earing who seeth them, with dirt on their faces, never v ashing nor combing themselves if any be- condermed to death, they take, dresse, and ente him which they doe not if any die naturally are also called Buchsi, that is, of such a Religion or Order, as it one should by a brief Preacher, or Minor, and are exceedingly expert in their divelle h Art. Purchas in praise of the sea is more eloquent than his wont

Concerning the commodities of the Sea, as the world generally, so the little models of the world, the Ilands (whereof this of Great Britaine is justly acknowledged the most excellent of the world, sometime accounted at other world have great cause to celebrate and acknow ledge the same. It is a Wall of Defence about our shoares, Great Purveyour of the Worlds commodities to our use, Conveyour of the surquedry and excesses of Rivers, Uniter (by traffique) of Nations which it selfe severeth, an Open Field for pastimes of peace, a Pitched Field in time of warre, disdaining single personall Combates, and only receiving whole Cities and Castles, encompassed with walls of Wood, which it setteth together with deadly hatred and dreadfullest force of the Elements, the Fiere thunders, 1111e blasts. Watrie billowes, rockes, shelves and bottomes of the Earth, all conspiring to build heere a house for Death, which by fight or thight on land is more easily avoyded (and how did it scorne the Incincible title of the Spanish Thet in SS, and effect thus much on our behalfe against them?) The Sea yeeldeth I ish for dyet, Pearles and other lewels for ornament, Varietie of creatures for use and admiration, Refuge to the distressed, compendious Way to the Passingers, and Portage to the Merchant, Customes to the Prince, Springs to the Earth, Clouds to the Skie, matter of Contemplation to the minde, of Action to the bodie. Once, it yeeldeth all parts of the World to each part, and maketh the World (as this Treatise in part sheweth) knowne to it selfe. Supersti tion hath had her Sex prophets which have found out other Sea profits, as for the purging of sinnes and the Roman Divines caused Hermaphrodites to be carried to the Ser for expiation, the Persian Magi thought it pollution to spit or doc other naturall necessities therein But of these in divers places

George Sandy 5 (1578-1644), the seventh son of the Archbishop of York, was born at Bishopthorpe, and studied at St Mary Hall, Oxford. He undertook a long journes, of which he published an account in 1615, entitled A Relation of a Journey begin an. Dom 1610 Foure Bookes, containing a Discription of the Turkish Empire, of Agypt, of the Holy Land, of the Remote Parts of Italy, and Ilands adjoyning He settled in Virginia in 1621-31, and there completed his translation of Ovid's Metamorphoses (1621-26), after his return he lived chiefly at Boyley Abbey, near Maidstone. He also translated the Psalms, and paraphrased other passages of Scripture Dryden is more in the right about Sandys than ibout Chapman when, after condemning Chapman's Homer, he says 'And no better than thus has Ovid been served by the so much admired Sandys' His book of travels reached a seventh edition in 1673, a success not undeserved by the author's varied expemences, his acute observation, and his shrewd and pointed comments Wost modern readers could dispense with the very exhaustive citations and translations from all the classical writers about any place he came to or even passed in his journey from Venice by the Ionian Islands and the Archipelago to Constantinople, by sea to Egypt, across the desert with a caravan to Palestine, and so back by Malta to Naples Constantinople and its buildings, the government and manners of the Furks, are expounded with as much fullness as the history and peculiarities of Egypt. He explored the Great Pyramid and described his experiences within, and took elaborate measurements of the sacred buildings at Jerusalem, especially of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre The account of the experiments with the dog in the Grotto del Cane, of the cave of the Cumrean sibyl, and of the Lacus Avernus would still serve for a guide to the environs of Naples And the numerous copperplate engravings seem to be from drawings specially made on the spot. Thus he describes his passage from Sicily by the Lipari Islands to the Calabrian coasts, with an account of tarantula spiders and other Calabrian specialties

Of these there were seven (but now are eleven) almost of an equall magnitude Yet Liparia is the greatest (being ten miles in circuite) as also the most famous, to which the other were subject fruitful, and abounding with bitumen, sulphur, and allume, having also hot baths, much frequented by the diseased. In the yeere 1544 it was depopulated by the Turk but Charles the fifth re planted it with Spaniards, and fortified the place. The hirchere went out about an age ago, having (as is to be supposed) consumed the matter that fed it. Vulcano and Strombolo (of which we will onely speak) do now Vulcano receiveth that name from his onely burne nature, conscerated formerly to Vulcan, and called his mansion. It is said but first to have appeared above water about the time that Scipio Africanus died barren Ilan I, stony, and uninhabited It had three tunnels whereat it evaporated fire, but now hath but one out of which it smoketh continually, and casts out stones with a horrible roaring. In the yeere of our Lord 1444 on the fifth of February, it flumed so abundantly, and flung forth are and stones with such an hideous noyse, that not only the rest of the Ilands, but all Sicilia trembled thereat. Perhaps the last blaze, for now flame it doth not, but retaineth the rest of his terrors. Now Strombolo, called formerly Strongyle, of the rotundity thereof (for all is no other then a high round mountaine) doth burne almost continually at the top like a Beacon, and exceeding electely so that by night it is to be dis cerned a wonderfull way. These places (and such like) are commonly affirmed by the Romane Catholickes to be the jawes of hell & that within the damned soules are tormented. It was told me at Naples by a countreyman of ours and an old pentioner of the Popes, who was a youth in the daves of King Henry, that it was then generally bruited thorowout Lingland, that master Gresham, a merchant, setting saile from Palermo (where there then dwelt one Anthonio called the Rich, who at one time had 2 kingdomes morgaged unto him by the King of Spaine), being crossed by contrary winds, was constrained to anchor under the lee of this Iland. Now about mid day, when for certaine houres it accustomedly forbeareth to flame, he ascended the mountaine with eight of the sailers and approching as neere the vent as they durst, amongst other noises they heard a voice crie aloud, Dispatch, dispatch, the rich Antonio is a comming Terrified herewith they descended and anon the mountaine againe evaporated fire. But from so dismall a place they made all the haste that they could when the winds still thwarting their course, and desiring much to know more of this matter, they returned to Palermo And forthwith enquiring of Antonio, it was told them that he was dead, and computing the time, did finde it to agree with the very instant that the voice was heard by them. Gresham reported this at his returne to the King and the mariners being called before him confirmed by oath the narration. In Gresham himselfe, as this Gentleman said (for I no otherwise report it), it wrought so deepe an impression that he gave over all traffique distributing his goods, a part to his kinsfolke & the rest to good uses, retaining onely a competency for himselfe and so spent the rest of his life in a solitary devotion

All the day following we staid at Scylla, the winds not favouring us. My Spanish comrads were very harsh to me (for in these parts they detest the English, & think us not Christian), but when upon their demand I told them that I was no Lutheran, they exceeded on the other side in their courtesy. One of them had bin in the voiage of eighty eight and would say that it was not we but the windes that overthrow them. On the third of July we departed, and landed that night at Aupage Here about (as throughout this part of Calabria) are great store of Tarantulas a serpent peculiar to this countrey, and taking that name from the Citie of Farentum. Some hold them to be of the kind of spiders, others of effts, but they are greater then the one, and lesse then the other, and (if that were a Tarantula which I have seene) not greatly resembling either. For the head of this was smal, the legs slender and knottic, the bodie light, the taile spiny, and the colour dun, intermixed with spots of a sullied white They lurke in sinkes, and privies, and abroad in the slimy fifth betweene furrowes, for which cause the country people doc reape in bootes. The sting is deadly, and the contrary operations thereof most miraculous. For some so stung, are still oppressed with a leaden sleepe others are vexed with continued waking, some fling up and downe, and others are extremely lazy He sweats, a second vonuts, a third runnes mad weepe continually, and some laugh continually, and that is the most usuall. Insomuch that it is an ordinary saying to a man that is extraordinarily merric, that he hath bene stung by a Tarantula. Hercupon not a few have thought, that there are as many kindes of Taran tulas, as severall affections in the infected But as over liberall cups doe not worke with all in one manner, but according to each mans nature and constitution some weepe, some laugh, some are tongue tide, some all tongue, some sleepe, some leape over tables, some kisse, and some quarrell even so it falles out with those that The merry, the mad, and otherwise actively are bitten disposed, are cured by musicke, at least it is the cause, in that it incites them to dance indefatigably for by labour and sweate the poyson is expelled And musicke also by a certaine high excellency hath bene found by experience to stirre in the sad and drowsie so strange an alacritie, that they have wearied the spectators with continued dancing. In the meane time the paine hath asswaged, the infection being driven from the heart. and the mind released of her sufferance If the musicke intermit the maladic renewes, but againe continued and And objects of wonder have wrought the it vanislicth same effects in the franticke. A Bishop of this countrey passing in the high way, and clothed in red one bit by a Tarantula, hooting thereat, fell a dancing about him The offended Bishop commanded that he should be kept backe, and made haste away. But the people did instantly intreate him to have compassion of the poore distressed wretch, who would forthwith die, unlesse he stood still and suffered him to continue in that exercise or importunity enforced him to stay, untill by dancing certaine houres together the afflicted person became per feetly cured

The fourth of July we rowed against the wind, and could reach no further then Castilion where the high wrought seas detained us the day following churlish Oast, because we sent for such things to the towne whereof he had none, made us also fetch our water from thence, it being a mile off though he had in his house a plentifull fountaine And I thinke there are not that professe. Christ a more uncivil people then the vulgar Calabrians Over land there is no travel ling without assured pillage, and hardly to be avoided murder, although all that you have about you (and that they know it) be not worth a Dollar Wherefore the common passage is by sea, in this manner as we passed now. Along the snore there are many of these Ostarias but most of the tovines are a good way removed, and mounted on hils with not easic accesses Divers small forts adjoyne to the sca, and watch towers thorowout For the Turkes not seldome made incursions by night lurking in the day time about those unin habited Hands. Under these forts we nightly haled up our boate, and slept in our clothes on the sand our fare was little better then our lodging onions, cucumbers and melons being our ordinary viands. Not but that we might have had better but the souldiers were thriftie, and I was loth to exceed them I or there being but onely one house at a place, they sold every thing, not according to the worth, but to the neces sitic of the buyer. But Mulberries we might gather, & eate of free cost dangerously unwholesome if not pulled from the trees before Sunne rise. Of them there are here every where an infinite number in so much that more silke is made in Calabria then besides in all Italie from the leaves of those that grow higher on the mountaines (for the Appenine stretcheth along the midst of this countrey) the j gather plenty of Manna, the best of all other which falls thereon like a dew in the night l time. Here a certaine Calabrian hearing that I was an English man, came to me, and would needs persivade me that I had insight in magicke for that Earle Bothel was my countryman, who lives at Naples, and is in those parts famous for suspected negromancie. He told me that he had treasure hidden in his, house, the quantitic and qualitic shewne him by a boy, upon the conjuration of a Knight of Malta, and offered to share it betweeneus, if I could helpe him unto it. But I answered, that in England we were at defiance with the divell, and that he would do nothing for us

The solare of eighty eight is the Spanish Armadic of that year, the tarantula is really a large and venemous spider, the effects of whose bite have been grouly exangerated—tarantism, or the dancing mining, was appirently a hysterical affection, ostaria [sie] is a bottlery, the fifth Earl of Lothwell the nephew of Queen Mary's Bothwell, died at Naples in great poverty in 1624, after a life of hare bruned adventure

Thomas Coryate (1577?-1617) was born at Odcombe, Somersetshire, entered Gloucester Hall, Oxford, in 1596, but left without a degree, ind after James I's recession lived by his wits about In 1608 he set out on a rambling journe, on the Continent, passing through Paris, Lyons, Furin, Venice, Zurich, Strasburg, Worms, Speier, Cologne, &c, and returning five months later with a record of 1975 miles, mostly on foot. His entertaining journal was it last published in 1611, with a collection of commenditory verses, as Coryal's Crudities Hastily gobled up in Five Moneths Travells in France, Savoy, Italy, Rhetia, Helvetia, High Germanie, and the Netherlands Next year, after dedicating his travel-worn shoes in his native church, he started again on his travels, visited Constantinople, Greece, Smyrpa, Alexandria, and the Hol, Land, and found his way by caravan to Mesopotamia, thence through Persia and Afghanistan to Agra, where he arrived in October 1616 In the December of the following year he died at Surat The name Condities does injustice to his record of his Continental tour, for though Coryate was scatter brained, conceited, and pragmitical, he was a shrewd observer and something of a scholar, and in 'meteing' churches, describing monuments, and copying inscriptions of all kinds verbatim, he took vastly more trouble than the average modern globe-trotter, and his book, though lop-sided enough, contains much quaint and interesting information He notes his first sight of storks and ostriches, of table forks and umbrellas, his first experience of frogs as a dainty, and his modified approval of German He is careful to tell all the famous men any place has given birth to or sheltered, and digests the substance of its medicial history from Sebastian Munster or other learned vriter The story of William Iell and the Swiss rising against the Austri ins he gives partly from Munster, partly from the oral communications of Switzers At Strasburg he describes at great length the towers and spire of the cathedral, and the famous clock Like contemporary Englishmen, he had a great abhorrence of popery, but seems to have

Bishop Hatto

But the third thing that is reported of this towne [Bing, 1 e Bingen] is a thing passing memorable and very worthy the observation, such a wondrous and rare acci dent as I never read or heard of the like before There fore I will relate it in this place out of Munster, for one of the most notable examples of Gods justice that ever was extant in the whole world since the first creation It hapned in the yeare 914 that there was an exceeding famine in Germany, at what time Otho, surnamed the Great, was emperor, and one Hatto, once Abbot of Tulda, was Archbishop of Mentz, of the bishops after Crescens or Crescentius the two and thirtieth, of the archbishops after St Bonifacius the thirteenth This Hatto, in the time of this great famine before mentioned, when he saw the poore people of the country exceedingly oppressed with famine, assembled a great company of them together into a barne, and like a most accursed & mercilesse cartiffe burnt up those poore innocent soules, that were so farre from doubt ing any such matter, that they rather hoped to have received some comfort and relicf at his hands reason that moved the prelate to commit that execrable implety was because he thought that the famine would the sooner cease, if those unprofitable beggars that con sumed more bread then they were worthy to eate were dispatched out of the world. For he said that these poore folkes were like to mice, that were good for nothing but to devour corne. But Almighty God, the just revenger of the poore folks quarrel, did not long suffer this hainous tyranny, this most detestable fact unpunished. For he mustered up an army of mice against the archbishop, and sent them to persecute him as his furious Alastors, so that they afflicted him both day and night, and would not suffer him to take his rest in any place. Whereupon the prelate thinking that he should be secure from the injury of mice if he were in a certaine tower that standeth in the Rhene neere to the towne, betooke himself unto the said tower as to a safe refuge and sanctuary from his enemies, and locked himselfe in But the innumerable troupes of mice continually chaced him very eagerly, and swumme unto him upon the top of the water to execute the just judgement of God, and so at last he was most miserably devoured by those silly creatures, who pursued him with such bitter hostility, that it is recorded they scraped and gnawed off his very name from the walls and tapestry wherein it was written, after they had so cruelly devoured his bodie Wherefore the tower in which he was eaten up by the mice is shewed to this day for a perpetuall monument to al succeeding ages of the barbarous and inhuman tyranny of that impious prelate, being situate in a little greene iland in the middest of the Rheene, neere to this towne of Bing, and is commonly called in the Germane tongue the Mowse turn [Ger Maüse thurm, 'mouse tower,' probably a corruption of Mauth thurm, 'tax tower'].

Pronunciation of Latin.

I observed another thing also in the Italians pro nouncing of the Latin tongue, which though I might have mentioned before in the description of some of the other Italian cities, yet seing I have hitherto omitted it, I will here make mention thereof rather then not at al, because this is the last city [Bergamo] of Italy that I shall describe in this journey The Italian when he uttereth any Latin v ord wherein this letter 2 is to be pronounced long, doth alwaies pronounce it as a double e, viz as co. As for example he pronounceth feedes for fides reeta for vita americus for amicus, &c., but where the t is not to be pronounced long he uttereth it as we doe in Lightnd, as in these wordes, impius, aquila, patria, Ecclesia not aquicela, patrica, Lecleseea And this pronunciation is so generall in all Italy that every man which speaketh Latin soundeth a double e for an i Neither is it proper to Italy only, but to all other nations whatsoever in Christen dome saving to England For whereas in my trivels I discoursed in Latin with Frenchmen, Germans, Spaniards, Danes, Polonians, Succians, and divers others, I observed that every one with whom I had any conference, pronounced the after the same manner that the Italians use Neither would some of them (amongst whom I was not a little inquisitive for the reason of this their pronunciation) sticle to affirme that Plautus, Terence, Cicero, Hortensius, Cresar, and those other selected flowers of eloquence amongst the auncient Romans, pronounced the i in that sort as they themselves doe. Whereupon having observed such a generall consent amongst them in the pronunciation of this letter, I have thought good to imitate these nations herein, and to abandon my old English pronunciation of vita, fides, and amicus, as being utterly dissonant from the sound of all other nations, and have determined (God willing) to retayne the same till my dying day

John Taylor (1580-1653), a London waterman, who styled himself 'The King's Majesty's Water Poct,' was one of the most voluminous of city rhymesters A native of Gloucester, he became a waterman in London, but was impressed into the navy and served at the siege of Cadiz. He resumed plying on the Thames, then kept a public-house at Oxford, and latterly an inn in London The most memorable incident in his career was travelling in 1618 on foot from London to Edinburgh, 'not carrying any money to or fro, neither begging, borrowing, or asking meat, drink, or lodging' He took with him, however, a servant on horseback, and contrived to get an extraordinary amount of hospitality, good-will, and good cheer From Ben Jonson, whom he met at Leith, he received a present of 'a piece of gold of two and twenty shillings to drink his health in England' He made also a considerable excursion into the north of Scotland, as the Earl of Mar's guest in Braemar Of this journey Taylor wrote an account, entitled The Penniless Pilgrimage, or the Moneyless Perambulation of John Taylor, alias the King's Majesty's Water Poet, &c 1618 This tract is partly in prose and partly in verse. Of the latter, the following is a favourable specimen

In the Borders

Eight miles from Carlisle runs a little river, Which England's bounds from Scotland's grounds doth sever

Without horse, bridge, or boat I o'er did get, On foot I went, yet scarce my shoes did wet in Kent, by a Mr Roger Bird and himself in a preposterous boat made of brown paper 1630 he made a collection of these pieces All the Workes of John Taylor, the Water Poet, being Sixty and Three in Number He continued, however, to write during more than twenty years after this period, and ultimately his works consisted of not less than one hundred and thirty-eight separate Taylor was a staunch royalist and publications orthodox Churchman, abjuring all sectaties and There is nothing in his works, as schismatics Southey remarks, which deserves preservation for its intrinsic merit alone, but there is some natural humour, much small jingling wit, and a great deal to illustrate the manners of his age. A complete reprint of his works was issued by the Spenser Society in 1868–78

Richard Corbet (1582-1635) was the son of a Ewell gardener who is commended in Ben Jonson's Underwoods Educated at Westminster School and Broadgates Hall (Pembroke Col lege), Oxford, he took orders, and became Dean of Christ Church (1620), Bishop of Oxford (1624), and Bishop of Norwich (1632) The social qualities of witty Bishop Corbet and his never-fuling vivacity, joined to a moderate share of dislike to the Puritans, recommended him to the patronage of King James, to whom he owed his mitre Jonson loved him well, as also his father, 'my dear Vincent Corbet,' whom he commemorated Bishop's habits were rather too convivial for the dignity of his office, if we may credit some of the mecdotes which have been told of him market-day at Abingdon, meeting a ballad-singer who complained he could get no custom, the jolly Doctor put off his gown and arrayed himself in the leathern jacket of the itinerant vocalist, and being a handsome man, with a clear, full voice, he presently vended the whole stock of ballads Once at a confirmation, the country people pressing in to see the ceremony, Corbet exclaimed, 'Bear off there, or I'll confirm ye with my staff' And sometimes, by Aubrey's telling, he 'would take the key of the wine-cellar, and he and his chaplain, Dr Lushington, would go and lock themselves in and be merry Then first he layes down his episcopal hat-"There lyes the Dr" Then he putts off his gowne-"There lyes the bishop" Then 'twas "Here's to thee, Corbet," and "Here's to thee, Lushington"' Jovialities such as these seem more like the feats of the jolly Friar of Copmanhurst than the acts of a Protestant bishop, but Corbet had higher qualities, his toleration, solid sense, and lively talents procured him esteem His poems, many of which are little better than rollicking doggerel, were first collected and published in 1647 (4th ed by Octavius Gilchrist, 1807). They are of a miscellaneous character, the best known being a Journey to France, the Iter Borrale (the tour of four students in the Midlands to the north of Oxford), and the Farewell to the Fairies

To Vincent Corbet, his Son.

What I shall leave thee, none can tell, But all shall say I wish thee well I wish thee, Vin, before all wealth, Both bodily and ghostly health, Nor too much wealth nor wit come to thee, So much of either may undo thee I wish thee learning, not for show, Enough for to instruct and know, Not such as gentlemen require To prate at table or at fire I wish thee all thy mother's graces, Thy father's fortunes and his places I wish thee friends, and one at court, Not to build on, but support, Lo keep thee not in doing many Oppressions, but from suffering any I wish thee peace in all thy ways, Nor lazy nor contentious days, And, when thy soul and body part, As innocent as now thou art

From the 'Journey to France'

I went from England into France,
Nor yet to learn to cringe nor dance,
Nor yet to ride or fence
Nor did I go like one of those That do return with half a nose
They carried from hence

But I to Paris rode along,

Much like John Dory in the song,

Upon a holy tide

I on an ambling nag did get—

I trust he is not paid for yet—

And spurred him on each side

And to Saint Dennis fast we came,
To see the sights of Nostre Dame—
The man that shews them snuffles—
Where who is apt for to believe,
May see our Lady's right arm sleeve,
And cke her old pantofles,

Her breast, her milk, her very gown
That she did wear in Bethlehem town,
When in the inn she lay
Yet all the world knows that 's a fable,
For so good clothes ne'er lay in stable,
Upon a lock of hay

There is one of the cross's nails,
Which whoso sees his bonnet vails,
And, if he will, may kneel
Some say 'twas false, 'twas never so,
Yet, feeling it, thus much I know,
It is as true as steel

There is a lanthorn which the Jews, When Judas led them forth, did use, It weighs my weight downright But, to believe it, you must think The Jews did put a candle in 't, And then 'twis very light

There's one saint there hath lost his nose Another's head, but not his toes, His elbow and his thumb But when that we had seen the rags, We went to th' mn and took our nags, And so away did come.

We came to Paris on the Seine,
'Tis wondrous fair, 'tis nothing clean,
'Tis Europe's greatest town
How strong it is, I need not tell it,
For all the world may easily smell it,
That walk it up and down.

There many strange things are to see,
The Palace and great Gallery
The Place Royal doth excel
The New Bridge, and the statues there,
At Nostre Dame, Saint Q Pater,
The steeple bears the bell

For learning, th' Universitie,
And, for old clothes, the Frippery
The House the Queen did build
Saint Innocents, whose earth devours
Dead corpse in four and twenty hours,
And there the King was killed

'John Dory was the hero of a rather pointless ballad, still popular in Dryden's days beginning

As it fell upon a holy-day
And upon a holy tide-a
John Dory bought him an ambling nag,
To Paris for to ride-a.

Corbet's visit to Paris was in 1618—the curiosities he describes including, for example the milk and the lanthorn at St. Denis, the unfinished palace of the queen-dowager and the sights or Paris, the unfinished palace of the queen-dowager and the sights or Paris, generally, are described at more length by Peter Heylin in France failured to the Life the outcome of a visit to France in 1025. The king slain (in 1610) at the Church of the Holy Innocents was Henry IV—the extraordinarily absorptive virtue of the earth in that churchyard was an article of faith and is referred to by Sir Thomas Browne in Urn burial (see below). The mysterious Saint Q Pater of Notre Dame, unexplained in the editions must be a misreading of the contracted MS—St Nofer for St Christopher, the colosisal figure which for hundreds of years was a chief curiosity of Notre Dame and as such was duly described by Heylin, Coryate, and other English travellers. The bell the great bourdon of Notre Dame—was, and still is another

Farewell to the Fairles

Farewell rewards and fairies,
Cood housewives now may say,
For now foul sluts in dairies
Do fare as well as they
And though they sweep their hearths no less Than maids were wont to do,
Yet who of late for cleanliness
Finds sixpence in her shoe?

Lament, lament, old abbeys,
The fairies lost command,
They did but change priests' babies,
But some have changed your land,
And all your children sprung from thence
Are now grown Puritans,
Who live as changelings ever since,
For love of your domains.

At morning and at evening both,
You merry were and glad
So little care of slep or sloth
These pretty ladies had,
When Tom came home from labour,
Or Cis to milking rose,
Then merrily went their tabour,
And nimbly went their toes.

Witness those rings and roundelays
Of theirs, which yet remain,
Were footed in Queen Mary's days
On many a grassy plain,
But since of late Elizabeth
And later, James came in,
They never danced on any heath
As when the time hath been

By which we note the fairies
Were of the old profession,
Their songs were Ave Maries,
Their dances were procession
But now, alas! they all are dead,
Or gone beyond the seas,
Or farther for religion fled,
Or else they take their ease.

A tell tale in their company
They never could endure,
And whoso kept not secretly
Their mirth was punished sure,
It was a just and Christian deed,
To pinch such black and blue
Oh, how the commonwealth doth need
Such justices as you!

Sir Robert Naunton (1563–1635), born at Alderton, Woodbridge, became public orator at Cambridge in 1594, travelled four or more years on the Continent, went with an embassive to Denmark in 1603, entered Parliament in 1606, and was Secretary of State 1618–23. He died at his Suffolk seat, Letheringham Priory His Fragmenta Regulia (1641) is sketches of Elizabeth's courtiers See his Memoirs (1814)

Queen Elizabeth.

Under Edward [VI] she was his, and one of the darlings of fortune for besides the consideration of bloud, there was between these two princes a concurrency and sympathy in their natures and affections, together with the celestiall (conformity in religion) which made them one, and friends, for the king ever called her his sweetest and dearest sister, and was scarce his own man. she being absent, which was not so between him and the Lady Mary Under his sister she found her condition much altered for it was resolved, and her destiny had decreed to set her an apprentice in the school of affliction. and to draw her through the ordeall fire of tryall, the better to mould and fashion her to rule and soveraignty, which finished, and fortune calling to mind that the time of her servitude was expired, gave up her indentures, and therewith delivered up into her custody a scepter as a reward for her patience, which was about the twenty sixth year of her age, a time in which (as for externals) she was full blown, so was she for her internals grown ripe, and seasoned with adversity, and in the exercise of her vertue, for it seems fortune meant no more than to shew her a piece of her variety and changeablenesse of her nature, and so to conduct her to her destined felicity She was of personage tall, of hair and complexion fair, and therewith well favoured, but high nosed, of limbs and feature neat, and which added to the lustre of those exteriour graces, of stately and majestick comportment, participating in this more of her father than mother, who was of inferiour allay, plausible, or as the French hath it, more debonaire and affable, vertues which might well suit with migesty, and which descending is hereditary to the daughter, did render of a more sweeter temper, and endeared her more to the love and liking of the people, who gave her the name and fame of a most gracious and popular prince, the atrocity of her fathers nature being rebated in hers by the mothers sweeter inclinations. For to take, and that no more than, the character out of his own mouth, he never spared man in his anger, nor woman in his lust

Sir Walter Raleigh

He had in the outward man a good presence, in a handsome and well compacted person, a strong naturall wit, and a better judgement, with a bold and plausible tongue, whereby he could set out his parts to the best advantage, and to these he had the adjuncts of some generall learning, which by diligence he enforced to a great augmentation and perfection, for he was an indefatigable reader, whether by sea or land, and none of the least observers both of men and the times, and I am confident, that among the second causes of his growth, that variance between him and my Lord Grey in his descent into Ireland was a principall, for it drew them both over the councell table, there to plead their cause, where (what advantage he had in the cause, I know not) but he had much better in the telling of his tale, and so much, that the Queen and the lords took no slight mark of the man, and his parts, for from thence he came to be known, and to have accesse to the Queen and the lords, and then we are not to doubt how such a man would comply and learn the way of progression whether Lucester had then cast in a good word for him to the Queen, which would have done no harm, I doc not determine but true it is, he had gotten the Queens earc at a trice, and she began to be taken with his clocution, and loved to hear his reasons to her demands and the truth is, she took him for a kind of oracle, which netled them all, yea, those that he relyed on began to take his suddain favour as an allarum, and to be sensible of their own supplantation, and to project his, which made him shortly after sing, I ortune my foe, we that finding his favour declining, and falling into a recesse, he undertook a new percentation, to leave that terra infirma of the court for that of the warres, and by de chang himself and by absence to expell his and the passion of his enemies, which in court was a strange device of recovery, but that he knew there was some ill office done him, that he durst not attempt to mind any other wayes than by going aside, thereby to teach envy a new way of forgetfulnesse, and not so much as to think of him, howsoever, he had it alwayes in mind never to forget himself, and his device took so well that at his return he came in (as rammes doe, by going backward) with the greater strength, and so continued to her last, great in her grace, and Captain of the Guard, where I must leave him, but with this observation, that though he gained much at the court, yet he took it not out of the Exchequer or meerly out of the Queens purse, but by his wit and the help of the prerogative, for the Queen was never profuse in the delivering out of her treasure, but payed many, and most of her servants, part in money and the rest with grace, which as the case stood was taken for good payment, leaving the arrear of recompence due to their merit to her great successor, who payed them all with advantage

Thomas Middleton (1570?-1627), a prolific but extraordinarily unequal dramatist, was a Londoner, as city chronologer (from 1620) wrote a chronicle of the city, now lost, and some civic pagcants, and left over twenty plays, a score of page ints and masques, a par iphrase of the Wisdom of Solomon, six sittres, and a number of prose pieces Blurt, Master Constable (1602), is a light comedy Father Hubbard's Tale and The Black Book are tracts exposing London rogues Honest Whore was mainly written by Dekker The Phanix and Michaelmas Term (1607) are lively comedies, A Trick to catch the Old One (1608) and A Mad World, my Masters (from which Aphra Behn pilfered), are perhaps more amusing The Roaring Girl (1611, with Dckker) describes the exploits of a noted cut purse and virago A Chaste Maid in Cheapside was probably produced in 1613, as was No Wit, No Help like a Woman's A Fair Quarrel (1617) and The World Tost at Fennis (1620) were written in conjunction with Rowley, as were probably More Dissemblers besides Women (1622?) and The Mayor of Quinborough Law is mainly the work of Rowley, supplemented by Middleton, and revised by Massinger - The fact that I he Witch (published by Reed in 1778 from the author's MS) contains in full two songs of which only the first lines are given in Macbeth (see below at page 461) has been explained by the theory that they were originally by Middleton and were introduced into later acting editions of Macbeth (They are given in full in D'Avenant's altered version of Macbeth) Mr Bullen and Professor Herford hold it almost certain that Middleton here imitated and expanded Shakespeare, or the song Shakespeare referred to in his stage directions. The date of the Witch is unknown, and it may have preceded Macbeth, but it is vastly more probable that the lesser author was the imitator In The Changeling, The Spanish Gipsy, and Women beware Women (in the first two of which at least Rowley had a share) Middleton's genius is seen at its best. The Widow was mainly by Middleton Anything for a Quiet Life (c 1619) may have been revised by Middleton contributed to some of the plays included in the works of Beaumont and Fletcher

The Game at Chess (1624) provoked enormous interest, but gave great offence at court by bringing on the stage the king of Spain and his ambassador, Gondomar, as well as James himself and English politicians. Gondomar's successor complained to King James of the insult, and Middleton—who at first 'shifted out of the way'—and the players were brought before the Privy Council and sharply reprimanded for their audicity in 'bringing modern Christian kings upon the stage'. The Induction was spoken by Loyola and his intimate acquaintance Error. James was the White King, the Black King was Philip IV, Gondomar the Black Knight, the White Queen's Pawn is the Church of England, and so forth.

The Black Knight uses great freedom of speech, and not obscurely indicates that he has wheedled and duped the White King for his own ends

Middleton is great in single scenes, and is a versatile and ingenious writer, a keen observer and saturist of London life and London types But he repeats the same character under different names, interests rather than charms or fascinates, and is sometimes distinctly tedious beware IVomen is a tale of love and jealousy The 'rage and madness of from the Italian women crossed,' 'hell-bred malice and strife,' constitute the principal material of a somewhat cynical representation, but the following sketch of married happiness is admirably realised

How near am I now to a happiness That earth exceeds not ' not another like it The treasures of the deep are not so precious As are the conceal'd comforts of a man Lock'd up in woman's love I scent the air Of blessing, when I come but near the house What a delicious breath marriage sends forth! The violet bed's not sveeter Honest wedlock Is lil e a banqueting house built in a garden, On which the spring's chaste flowers take delight To cast their modest odours, when base lust, With all her powders, paintings, and best pride, Is but a fair house built by a ditch side

Now for a welcome Able to draw men's envies upon man, A kiss now, that will hang upon my lip As sweet as morning dew upon a rose, And full as long

The blank verse is some of it very unrhythmical and irregular, it is difficult sometimes to know whether the lines are meant for verse or prose

Yet Mr Bullen agrees with an anonymous critic that, 'in daring and happy concentration of imagery and a certain imperial confidence in the use of words, he of all the dramatists of that time is the disciple that comes nearest the master' And he holds that the colloquy between Beatrice and De Flores in the Changeling 'testifies beyond dispute that in dealing with a situation of sheer passion none of Shakespeare's followers trod so closely in the master's steps' 'Neither Webster nor Cyril Tourneur nor Ford has given us any scene so profoundly impressive, so absolutely meffaceable, so Shakespearean,' though 'as an artistic whole the Changeling cannot challenge comparison with The Maid's Tragedy, The Broken Heart, or The Duchess of Malfi' But 'if the Changeling, Women beware Women, the Spanish Gipsy, and A Fair Quarrel do not justify Middleton's claims to be considered a great artist,' Mr Bullen 'knows not which of Shakespeare's followers is worthy of the title.' In the Changeling, Beatrice, daughter of Vermandero, is betrothed to Alonzo de Piracquo ere she sees and loves Alscmero, a new-comer to her father's castle. She regards Alonzo with loathing, and reveals her hatred to De Flores, a poor gentleman in her | For the life blood of man? is any thing father's service, who passionately loves her Zealous to do her a service, De Flores assassinates Alonzo, and hopes not for gold or jewels, but for Beatrice's

From 'The Changeling'

De Flores My thoughts are at a banquet, for the deed, I feel no weight in 't, 'tis but light and cheap For the sweet recompense that I set down for't [Aside Beatrice De Flores!

D. F Lady?

Beat Thy looks promise cheerfully

De F All things are answerable, time, circumstance, Your wishes, and my service

Beat Is it done, then?

De F Piracquo is no more

Beat My joys start at mme eyes, our sweet'st delights Are evermore born weeping

De I I've a token for you

Beat For me?

De T But it was sent somewhat unwillingly, I could not get the ring without the finger

[Holding out Alonzo's finger with the ring on it

Beat Bless mc, what hast thou done?

 $De \Gamma$ Why, is that more

Than killing the whole man? I cut his heart strings A greedy hand thrust in a dish at court, In a mistake hath had as much as this.

Beat 'Tis the first token my father made me send him. $De\ \Gamma$ And I have made him send it back again For his last token, I was loath to leave it, And I'm sure dead men have no use of jewels.

He was as loath to part with 't, for it stuck As if the flesh and it were both one substance.

Beat At the stag's fall, the keeper has his fees. 'I is soon applied, all dead men's fees are yours, sir I pray, bury the finger, but the stone I ou may make use on shortly, the true value, Take 't of my truth, is near three hundred ducats

De I 'Twill hardly buy a capcase for one's conscience To keep it from the worm, as fine as 'tis Well, being my fees, I'll take it,

Great men have taught me that, or else my ment Would scorn the way on 't.

It might justly, sir, Why, thou mistak'st, De Flores, 'tis not given In state of recompense

De I No, I hope so, lady, You should soon witness my contempt to t then

Beat Prithec-thou look'st as if thou wert offended De Γ That were strange, lady, 'tis not possible My service should draw such a cause from you Offended! could you think so? that were much

I or one of my performance, and so warm Yet in my service Beat 'Twere misery in me to give you cause, sir

 $De \Gamma$ I know so much, it were so, misery

In her most sharp condition 'Tis resolv'd then, Look you, sir, here's three thousand golden florens,

I have not meanly thought upon thy ment DeF What! salary? now you move me

How, De Flores?

 $De\ F$ Do you place me in the rank of verminous fellows,

To destroy things for wages? offer gold

And were I not resolv'd in my belief Valued too precious for my recompense? That thy virginity were perfect in thee, Beat I understand thee not I could ha' hir'd I should but take my recompense with grudging, As if I had but halfamy hopes I agreed for A journeyman in murder at this rate, Beat Why, 'tis impossible thou canst be so wicked, And mine own conscience might have slept at ease, Or shelter such a cunning cruelty, And have had the work brought home To make his death the murderer of my honour! I'm in a labyrinth, What will content him? I'd fam be rid of him [Aside Thy language is so bold and vicious, I'll double the sum, sir I cannot see which way I can forgive it De F You take a course With any modesty To double my vexation, that's the good you do Push! you forget yourself, $D\iota F$ A woman dipp'd in blood, and talk of modesty! Beat Bless me. I'm now in worse plight than I was, I know not what will please him [Aside]-For my Beat O misery of sin! would I'd been bound Perpetually unto my living hate fear's sake, I prithee, make away with all speed possible, In that Piracquo, than to hear these words! And if thou be'st so modest not to name Think but upon the distance that creation The sum that will content thee, paper blushes not, Set 'twist thy blood and mine, and keep thee there. Send thy demand in writing, it shall follow thee, De I Look but into your conscience, read me there, 'Is a true book, you'll find me there your equal But, prithee, take thy flight De I You must fly too then Push! fly not to your birth, but settle you Beat I? In what the act has made you, you're no more now, De I I'll not stir a foot else You must forget your parentage to me, Beat What's your meaning? You are the deed's creature, by that name De F Why, are not you as guilty? in, I'm sure, You lost your first condition, and I challenge you, As deep as I, and we should stick together As peace and innocency have turn'd you out, Come, your fears counsel you but ill, my absence And made you one with me Would draw suspect upon you instantly, With thee, foul villain! There were no rescue for you. De F Yes, my fair murderess, do you urge me? He speaks home! [Aside Though thou writ'st maid, thou whore in thy affection! De F Nor is it fit we two, engag'd so jointly, 'Twas chang'd from thy first love, and that's a kind Should part and live asunder Of whoredom in the heart, and he's chang'd now Beat How now, sir? To bring thy second on, thy Alsemero, This shews not well Whom, by all sweets that ever darkness tasted, De F What makes your lip so strange? If I enjoy thee not, thou ne'er enjoyest ' This must not be betwixt us I'll blast the hopes and joys of marriage, The man talks wildly! I'll confess all, my life I rate at nothing De F Come, kiss me with a zeal now Beat De Flores! Beat Heaven, I doubt him! [Aside De F I shall rest from all love's plagues then, De F I will not stand so long to beg 'em shortly I live in pain now, that shooting eye Beat Take heed, De Flores, of forgetfulness, Will burn my heart to cinders 'I will soon betray us Beat O sir, hear me $De\ F$ Take you heed first, $De \Gamma$ She that in life and love refuses me, Faith, you're grown much forgetful, you're to blame in't In death and shame my partner she shall be Beat He's bold, and I am blam'd for 't Beat [kneeling] Stay, hear me once for all, I make thee I have eas'd you Of all the wealth I have in gold and jewels. Of your trouble, think on it, I am in pain, Let me go poor unto my bed with honour, And must be eas'd of you, 'tis a charity, And I am rich in all things ! Justice invites your blood to understand me De F Let this silence thee, Beat I dare not The wealth of all Valencia shall not buy Quickly! De F My pleasure from me, Beat O, I never shall! Can you weep Fate from its determin'd purpose? Speak it yet further off, that I may lose So soon may you weep me. What has been spoken, and no sound remain on't, Beat Vengeance begins, I would not hear so much offence again Murder, I see, is follow'd by more sins For such another deed Was my creation in the womb so curst, De FSoft, lady, soft! It must engender with a viper first? The last is not yet paid for O, this act De F [raising her] Come, rise and shroud your Has put me into spirit, I was as greedy on't blushes in my bosom, As the parch'd earth of moisture, when the clouds weep Silence is one of pleasure's best receipts Did you not mark, I wrought myself into 't, Thy peace is wrought for ever in this yielding Nay, sued and kneel'd for 't? why was all that pains took? 'Las, how the turtle pants! thou 'It love anon You see I've thrown contempt upon your gold, What thou so fear'st and faint'st to venture on.

Capcase, band box , push, pish! Your parentage to me, your [high] birth as compared with mine. For 'that shooting eye,

Dyce, followed by Bullen, thinks the author must have written that love shooting eye.

Not that I want it not, for I do piteously,

In order I'll come unto 't, and make use on 't,

But 'twas not held so precious to begin with,

l or I place wealth after the heels of pleasure.

The Witch, an ill constructed play which raises the problems above referred to, has also an Italian plot, apparently from Machiavelli's 'Florentine Histories' through the French Middleton is more at home in describing criminals and ruffians than supernatural beings, and his witches are rather the vulgar hags of popular superstition than the unearthly beings that accost Macbeth on the blasted heath, as Lamb pointed out in an admirable paragraph Shakespeare in Macbeth gives the stage direction, 'Music and a song "Black spirits," &c' The 'Charm-song' of the witches going about the cauldron is thus given by Middleton

Hecate Black spirits and white, red spirits and gray, Mingle, mingle, mingle, you that mingle may!

Fitty, Tiffin,
Keep it stiff in,
Firedrake, Puckey,
Make it lucky,
Liard Robin,
You must bob in,

Round, around, around, about, about '
All ill come running in, all good keep out '

First Witch Here's the blood of a bat

Hec Put in that, O, put in that '

Second Witch Here's libbard's bane

Her Put in again!

Tirst Witch The juice of toad, the oil of adder Sec Witch Those will make the younker madder Hec Put in—there's all—and rid the stench

Firestone Nay, here's three ounces of the red hair'd wench

All the Witches Round, around, &c

The flight of the witches by moonlight is de scribed with vigour and gusto, if the scene was written before Macbeth, Middleton deserves the credit of true poetical imagination

IIecate The moon's a gallant, see how brisk she rides!
Stadlin Here's a rich evening, Hecate

Hec Ay, 1s't not, wenches,

To take a journey of five thousand mile?

Hoppo Ours will be more to night

Hac O'twill be precious!

Heard you the owl yet?

Stad Briefly in the copse,

As we came through now

If a 'Is high time for us then.

Stad There was a bat hung at my lips three times.

As we came through the woods, and drank her fill

Old Puckle saw her

Hec You are fortunate still,

The very screech owl lights upon your shoulder

And woos you, like a pigeon. Are you furnish'd?

Have you your ointments?

Stad. All

Stad.

Hec Prepare to flight then,

I'll overtake you swiftly

Hie thee, Hecate,

We shall be up betimes

Hec I'll reach you quickly

[Exeunt all the Witches except HECATE.

Firestone They are all going a birding to night they talk of fowls i' th' air that fly by day, I am sure they'll be a company of foul sluts there to night if we have not mortality after 't, I 'll be hanged, for they are able to putrefy it, to infect a whole region. She spies me now

Hec What, Firestone, our sweet son?

Fire A little sweeter than some of you, or a dung hill were too good for me [Aside

Ilec How much hast there?

Fire Nineteen, and all brave plump ones, Besides six lizards and three serpentine eggs.

Hec Dear and sweet boy! what herbs hast thou?
Fire. I have some marmartin and mandragon

Hec Marmaritin and mandragora, thou wouldst say
Fire Here's panax too—I thank thee—my pan aches,

With kneeling down to cut 'em

Hec And selago,

Hedge hyssop too how near he goes my cuttings!

Were they all cropt by moonlight?

Fire. Every blade of 'em,

Or I'm a moon calf, mother

Hec Hie thee home with 'em

Look well to the house to night, I'm for aloft

Fire Aloft, quoth you? I would you would break your neck once, that I might have all quickly! [Aside]—Hark, hark, mother! they are above the steeple already, flying over your head with a noise of musicians.

Hec They're they indeed Help, help me, I'm too late else.

Song above

Come away, come away,
Hecate, IIecate, come away!

Hec I come, I come, I come, I come,
With all the speed I may,
With all the speed I may

Where's Stadlin?

Hec Where's Puckle?

[Voice above] Here,

And Hoppo too, and Hellwain too, We lack but you, we lack but you, Come away, make up the count

Hec I will but 'noint, and then I mount

[A Spirit like a cat descends

[Voice above] There's one comes down to fetch his dues,
A kiss, a coll, a sip of blood,

And why thou stay'st so long,

I muse, I muse,

Since the air's so sweet and good

Hec O, art thou come?

What news, what news?

Spirit All goes still to our delight

Either come or else

Refuse, refuse

Hec Now, I'm furnish'd for the flight

Fire Hark, hark, the cat sings a brave treble in her own language !

Hec [going up] Now I go, now I fly, Malkin my sweet spirit and I

O what dainty pleasure 'tis

To ride in the air

When the moon shines fair,

And sing and dance, and toy and kiss! Over woods, high rocks, and mountains,

Over seas, our mistress' fountains, Over steep towers and turrets, We fly by night, 'mongst troops of spirits
No ring of hells to our ears sounds,
No howls of wolves, no yelps of hounds,
No, not the noise of water's breach,
Or cannon's throat our height can reach.
[Voices above] No ring of hells, &c

I copard's bane, mandragora or mandrake, panux (ginseng), selago (lycopolium), and other herbs named have magical or medicinal properties, and serpents eggs or snake-stones (often minimonities, supposed to be petrified snakes or in some my terious way derived from serpents) were sovereign charms from the days of the Druids on

Shakespeare in Macbeth gives merely the direction, 'Song within "Come away, come away," &c' Middleton's works were edited by Dyce (5 vols. 1840) and by Bullen (8 ols 1885-36)

John Marston (1575 -1634), a rough and vigorous satirist and dramatic writer, seems to have been born at Coventry, and studied at Brasenose College, Oxford He must have written all his plays between 1602 and 1607, when he gave up playwriting, took orders, and in 1616 accepted the living of Christchurch in Hampshire The Metamorphosis of Pygmalion's Image (1598), a somewhat licentious poem, was condemned to the flames by Archbishop Whitgift. The Scourge of Villany is mainly uncouth and obscure satire The gloomy and ill constructed tragedies, Antonio and Mellida and Antonio's Revenge (1602), contain passiges of striking power with much fustian The Malcontent (1604), more skilfully constructed, was dedicated to Ben Jonson, between whom and Marston there were many quarrels and reconciliations The Dutch Courtezan (1605) is full of life, Lastward Hoe (1605, written with Chapman and Jonson) is far more genial than any of Marston's own comedies For uncomplimentary allusions to the Scots the authors were imprisoned (see page 402) Parasitaster, or the Fawn (1606), spite of occasional tediousness, is an attractive comedy, Sophonisba (1606) appals with its horrors What You Will (1607) has many flings at Bcn Jonson The rich and graceful poetry scattered through The Insatiate Countesse (1613) is unlike anything in Marston's undoubted works, and was probably added by inother hand

Even in the least admirable passages one stumbles on pregnant thoughts pithily worded, thus in the Dutch Courtezan, on the difference between the lovely courtesan and a wife, an old knight says

Hell and the prodegies of angrie Jove Are not so fearefull to a thinking minde As a man without affection. Why, frend, Philosophie and nature are all one, Love is the center in which all lines close The common bonde of being

Some of the phrasing is wonderfully modern, in spite of intique environment thus 'the fatt's in the fire' alongside of pre-Elizabethan archaism, 'Mr Mulligrub' does not sound Elizabethan, and the courtesan's broken English is not unlike Pennsylvania Dutch In the Insatiate Countesse, a good wish at a wedding is thus worded

O may this knot you knit,
This individual Gordian grasp of hands,
In sight of God soc fairly intermixt,
Never be severed, as Heaven smiles at it,
By all the darts shot by informall Jove!

Coarseness was rather characteristic of Marston his comedies contain strong, biting satire, Hazlitt thought his forte was impatient scorn and bitter indignation against the vices and follies of men, vented either in comic irony or in lofty invective. In IVhat You Will Quadratus introduces a lyrical exposition of his hyper-epicurcan philosophy of life

My fashions knowne out rime take't as you list A fice for the sower brow'd Zoilist

Musicke, tobacco, sack, and sleepe
The tide of sorrow backward keepe.
If thou art sad at others fate,
Rivo, drinke deepe, give care the mate. checkmate
On us the end of time is come,
Fond feare of that we cannot shun,
While quickest sence doth freshly last
Clip time aboute, hug pleasure fast
The sisters revell out our twine,
He that knows little's most devine

Rino, a drinling challenge of doubtful origin, is also used by Shake peare's Prince Hal

The following humorous autobiographical sketch of a scholar and his dog, also from What You Will, in points suggests Goethe's Faust and Browning as well as Shakespeare

I was a scholler seaven usefull springs Did I defloure in quotations Of cross'd oppinions boute the soule of man, The more I learnt, the more I learnt to doubt Knowledge and wit, faithes foes, turne fayth about Delight, my spaniell, slept whilst I bausd leaves, I ossed ore the dunces, por'd on the old print Of titled wordes and stil my spanicli slept. Whilst I wasted lamp oile, bated my flesh, Shrunk up my veins and still my spanicl slept. And still I held converse with Zabarell, Aquinas, Scotus, and the musty sawe Of antick Donate still my spaniell slept Still on went I, first, an sit anima, Then, an it were mortall O hold, hold! At that they're at brain buffets, fell by the eares A maine pell mell together—still my spanicll slept. Then, whether twere corporeal, local, fixt, Ex traduce, but whether 't had free will Or no, hot philosophers Stood banding factions, all so strongly propt, I staggerd, knew not which was firmer part, But thought, quoted, reade, observ'd, and pried, Stufft noting books and still my spanicl slept At length he wakt, and yawned, and, by yon sky, For aught I know, he knew as much as J

1 Bause is a rare and doubtful word, probably meaning to hiss (from Lo / Latin basiare). 2 Zabarella was a (no v forgotten) six teenth-century Italian philosopher, Thomas Aquinas and Duns Scotus were the heads of the two great schools of Catholic theology Donatus was a fourth-century grammarian 3 Whether there is a loul. 4 'Creationism taught that the soul was created for each human body, 'Traducianism that it was derived ex tha duce from the parents.

From 'Antonio and Mellida'

Of the prologue to Intonio's Revenge, the second of the two plays forming The Historie of Antonio and Mellula Charles Lamb says. 'This prologue, for its passionate earnestness, and for the tragic note of preparation which it sounds, might have preceded one of those old tales of Thebes or Pelops line which Milton has so highly commended, as free from the common error of the poets in his days, 'of intermixing comic stuff with tragic sadness and gravity brought in without discretion corruptly to gratify the people—it is as solemn a preparative as the "wurning voice which he who saw th Apocalypse heard cry "!

The rawish danke of clumzie winter ramps The fluent summers vaine, and drizling sleete Chilleth the wan bleak cheek of the numd earth, Whilst snarling gusts nibble the juyceles leaves, From the nak't shuddring branch, and pils the skinne From off the soft and delicate aspectes. O now, me thinks, a sullen tragick sceane Would suite the time, with pleasing congruence May we be happie in our weake devoyer, And all parte pleased in most wisht content, But sweate of Hercules can nere beget So blest an issue. Therefore, we proclaime, If any spirit breathes within this round, Uncapable of waightie passion (As from his birth, being hugged in the armes, And nuzzled twist the breastes of happinesse), Who winkes, and shuts his apprehension up From common sense of what men were, and are, Who would not knowe what men must be-let such Hurrie amaine from our black visag'd showes We shall affright their eyes But if a breast Nail'd to the earth with griefe, if any heart Pierc't through with anguish pant within this ring, If there be any blood whose heate is choakt And stifled with true sense of misery, If ought of these straines fill this consort up-Th' arrive most welcome. O that our power Could lackie or keepe wing with our desires, That with unused paize of stile and sense, We might waigh massy in judicious scale Yet heere's the prop that doth support our hopes, When our sceanes falter, or invention halts, Your favour will give crutches to our faults.

[Antonio, son to Andrigio, Duke of Genoa, whom Piero, Venetian prince and father in law of Antonio, has murdered, slays Piero s little son, Julio, as a sacrifice to the spirit of Andrigio — The scene is in a Churchyard and the time is Midnight]

Julio Brother Antonio, are you here, i' faith?
Why doe you frowne? Indeed my sister said
That I should call you brother, that she did,
When you were married to her Busse me good truth,
I love you better then my father, 'deede
Antonio Thy father? Gratious, O bounteous Heaven!

I doe adore thy justice Venit in nostras manus

Tandem vindicta, venit et tota quidem -

Jul Truth, since my mother dyed, I lov'd you best. Something hath angred you, pray you, look merily Ant I will laugh, and dimple my thinne cheeke With cap'ring joy, chuck, my heart doth leape To graspe thy bosome. I'me, place, and blood, How fit you close together! Heavens tones Strike not such musick to immortall soules As your accordance sweetes my breast withall. Methinks I pace upon the front of Jove, And kick corruption with a scornefull heele, Griping this flesh, disdaine mortalitie

O that I knew which joynt, which side, which lim, Were father all, and had no mother in 't, That I might rip it vaine by vaine, and carve revenge In bleeding races, but since 'tis mixt together, Have at adventure, pel mell, no reverse Come hither, boy This is Andrugio's hearse

Jul O God, youle hurt me For my sisters sake, Pray you doe not hurt me An you kill me, 'deede, Ile tell my father

Ant O, for thy sisters sake, I flagge revenge.

Andrugio's Ghost Revenge!

Ant Stay, stay, deare father, fright mine eyes no more. Revenge as swift as lightning bursteth forth, And cleares his heart—Come, prettie tender childe, It is not thee I hate, not thee I kill. Thy fathers blood that flowes within thy veines Is it I loath, is that revenge must sucke I love thy soule—and were thy heart lapt up In any flesh but in Piero's bloode, I would thus kisse it, but being his, thus, thus, And thus Ile punch it. Abandon feares
Whil'st thy wounds bleede, my browes shall gush out

Jul So you will love me, doe even what you will

Ant Now barkes the wolfe against the fulle cheekt

Now lyons half clamd entrals roare for food, Now croakes the toad, and night crowes screech aloud, Fluttering 'bout casements of departed soules, Now gapes the graves, and through their yawnes let loose Imprison'd spirits to revisit earth, And now swarte night, to swell thy hower out, Behold I spurt warme bloode in thy blacke eyes

[Stabs Julio From under the stage a groane Howle not, thou putry mould, groan not, ye graves Be dumbe, all breath Here stands Andrugio's sonne. Worthie his father So I feele no breath His jawes are falne, his dislodg'd soule is fled And now there's nothing but Picro left. He is all Piero, father all This blood, This breast, this heart, Piero all Whome thus I mangle. Spirit of Julio, Forget this was thy trunke I live thy friend Mayst thou be twined with the softst imbrace Of clere eternitie but thy fathers blood I thus make incense of, to vengeance. Ghost of my poysoned sire, sucke this fume, To sweet revenge perfume thy circling ayre With smoake of bloode I sprinkle round his goare, And dewe thy hearse with these fresh recking drops Loe thus I heave my blood died handes to heaven, Even like insatiate hell, still crying More! My heart both thirsting dropsies after goare Sound peace and rest to church, night ghosts, and graves; Blood cries for bloode, and murder murder craves.

(From Part II Act III)

Antonios Latin quotation is an adaptation of two lines from Senecas Thesites flagge is 'let drop, half-claim d is 'halt clemmed 'half starved, for 'cleares his heart. Mr Bullen reads' cleaves, putry (in the old editions, pury) is 'putrid

Night is thus prayed for

And now, yee sootie coursers of the night, Hurrie your chariot into hels black wombe

Nightfall is described

The gloomie wing of Night begins to stretch His lasie pinion over all the ayre.

And daybreak

For see, the dapple gray coursers of the morne Beat up the light with their bright silver hooves, And chase it through the skye

In the Insatiate Countesse Night is personified

Night like a solemne mourner frownes on earth, Envying that day should force her doff her roabes, Or Phœbus chase away her melancholly Heavens eyes looke faintly through her sable masque, And silver Cinthia hyes her in her sphere, Scorning to grace black Nights solemnity

Marston has paraphrased Shakespeare in Feare is my vassal, when I frowne he flyes, A hundred times in life a coward dyes

A storm at sea is recorded with superfluous conceits and overstrained imagery, carrying lack of dignity over the verge of the ridiculous

We gan discourse, when loe! the sea grewe mad, His bowels rumbling with winde passion, Straight swarthy darkenesse popt out Phœbus eye, And blur'd the jocund face of bright cheekt day, Whilst crud'led fogges masked even the darknesse browe, Heaven bade's good night, and the rocks gron'd At the intestine uprore of the maine Nowe gustie flawes shook up the very heeles Of our maine mast, whilst the keene lightning shot Through the black bowels of the quaking ayre.

There are editions of Marston by Halliwell Phillipps (1856) from which the above extracts are, with a few minor alterations, transcribed, and by Mr A. H. Bullen (1887)

Philip Massinger (1583-1640), one of the most accomplished and eloquent dramatists of his time, lived the precarious life of a writer for the stage, died in poverty, and was buried at St Saviour's, Southwark, in the grave of his colleague, Fletcher, with no other memorial than the note in the parish register, 'Philip Massinger, a stranger'-meaning he did not belong to the parish. His father, as appears from the dedication of one of his plays, was in the service of the Earl of Pembroke, was entrusted with letters to Queen Elizabeth, and was otherwise employed in confidential negotiations Whether Philip, who was born at Salisbury, as a page ever 'wandered in the marble halls and pictured galleries of Wilton, that princely seat of old magnificence, where Sir Philip Sidney composed his Arcadia,' is not certainly known, in 1602 he was entered of St Alban Hall, Oxford He seems to have quitted the university abruptly in 1606, and to have commenced writing for the The first notice of him is in Henslowe's stage diary, about 1613, where he makes a joint application, with N Field and R. Daborne, two other playwrights, for a loan of £5, without which, they say, they could not be bailed The sequel of Massinger's history is but an enumeration of his He was found dead in his bed in his house on the Bankside one March morning in 1639-40 He wrote a great number of pieces, of which fifteen written by him unaided have been preserved manuscripts of eight others of his plays were in existence in the middle of the eighteenth century, but they fell into the hands of John Warburton, Somerset herald, who had collected no less than fifty-five English dramas of the golden period, many of them rare, some of them unique, but all of them, through his carelessness, burnt for kitchen uses by his ignorant domestic. Much of Massinger's best work is inextricably mixed up with that of Fletcher and others It is difficult to say how far he was concerned in the authorship of plays that pass under the name of 'Beaumont and Fletcher' Probably the earliest of his extant plays is the unpleasant Unnatural Combat, printed in 1639 The first published is The Virgin Martyr (1622), partly by In 1623 was published The Duke of Dekkei Milan, a fine but rhetorical tragedy The Bondman, The Renegado, and The Parliament of Love were licensed in 1623-24. The Roman Actor (1626) abounds in eloquent declamation Great Duke of Florence, produced in 1627, has a delightful love-story, whereas Massinger's female characters are usually unattractive and sometimes The Maid of Honour (1628) is, like the odious Bondman, full of political allusions The Picture, licensed in 1629, has an improbable plot. The Emperor of the East (1631) has the same merits and faults as the Duke of Melan Field joined Massinger in writing The Fatal Dowry (1632) City Madam (licensed in 1632) and A New Way to Pay Old Debts (which, printed in 1633, kept the stage till well into the nineteenth century) are Massinger's most masterly comedies—brilliant satırıcal studies, though without warmth or geniality A Very IVoman (1634) is Fletcher's Woman's Plot revised by Massinger The Guardian dates from 1633, The Bashful Lover from 1636 Believe as you List (1631) was first printed from MS in 1844 The powerful and stately Tragidy of Sir John Van Olden Barnavelt (1619), by Massinger and Fletcher, was first printed in vol 11 of Bullen's Old Plays (First Series)

Some of Massinger's plays are (as Coleridge said) as interesting as a novel, others are as solid as a treatise on political philosophy His verse, though fluent and flexible, lacks the music and magic of Shakespeare's No writer repeats himself more His comedy resembles Ben Jonson's in its eccentric strength, in its exhibitions of wayward human nature, and in its use of rather typical and conventional characters The greediness of avarice, the tyranny of unjust laws, and the miseries of poverty are drawn with a powerful hand luxuries and vices of a city life afford scope for indignant and forcible invective Genume humour or sprightliness Massinger had none. His dialogue is often coarse and indecorous, and his low characters are too depraved His genius was rather descriptive and rhetorical than impassioned or dramatic, yet there is a certain serious dignity that impresses The versification is smooth and mellifluous, in his early plays rhyme and prose are freely used, in the later, mainly blank verse.

Charles Lamb said that his English style is purer and freer from violent metaphors and harsh constructions than that of any contemporary dramatist. The influence of Spanish and Italian models is conspicuous, he was skilled in his management of the plot, and showed mastery of stage mechanism.

Pregnant lines or short passages in the plays are 'Better the devil's than a woman's slave,' 'Death hath a thousand doors to let out life,' 'Gold can do much, but beauty more,' 'Ambition, in a private man a vice, is in a prince the virtue,' 'Virtue not in action is a vice,' and 'When we go not forward, we go backward' Massinger's best woman character is Camiola in the Maid of Honour It is in her mouth (speaking to the King of Sicily) that Massinger puts a very frank impeachment, controversial rither than poetic, of the sacrosanct doctrine of the divine right of kings

With your leave I must not kneel, sir,
While I reply to this—but thus rise up
In my defence, and tell you, as a man, (Since, when you are unjust, the deity Which you may challenge as a king, parts from you,)
'Twas never read in holy writ or moral,

Luke Frugal No word, sir, I hope, shall give offence nor let it relish Of flattery, though I proclaim aloud, I glory in the bravery of your mind, To which your wealth's a servant. Not that riches Is, or should be, contemned, it being a blessing Derived from heaven, and by your industry Pulled down upon you, but in this, dear sir, You have many equals such a man's possessions Extend as far as yours, a second hath His bags as full, a third in credit flies As high in the popular voice but the distinction And noble difference by which you are Divided from them is, that you are styled Gentle in your abundance, good in plenty, And that you feel compassion in your bowels Of other's miseries (I have found it, sir, Heaven keep me thankful for 't !) while they are cursed As rigid and inexorable.

As are born only for themselves, and live so,

Though prosperous in worldly understandings,

Are but like beasts of rapine, that by odds

Of strength usurp and tyrannise o'er others

Brought under their subjection

Can you think, sir,

In your unquestioned wisdom, I beseech you,

The goods of this poor man sold at an outcry, His wife turned out of doors, his children forced To beg their bread, this gentleman's estate By wrong extorted, can advantage you? Or that the ruin of this once brave merchant, For such he was esteemed, though now decayed, Will raise your reputation with good men? But you may urge (pray you, pardon me, my zeal Makes me thus bold and vehement) in this You satisfy your anger, and revenge For being defeated Suppose this, it will not Repair your loss, and there was never yet But shame and scandal in a victory, When the rebels unto reason, passions, fought it. Beaumont and Fletcher, two of the greatest Elizabethan dramatists, left in their joint work the most memorable outcome of a literary partnership, of a 'mysterious double personality' Heretofore dramatic collaboration had been generally brief and incidental, confined to a few scenes or a single play But Beaumont and Fletcher lived together for ten years, and wrote a series of dramas, passionate, romantic, and comic, with such perfect co-operation that their names, their genius, and their fame have been inseparably conjoined or indissolubly blended Shakespeare They appeared inspired these kindred souls when his dramatic supremacy was undisputed, and, especially in the comedies, they could not but be touched by such a master-spirit Beaumont-rendered enthusiastic homage to Ben Jonson, and several of his plays show abundant traces of Jonson's influence Francis Beaumont was the younger by five years, and died nine years before his colleague. The son of a judge, a member of an ancient family settled at Gracedieu, in Leicestershire, he was born in 1584, and educated at Oxford He became a student of the Inner Temple, probably to gratify his father, but does not seem to have prosecuted the study of the law In 1602 he published a poetical expansion of a tale from Ovid, and became an intimate of Ben Jonson and the circle of wits who met at the Mermaid Tavern He was buried on 9th March 1616, at the entrance to St Benedict's Chapel, Westminster Abbey - John Fletcher was the son of that Dean of Peterborough who obtruded unwelcome ministrations l on Mary Queen of Scots at the scaffold and died Bishop of London He was born at Rye in 1579, was bred at Benet (Corpus), Cambridge, was left in poverty at his father's death, in 1607 produced the Woman Hater, and, dying of the plague in 1625, was buried in St Saviour's, Southwark

FRANCIS BEAUMONT

Hazlitt said of these' premature deaths 'The bees were said to have come and built their hive in the mouth of Plato when a child, and the fable might be transferred to the sweeter accents of Beaumont and Fletcher One of these writers makes Bellario, the page, say to Philaster, who threatens to take his life "Tis not a life, 'tis but a piece of childhood thrown away" But here was youth, genius, aspiring hope, growing reputation, cut off like a flower in its summer pride, or like "the lily on its stalk green," which makes us repine at fortune, and almost at nature, that seem to set so little store by their greatest favourites The life of poets is, or ought to be -judging of it from the light it lends to ours-1 golden dream, full of brightness and sweetness, lapt in Elysium, and it gives one a reluctant pang to see the splendid vision, by which they are attended in their path of glory, fade like a vapour, and their sacred heads laid low in ashes, before the sand of common mortals has run out'

Beaumont and Fletcher's works comprise in all fifty-two plays, a masque, and several minor poems, but it is difficult to allocate the authorship fails to trace any essential difference between the plays ascribed to both and those attributed to Fletcher alone, while he detects two styles in the plays written by Fletcher along with another than Beaumont Beaumont's own verses are the more severe and regular in form. Dyce thus assigns the authorship of the plays, with very varying degrees of certainty by Beaumont and Fletcher, Four Plays in One, Wit at Several Weapons, Thierry and Theodoret, Maid's Tragedy, Philaster, King and no King, Cupid's Revinge, Little French Lawyer, Corcomb, Laws of Candy, The Knight of the Burning Pestle, and The Scornful Lady, by Beaumont alone, the Masque, by Fletcher and Massinger, False One, Very Woman, The Lover's Progress, by Fletcher and Rowley, Queen of Corinth, Maid of the Mill, Bloody Brother, by Fletcher and Shirley, Noble Gentleman, Night Walker, Love's Pilgrimage, by Fletcher and Shakespeare, The Two Noble Kinsmin, the remaining plays, including The Faithful Shepherdess, The False One, Bonduca, and Wit without Money, by Fletcher alone Fletcher's collaborator in some of the later plays is, however, entirely uncertain His own versification has many peculiar features which make his verse distinguishable from that of his contemporary dramatists Chief of these is the frequency of double or feminine endings, in which he exceeds any other writer of our old A marked metrical peculiarity was his fondness for ending a verse with an empliatic extra monosyllable-e g

And, love, I charge thee, never charm mine eyes more
(A single line from The Humorous Lieutenant, Act iv sc. 2.)
And unfrequented deserts where the snow awells

Another characteristic is the monotonous pause at the end of the line. In more colloquial passages the verse is so irregular—through the introduction of redundant syllables (in all parts of the line)—as to be barely distinguishable from prose. The metrical arrangement in the seventeenth century editions is very faulty, and Fletcher has only himself to blame if modern editors cannot determine whether certain scenes should be printed as verse or prose. His easy, go is-you-please freedom was obtained by the sacrifice of rhythm

Fletcher undoubtedly had a share in Shakespeare's Henry VIII (see page 372) The touch of Shakespeare is felt with considerable certainty in the Iwo Noble Kinsmen (see page 372) There is a tone of music and a tread of thunder in some of the pissages to which no parallel can be found in any of the companion dramas. Only three plays were, during Fletcher's lifetime, published is joint productions I wo of these-Philaster and the Maid's Tragedy-are, with the exception of the great passages in the Two Noble Kinsmen, the glory It seems odd that these plays of the collection are called by the name of Beaumont and Fletcher, thus giving precedence to the younger and less volummous writer Dyce's opinion was that of these three plays Beaumont had the greater share, or that through natural courtesy Fletcher placed the name of his deceased associate before his own, and that future editors naturally followed Fletcher's arrangement It would appear that on the whole Beaumont possessed the deeper and more thoughtful genius, Fletcher the gayer and more idyllic. There is a glad, exuberant music and a May-morning light and freshness in the L'aithful Shepherdess, which Milton did not disdain to accept as a model in the lyrical portions of Comus, and of which the Endymion of Kents is Beaumont and Fletcher never sound an echo the deep sea of passion, they are poets first and dramatists after, they display but little power of serious and consistent characterisation, while they are much too fond of unnatural and violent situations And there is an unpleasantly licentious element in many of the plays, even that most delightful pastoral the Faithful Shepherdess is marred by deformities of this kind 'A spot,' says Charles Lamb, 'is on the face of this Diana'

Dryden reports that Philaster was the first play that brought' the collaborators into esteem with the public, though they had produced several plays before it appeared. It is somewhat improbable in plot, but interesting in character and situations. The hero, heir to the King of Sicily, who had been unjustly deposed by the King of Calabria, claims his rights. The king's daughter Arethusa falls in love with him.

Philaster Madam, your messenger
Made me believe you wished to speak with me Arethusa 'fis true, Philaster, but the words are such
I have to say, and do so ill beseem
The mouth of woman, that I wish them said,
And yet am loath to speak them Have you known
That I have aught detracted from your worth?

Have I in person wronged you? or have set My baser instruments to throw disgrace Upon your virtues?

Are Why, then, should you, in such a public place, Injure a princess, and a scandal lay Upon my fortunes, famed to be so great,
Calling a great part of my dowry in question?

Never, madam, you

I should abide here long

Are 'Tis true, and worse You should come often. How shall we devise To hold intelligence, that our true loves, On any new occasion, may agree What path is best to tread?

PhiI have a boy, Sent by the gods, I hope, to this intent Not yet seen in the court. Hunting the buck, I found him sitting by a fountain's side, Of which he borrowed some to quench his thirst, And paid the nymph again as much in tears. A garland lay him by, made by himself Of many several flowers bred in the vale, Stuck in that mystic order that the rareness Delighted me but ever when he turned His tender eyes upon 'em, he would weep, As if he meant to make 'em grow again Seeing such pretty helpless innocence Dwell in his face, I asked him all his story He told me that his parents gentle died, Leaving him to the mercy of the fields,

Which gave him roots, and of the crystal springs, Which did not stop their courses, and the sun, Which still, he thanked him, yielded him his light Then took he up his garland, and did show What every flower, as country-people hold, Did signify, and how all, ordered thus, Exprest his grief, and, to my thoughts, did read The prettiest lecture of his country art That could be wished so that methought I could Have studied it I gladly entertained Him, who was as glad to follow, and have got The trustiest, loving'st, and the gentlest boy That ever master kept Him will I send To wait on you, and bear our hidden love.

(From Act 1 sc. 1L)

The jealousy of Philaster is unnatural, Euphrasia, disguised as Bellario the page, is imitated from Viola, yet her hopeless attachment to Philaster is touching

My father oft would speak Your worth and virtue, and, as I did grow More and more apprehensive, I did thirst To see the man so praised But yet all this Was but a maiden longing, to be lost As soon as found, till, sitting in my window, Printing my thoughts in lawn, I saw a god, I thought (but it was you) enter our gates My blood flew out, and back again as fast As I had puffed it forth and sucked it in Like breath then was I called away in haste To entertain you. Never was a man Heaved from a sheep cote to a sceptre raised So high in thoughts as I you left a kiss Upon these lips then, which I mean to keep From you for ever I did hear you talk, Far above singing After you were gone, I grew acquainted with my heart, and searched What stirred it so alas! I found it love! Yet far from lust, for could I but have lived In presence of you, I had had my end For this I did delude my noble father With a feigned pilgrimage, and dressed myself In habit of a boy, and for I knew My birth no match for you, I was past hope Of having you, and, understanding well That when I made discovery of my sex, I could not stay with you, I made a vow, By all the most religious things a maid Could call together, never to be known, Whilst there was hope to hide me from men's eyes, For other than I seemed, that I might ever Abide with you then sat I by the fount Where first you took me up (Act v sc. v)

The Maid's Tragedy, supposed to be written about the same time, is a powerful but unpleasing drama. Aspatia's purity is well contrasted with the guilty boldness of Evadne, and the rough, soldier-like bearing and manly feeling of Melantius render the selfish sensuality of the king more hateful and disgusting Unhappily whole scenes and dialogues are disfigured by the mastervice of the theatre of Beaumont and Fletcher Coleridge said, somewhat unkindly, that both poets were 'servile jure divino Royalists,' and that all their women are represented with the minds of strumpets, 'except a few irrational humourists'—a judgment several critics have jealously rebutted. As Mr St Loe Strachey says, for dramatic interest, sustained and heightened by every resource 'of stagecraft, Beaumont and Fletcher have no peers after Shakespeare. Nobler poetry, deeper thoughts and sentiments, may be found in the other dramatists, but judged as plays, the Maid's Tragedy and Philaster stand above all else that is not Shakespeare's

The later works of Fletcher are chiefly comic His plots are sometimes inartificial and loosely connected, but he is always lively and entertaining, and the dialogue is witty, elegant, and amusing Yet with all their excellences, nobody remembers the plots of Beaumont and Fletcher's dramas Shakespeare's are ineffaceably stamped on the memory, but those of Beaumont and Fletcher seem 'writ in water' Dryden held that they understood and imitated the conversation of gentlemen much better than Shakespeare, and he tells us that their plays were, in his day, the most pleasant and frequent entertainments of the stage-'two of theirs being acted through the year for one of Shakespeare's or Jonson's' It was different some forty years earlier In 1627 the King's Company bribed the Master of the Revels with £5 to prevent the players of the theatre called the Rcd Bull from performing the dramas of Shakespeare One cause of the preference for Beaumont and Fletcher may have been the license of their dramas (suited to the perverted taste of the court of Charles II), and the spirit of intrigue which they adopted from the Spanish stage and naturalised on the English. 'We cannot deny,' said Hallam, 'that the depths of Shakespeare's mind were often unfathomable by an audience, the bow was drawn by a matchless hand, but the shaft went out of sight. All might listen to Fletcher's pleasing though not profound or vigorous language, his thoughts are noble, and tinged with the ideality of romance, his metaphors vivid, though sometimes too forced, he possesses the idiom of English without much pedantry, though in many passages he strains it beyond common use, his versification, though studiously irregular, is often rhythmical and sweet, yet we are seldom arrested by striking beauties Good lines occur in every page, fine ones but rarely We lay down the volume with a sense of admiration of what we have read, but little of it remains distinctly in the memory Fletcher is not much quoted, and has not even afforded copious materials to those who cull the beauties of ancient lore.' His comic gift was much greater than his tragic power. Massinger impresses the reader more deeply, and has a moral beauty not possessed by Beaumont and Fletcher, in comedy he falls infinitely below them. Though their characters are deficient in variety, their knowledge of stage effect and contrivance, their fertility of invention, and the airy liveliness ci their dialogue provide the charm of novelty and interest. The Knight of the Burning Pestle, mainly Beaumont's, is an admirable burlesque of the taste of the citizens of London for false chivalry and pseudo-romantic adventures, not without a specific reference to Heywood's Four Prentices of London, but it lacks the rich and genial humanity of Shakespeare's comedies The vast variety and luxuriance of Beaumont and Fletcher's work lift it above Jonson's, though neither of them had his regularity and solidity, and brings them to the borders of the 'magic circle' of Shakespeare The confidence and buoyancy of youth are visible in their plays-they had not tasted of adversity, like Jonson or Massinger, and they had not the profoundly meditative spirit of their great

Bonduca is a version of the story of the British warrior-queen, Boadicea, Bonduca, or (better) Boudicea. Caratach is the patriot now familiar to us under the Romanised name of Caractacus (Welsh, Caradawg) The play opens with a scene in which Caratach enters from behind, while Bonduca is speaking exultantly to Nennius and other British warriors

Bonduca The hardy Romans !-- oh, ye gods of Britain ! The rust of arms, the blushing shame of soldiers ! Are these the mon that conquer by inheritance? The fortune makers? these the Julians, That with the sun measure the end of nature, Making the world but one Rome and one Cæsar? Shame, how they flee! Cæsar's soft soul dwells in 'cm, Their mothers got 'em sleeping, Pleasure nursed 'em, Their bodies sweat with sweet oils, love's allurements. Not lusty arms Dare they send these to seek us, These Roman girls? Is Britain grown so wanton? Twice we have beat 'em, Nonnius, scattered 'em And through their big boned Germans, on whose pikes The honour of their actions sits in triumph, Made themes for songs to shame 'em and a woman, A woman beat 'em, Nennius, a weak woman, A woman beat these Romans!

Caratach [coming forward] So it seems A man would shame to talk so

Bond Who's that?

Bond Cousin, do you grieve my fortunes? Car No, Bonduca,

If I grieve, 'tis the bearing of your fortunes You put too much wind to your sail discretion And hardy valour are the twins of honour, And, nursed together, make a conqueror, Divided, but a talker 'Tis a truth, That Rome has fled before us twice, and routed, A truth we ought to crown the gods for, lady And not our tongues, a truth is none of ours, Nor in our ends, more than the noble bearing, For then it leaves to be a virtue, lady, And we, that have been victors, beat ourselves, When we insult upon our honour's subject.

Bond My valunt cousin, is it foul to say What liberty and honour bid us do,

And what the gods allow us? No, Bonduca, So what we say exceed not what we do You call the Romans-fearful, fleeing Romans, And Roman girls, the lees of tainted pleasures Does this become a doer? are they such? Bond They are no more

Where is your conquest, then? Why are your altars crowned with wreaths of flowers? The beasts with gilt horns waiting for the fire? The holy Druides composing songs Of everlasting life to victory? Why are these triumphs, lady? for a May game? For hunting a poor herd of wretched Romans? Is it no more? Shut up your temples, Britons, And let the husbandman redeem his heifers, Put out your holy fires, no timbrel ring, Let's home and sleep, for such great overthrows A candle burns too bright a sacrifice, A glow worm's tail too full a flame -Oh, Nennius, Thou hadst a noble uncle knew a Roman And how to speak him, how to give him weight In both his fortunes !

Bond By the gods, I think You dote upon these Romans, Caratach Car Witness these wounds, I do, they were fairly given

I love an enemy I was born a soldier And he that in the head on's troop defies me, Bending my manly body with his sword, I make a mistress Yellow tressed Hymen Ne'er tied a longing virgin with more joy, Than I am married to that man that wounds me And are not all these Roman? Ten struck battles I sucked these honoured scars from, and all Roman, Ten years of bitter nights and heavy marches (When many a frozen storm sung through my currass, And made it doubtful whether that or I Were the more stubborn metal) have I wrought through, And all to try these Romans Ten times a night I have swam the rivers, when the stars of Rome Shot at me as I floated, and the billows Tumbled their watry ruins on my shoulders, Charging my battered sides with troops of agues, And still to try these Romans, whom I found (And, if I lie, my wounds be henceforth backward. And be you witness, gods, and all my dangers 1) As ready, and as full of that I brought, (Which was not fear, nor flight) as valiant, As vigilant, as wise to do and suffer, Ever advanced as forward as the Britons, Their sleeps as short, their hopes as high as ours. Ay, and as subtle, lady 'Tis dishonour, And, followed, will be impudence, Bonduca, And grow to no belief, to taunt these Romans Have not I seen the Britons-Bond What?

Car

Disheartened, Run, run, Bonduca, not the quick rack swifter, The virgin from the hated ravisher Not half so fearful, not a flight drawn home, A round stone from a sling, a lover's wish, E'er made that haste that they have By the gods, I have seen these Britons, that you magnify, Run as they would have out-run time, and roaring, Basely for mercy roaring, the light shadows,

That in a thought scur o'er the fields of corn, Halted on crutches to 'em Bond Oh, ye powers, What scandals do I suffer ! Car Yes, Bonduca, I have seen thee run too, and thee, Nennus, Yea, run apace, both, then when Pœnius a Roman captain (The Roman girl !) cut thorough your armed carts, And drove 'em headlong on ye, down the hill, Then when he hunted ye, like Britain foxes, More by the scent than sight, then did I see These valiant and approved men of Britain, Like boding owls, creep into tods of ivy, And hoot their fears to one another nightly Nenntus And what did you then, Caratach? I fled too,

But not so fast,-your jewel had been lost then, Young Hengo there, he trushed me, Nennius For, when your fears out run him, then stept I, And in the head of all the Roman fury Took him, and with my tough belt to my back I buckled him, behind him my sure shield, And then I followed If I say I fought Five times in bringing off this bud of Britain, I he not, Nenmus Neither had you heard Me speak this, or ever seen the child more, But that the son of virtue, Panius, Seeing me steer through all these storms of danger, My helm still in my hand (my sword), my prow Turned to my foe (my face), he crud out nobly, 'Go, Briton, bear thy lion's whelp off safely, Thy manly sword has ransomed thee, grow strong, And let me meet thee once again in arms, Then, if thou stand'st, thou art mine.' I took his offer,

And here I am to honour him

Bond Oh, cousin, From what a flight of honour hast thou checked me! What wouldst thou make me, Caratach?

CarSee, lady, The noble use of others in our losses. Does this afflict you? Had the Romans cried this, And, as we have done theirs, sung out these fortunes, Railed on our base condition, hooted at us, Made marks as far as the earth was ours, to show us Nothing but sea could stop our flights, despised us, And held it equal whether banqueting Or beating of the Britons were more business, It would have galled you

Bond Let me think we conquered. Car Do, but so think as we may be conquered, And where we have found virtue, though in those That came to make us slaves, let's cherish it There's not a blow we gave since Julius landed, That was of strength and worth, but, like records, They file to after ages Our registers The Romans are, for noble deeds of honour,

And shall we burn their mentions with upbraidings? Bond No more, I see myself Thou hast made me cousin.

More than my fortunes durst, for they abused me, And wound me up so high, I swelled with glory Thy temperance has cured that tympany, And given me health again, nay more, discretion Shall we have peace? for now I love these Romans Car Thy love and hate are both unwise ones, lady

Mcthinks a mean between you would do well Dula She is in love hang me, if I were so, But I could run my country I love too To do those things that people in love do Aspatia It were a timeless smile should prove my check,

It were a fitter hour for me to laugh, When at the altar the religious priest Were pacifying the offended powers With sacrifice, than now This should have been My night, and all your hands have been employed In giving me a spotless offering To young Amintor's bed, as we are now For you pardon, Evadne, weald my worth . Were great as yours, or that the King, or he, Or both thought so! Perhaps he found me worthless, But till he did so, in these ears of mine-These credulous ears—he poured the swectest words I hat art or love could frame And if I did want Virtue, you safely may forgive that too, For I have lost none that I had from you Evad Nay, leave this sad talk, madam Would I could! Asp

Then should I leave the cause

Lvad See if you have not spoiled all Dula's mirth! Asp [sings] Lay a garland on my hearse Of the dismal yew ---

Lvad That's one of your sad songs, madam Asp Believe me, 'tis a very pretty one Lvad How is it, madam? Asp [sings] Lay a garland on my hearse Of the dismal yew, Maidens, willow branches bear, Say I died true.

My love was false, but I was firm, I rom my hour of birth, Upon my buried body, lie Lightly, gentle earth!

Madam, good night, may no discontent Grow 'twixt your love and you, but if there do, Inquire of me, and I will guide your moun, Teach you an artificial way to greve, To keep your sorrow waking Love your lord No worse than I, but if you love so well, Alas! you may displease him, so did I This is the last time you shall look on me -Ladies, farewell, as soon as I am dead, Come all, and watch one night about my hearse, Bring each a mournful story and a tear To offer at it when I go to earth With flattering ivy clasp my coffin round, Write on my brow my fortune, let my bier Be borne by virgins that shall sing by course The truth of maids and perjuries of men

Load Alas! I pity thee Enter Amintor Asp Go, and be happy in your lady's love. May all the wrongs that you have done to me Be utterly forgotten in my death ! I'll trouble you no more, yet I will take A parting kiss, and will not be denied [Kisses Amintor

You'll come, my lord, and see the virgins weep

When I am laid in earth, though you yourself Can know no pity Thus I wind myself Into this willow garland, and am prouder That I was once your love—though now refused— I han to have had another true to me So with my prayers I leave you, and must try Some yet unpractised way to grieve and die

(Act ii sc i)

The opening song from the Two Noble Kinsmen has been given above (page 373) as having 'the true Shakespearean ring' The following scene (Act II sc. 1) is one of those in which Coleridge detected Shakespeare's hand, and other critics have supported this view Mr Sidney Lee and most recent authorities assign it to Fletcher's The Kinsmen are the heroes (to be pronounced Pal'amon and Ar-sight) of Chaucer's 'Knightes Tale' (see above at page 70), and of the story it is said in the Prologue

> It had a noble breeder and a pure, A learned, and a poet never went More famous yet 'twixt Po and Silver Trent -Chaucer, of all admired, the story gives, There constant to eternity it lives.

The dialogue cited below takes place when the cousins are prisoners in Greece

Palamon How do you, noble cousin? Arcite How do you, sir? Pal Why, strong enough to laugh at misery, And bear the chance of war yet, we are prisoners,

I fear for ever, cousin Arc I believe it, And to that destiny have patiently Laid up my hour to come

Oh, cousin Arcite, Where is Thebes now? where is our noble country? Where are our friends and kindreds? Never more Must we behold those comforts, never see The hardy youths strive for the games of honour, Hung with the painted favours of their ladies, Like tall ships under sail, then start amongst them, And as an east wind leave them all behind us Like lazy clouds, whilst Palamon and Arcite, Even in the wagging of a wanton leg, Outstript the people's praises, won the garlands Ere they have time to wish them ours Oh, never Shall we two exercise, like twins of Honour, Our arms again, and feel our fiery horses Like proud sers under us! our good swords now (Better the red eyed god of war ne'er ware) Ravished our sides, like age, must run to rust, And deck the temples of those gods that hate us. These hands shall never draw them out like lightning

Arc No, Palamon Those hopes are prisoners with us, here we are, And here the graces of our youths must wither Like a too timely spring, here age must find us, And, which is heaviest, Palamon, unmarried, The sweet embraces of a loving wife Loaden with kisses, armed with thousand Cupids, Shall never clasp our necks, no issue know us, No figures of ourselves shall we e'er see,

To blast whole armies more!

To glad our age, and like young eagles teach them Boldly to gaze against bright arms, and say, 'Remember what your fathers were, and conquer!' The fair eyed maids shall weep our banishments, And in their songs curse ever blinded Fortune, Till she for shame see what a wrong she has done To youth and nature This is all our world We shall know nothing here but one another, Hear nothing but the clock that tells our woes The vine shall grow, but we shall never see it Summer shall come, and with her all delights, But dead cold Winter must inhabit here still

Pal 'Tis too true, Arcite. To our Theban hounds, That shook the aged forest with their echoes, No more now must we halloo, no more shake Our pointed javelins, whilst the angry swine Flies like a Parthian quiver from our rages, Struck with our well steeled darts! All valiant uses (The food and nourishment of noble minds) In us two here shall perish we shall die (Which is the curse of honour) lastly, Children of Grief and Ignorance

Yet, cousin, Even from the bottom of these miseries, From all that fortune can inflict upon us, I see two comforts rising, two mere blessings, If the gods please to hold here a brave patience, And the enjoying of our griefs together Whilst Palamon is with me, let me perish If I think this our prison!

Pal Certainly 'Tis a main goodness, cousin, that our fortunes Were twined together, 'tis most true, two souls Put in two noble bodies, let them suffer The gall of hazard, so they grow together, Will never sink, they must not, say they could, A willing man dies sleeping, and all's done.

Arc Shall we make worthy uses of this place

That all men hate so much?

How, gentle cousin? Arc Let's think this prison a holy sanctuary, To keep us from corruption of worse men! We are young, and yet desire the ways of honour, That liberty and common conversation, The poison of pure spirits, might, like women, Woo us to wander from. What worthy blessing Can be, but our imaginations May make it ours? And here being thus together, We are an endless mine to one another, We are one another's wife, ever begetting New births of love, we are father, friends, acquaintance. We are, in one another, families, I am your heir, and you are mine, this place Is our inheritance, no hard oppressor Dare take this from us here, with a little patience, We shall live long, and loving, no surfeits seek us, The hand of War hurts none here, nor the seas Swallow their youth. Were we at liberty, A wife might part us lawfully, or business, Quarrels consume us, envy of ill men Crave 1 our acquaintance, I might sicken, cousin, Where you should never know it, and so perish Without your noble hand to close mine eyes, Or prayers to the gods a thousand chances, Were we from hence, would sever us Pal You have made meI thank you, cousin Arcite '-almost wanton With my captivity what a misery It is to live abroad, and everywhere! 'Tis like a beast, methinks! I find the court here, I am sure, a more content, and all those pleasures, That woo the wills of men to vanity, I see through now, and am sufficient To tell the world, 'tis but a gaudy shadow, That old Time, as he passes by, takes with him. What had we been, old in the court of Creon, Where sin is justice, lust and ignorance The virtues of the great ones? Cousin Arcite, Had not the loving gods found this place for us, We had died, as they do, ill old men, unwept, And had their epitaphs, the people's curses Shall I say more?

1rc I would hear you still

Is there record of any two that loved

Pal

Better than we do, Arcite?

Sure there cannot. Pal I do not think it possible our friendship Should ever leave us

Arc Till our deaths it cannot, And after death our spirits shall be led To those that love eternally (Act IL sc. L)

1 Dyce reads grave, in the sense of 'bury,' a needless altera tion, surely Other editors have read rease, crase, cleave, carve, and race

From 'The Faithful Shepherdess'

To CLORIN in the wood, enter a SATYR with fruit

Satyr Through you same bending plain That flings his arms down to the main, And through these thick woods, have I run, Whose bottom never kissed the sun, Since the lusty spring began. All to please my master Pan, Have I trotted without rest, To get him fruit, for at a feast He entertains, this coming night, His paramour the Syrinx bright But behold a fairer sight ! By that heavenly form of thine, Brightest fair, thou art divine, Sprung from great immortal race Of the gods, for in thy face Shines more awful majesty Than dull weak mortality Dare with misty eyes behold, And live therefore, on this mould Lowly do I bend my knee, In worship of thy deity Deign it, goddess, from my hand To receive whate'er this land From her fertile womb doth send Of her choice fruits, and but lena Belief to that the Satyr tells-Fairer by the famous wells, To this present day ne'er grew, Never better, nor more true. Here be grapes whose lusty blood Is the learned poets' good, Sweeter yet did never crown

The head of Bacchus, nuts more brown

[Seeing Clorum

You shall.

Than the squirrel whose teeth crack them, Deign, O fairest fair, to take them! For these, black eyed Dryope Hath oftentimes commanded me With my clasped knee to climb See how well the lusty time Hath decked their rising cheeks in red, Such as on your lips is spread! Here be berries for a queen, Some be red, some be green, These are of that luscious meat The great god Pan himself doth eat All these, and what the woods can yield, The hanging mountain or the field, I freely offer, and ere long Will bring you more, more sweet and strong, Till when, humbly lcave I take, Lest the great Pan do awake, That sleeping lies in a deep glade, Under a broad beech's shade I must go, I must run, [Exit Swifter than the fiery sun

Clorin And all my fears go with thee!

What greatness, or what private hidden power,
Is there in me to draw submission

From this rude man and beast? Sure I am mortal,
The daughter of a shepherd, he was mortal,
And she that bore me mortal, prick my hand
And it will bleed, a fever shakes me, and The self same wind that makes the young lambs shrink,

Makes me a cold my fear says I am mortal Yet I have heard (my mother told it me) And now I do believe it, if I keep My virgin flower uncropt, pure, chaste, and fair, No goblin, wood god, fairy, elf, or fiend, Satyr, or other power that haunts the groves, Shall hurt my body, or by vain illusion Draw me to wander after idle fires, Or voices calling me in dead of night draw Fo make me follow, and so tole me on Through mire and standing pools, to find my ruin Else why should this rough thing, who never knew Manners nor smooth humanity, whose heats Arc rougher than himself and more misshapen, Thus mildly kneel to me? Sure there's a power In that great name of virgin that binds fast All rude uncivil bloods, all appetites That break their confines Then, strong Chastity, Be thou my strongest guard, for here I'll dwell In opposition against fate and hell! (From Act 1 sc. L)

PERIGOT and AMORET

Perigot Stay, gentle Amoret, thou fair browed maid Thy shepherd prays thee stay that holds thee dear, Equal with his soul's good

Amoret Speak, I give Thee freedom, shepherd, and thy tongue be still
The same it ever was, as free from ill
As he whose conversation never knew
The court or city be thou ever true!

Peri When I fall off from my affection, Or mingle my clean thoughts with ill desires, First let our great God cease to keep my flocks, That being left alone without a guard, The wolf, or winter's rage, summer's great heat, And want of water, rots, or what to us
Of ill is yet unknown, fall speedily,
And in their general ruin let me go!

Amo I pray thee, gentle shepherd, wish not so I do believe thee, 'tis as hard for me To think thee false, and harder than for thee Io hold me foul

Pers Oh, you are fairer far fhan the chaste blushing morn, or that fair star fhat guides the wandering seaman through the deep, Straighter than straightest pine upon the steep Head of an aged mountain, and more white Than the new milk we strip before daylight from the full freighted bags of our fair flocks. Your hair more beauteous than those hanging locks Of young Apollo!

Amo Shepherd, be not lost, You are sailed too far already from the coast Of our discourse.

Peri Did you not tell me once I should not love alone, I should not love Fhose many passions, vows, and holy oaths I 've sent to heaven? Did you not give your hand, Even that fair hand, in hostage? Do not then Give back again those sweets to other men You yourself vowed were mine

Ano Shepherd, so far as maiden's modesty May give assurance, I am once more thinc Once more I give my hand, be ever free From that great foe to faith, foul jealousy

Peri I take it as my best good, and desire, For stronger confirmation of our love, Io meet this happy night in that fair grove, Where all true shepherds have rewarded been For their long service—say, sweet, shall it hold?

Amo Dear friend, you must not blame me if I make A doubt of what the silent night may do Maids must be fearful.

Peri Oh, do not wrong my honest simple truth; Myself and my affections are as pure As those chaste flames that burn before the shrine Of the great Dian only my intent To draw you thither was to plight our troths, With interchange of mutual chaste embraces, And ccremonious tying of ourselves. For to that holy wood is consecrate A virtuous well, about whose flowery banks The numble footed fairies dance their rounds By the pale moonshine, dipping oftentimes Their stolen children, so to make them free From dying flesh and dull mortality By this fair fount hath many a shepherd sworn And given away his freedom, many a troth Been plight, which neither Envy nor old Time Could ever break, with many a chaste kiss given In hope of coming happiness by this Fresh fountain many a blushing maid Hath crowned the head of her long loved shepherd With gaudy flowers, whilst he happy sung Lays of his love and dear captivity

(From Act 1 sc. 11)

The lyrical pieces scattered throughout Beaumont and Fletcher's plays are generally in the graceful style of the Faithful Shepherdess

Melancholy-from 'Nice Valour'

Hence, all you vain delights,
As short as are the nights
Wherein you spend your folly!
There's nought in this life sweet,
If man were wise to see 't,
But only melancholy,
O sweetest melancholy!

Welcome, folded arms, and fixed eyes, A sigh that piercing mortifies, A look that's fastened to the ground, A tongue chained up, without a sound!

Fountain heads, and pathless groves,
Places which pale passion loves!
Moonlight walks, when all the fowls
Are warmly housed, save bats and owls!
A midnight bell, a parting groan!
These are the sounds we feed upon,
Then stretch your bones in a still gloomy valley
Nothing's so dainty sweet as lovely melancholy

There are obvious resemblances between this lyric and Milton's Penseroso, which may have owed some suggestions to Fletcher

Song-from 'The False One'

Look out, bright eyes, and bless the air Even in shadows you are fair Shut up beauty is like fire, That breaks out clearer still and higher Though your beauty be confined, And soft Love a prisoner bound, Yet the beauty of your mind Neither check nor chain hith found Look out nobly, then, and dare Even the fetters that you wear

The Power of Love-from 'Valentinian.'

Hear ye, ladies that despise
What the mighty Love has done,
Fear examples, and be wise
Fair Calisto was a nun
Leda, sailing on the stream,
To deceive the hopes of man,
Love accounting but a dream,
Doted on a silver swan
Danae in a brazen tower,
Where no love was, loved a shower

Hear ye, ladies that are coy,
What the mighty Love can do,
Fear the fierceness of the boy,
The chaste moon he makes to woo,
Vesta, kindling holy fires,
Circled round about with spies,
Never dreaming loose desires,
Doting at the altar dies,
Ilion, in a short hour, higher
He can build, and once more fire

To Sleep-from the Same ~

Care charming Sleep, thou easer of all woes, Brother to Death, sweetly thyself dispose On this afflicted prince fall like a cloud In gentle showers, give nothing that is loud Or painful to his slumbers, easy, light, And as a purling stream, thou son of Night, Pass by his troubled senses, sing his pun Like hollow murmuring wind, or silver run, Into this prince gently, oh gently slide, And kiss him into slumbers like a bride!

Song to Pan

All ye woods, and trees, and bowers, All ye virtues and ye powers That inhabit in the lakes, In the pleasant springs or brakes,

Move your feet To our sound, Whilst we greet All this ground,

With his honour and his name That defends our flocks from blame.

He is great and he is just,
He is ever good, and must Thus be honoured Daffadillies,
Roses, pinks, and loved lilies,
Let us fling,

Whilst we sing, Ever holy, Ever holy,

Ever honoured, ever young ! Thus great Pan is ever sung

From 'The Bloody Brother'

Take, O take those lips away,

That so sweetly were forsworn,
And those eyes, the break of day,
Lights that do mislead the morn,
But my kisses bring again,
Seals of love, though sealed in vain

Hide, O hide those hills of snow,
Which thy frozen bosom bears,
On whose tops the panks that grow
Are yet of those that April wears,
But first set my poor heart free,
Bound in those icy chains by tnee.

The first stanza of the above is, of course, from Measure for Measure the second was added by Fletcher

A Drinking-Song-from the Same

Drink to-day and drown all sorrow, You shall perhaps not do it to morrow, But while you have it use your breath, There is no drinking after death

Wine works the heart up, wakes the wit, There is no cure 'gainst age but it, It helps the headache, cough, and tisic, And is for all diseases physic.

Then let us swill, boys, for our health, Who drinks well loves the commonwealth, And he that will to bed go sober Falls with the leaf still in October

Echoes of the last are found in many later drinking songs—
'Down among the Dead Men, for example and 'Landlord, fill the Flowing Bowl

Tisic is a form from phthisis, consumption.

Francis Beaumont wrote also a number of miscellaneous pieces, collected and published after his But some of the poems attributed to him were by Donne, Jonson, Shirley, Carew, Waller, or other less-known writers Beaumont's love-poem on the Ovidian story of Salmacis and Hermaphroditus was written when he was seventeen He wrote verses to Jonson 'Upon his Fox,' 'Upon the Silent Woman,' and 'Upon his Catiline,' but his most celebrated non-dramatic work is the letter to Ben Jonson, which was originally published at the end of the play Nice Valour in the 1647 folio, with the following title 'Mr Francis Beaumont's Letter to Ben Jonson, written before he and Master Fletcher came to London, with two of the precedent Comedics then not finished, which deferred their merry-meetings at the Mermaid'

From the Letter to Ben Jonson.

The sun (which doth the greatest comfort bring To absent friends, because the self same thing They know! they see, however absent) is Here our best haymaker (forgive me this, It is our country's style) in this warm sline I lie, and dream of your full Mermaid winc. Oh, we have water mixed with claret lees, Drink apt to bring in drier heresies Than beer, good only for the sonnet's strain, With fustian metaphors to stuff the brain, So mixed that, given to the thirstiest one, Twill not prove alms unless he have the stone I think with one draught man's invention fades I wo cups had quite spoiled Homer's Iliads 'Tis liquor that will find out Sutcliffe's wit, Lie where he will, and make him write worse yet, Filled with such moisture in most grievous qualms, Did Robert Wisdom write his singing psalms, And so must I do this And yet I think It is a potion sent us down to drink By special Providence, keeps us from fights, Makes us not laugh when we make legs to knights bows 'Tis this that keeps our minds fit for our states, A medicine to obey our magistrates For we do live more free than you, no hate, No envy at one another's happy state Moves us, we are all equal every whit Of land that God gives men here is their wit, If we consider fully, for our best And gravest men will with their main house jest Scarce please you, we want subtilty to do The city tricks, lie, hate, and flatter too Here are none that can bear a painted show, Strike when you wink, and then lament the blow, Who, like mills set the right way for to grind, Can make their gains alike with every wind, Only some fellows with the subtlest patc Amongst us may perchance equivocate At selling of a horse, and that's the most Methinks the little wit I had is lost Since I saw you, for wit is like a rest Held up at tennis, which men do the best With the best gamesters What things have we seen Done at the Mermaid! heard words that have been So nimble, and so full of subtle flame, As if that every one from whence they came

Had meant to put his whole wit in a jest,
And had resolved to live a fool the rest
Of his dull life, then when there hath been thrown Wit able enough to justify the town
For three days past, wit that might warrant be
For the whole city to talk foolishly
Till that were cancelled, and when that was gone,
We left an air behind us, which alone
Was able to make the two next companies
Right witty—though but downight fools, more wise

Matthew Sutchiffe (1550?-1629), Dean of Exeter and long a court favourite, wrote over a score of books in controversial theology, and Robert Wisdom, who died Archdeacon of Ely in 1568, contributed one psalm translation to Sternhold and Hopkins's version, and wrote a few other hymns and elegiac verses, but was neither revered for his wisdom nor praised for his poetry. Of land, &c., there inen's wit depends on their estates. Main house jest, standing family joke, handed down from father to son "My rest is 116," at tennis, bowls, and various games of cards and chance, was a phrase used to mean, 'My stake is laid. I take the chance

On the Tombs in Westminster

Mortality, behold and fear, What a change of flesh is here ! Think how many royal bones Sleep within this heap of stones! Here they he had realms and lands, Who now want strength to stir their hands, Where, from their pulpits sealed with dust, They preach, 'In greatness is no trust' Here's an acre sown indeed With the richest, royalest seed, That the earth did e'er suck in Since the first man died for sin Here the bones of birth have cried, ' Though gods they were, as men they died' Here are wands, ignoble things, Dropt from the ruined sides of kings Here's a world of pomp and state Buried in dust, once dead by fate

The following poem, credited to Beaumont, and not unlike his other work, was rejected by Dyce as being by a later hand

An Epitaph

Here she hes whose spotless fame
Invites a stone to learn her name
The rigid Spartan that denied
An epitaph to all that died,
Unless for war, in charity
Would here vouchsafe an elegy
She died a wife, but yet her mind,
Beyond virginity refined,
From lawless fire remained as free
As now from heat her ashes be Keep well this pawn, thou marble chest,
Till it be called for, let it rest,
For while this jewel here is set,
The grave is like a cabinet

Mr Bullen's edition (in 11 vols 1904 et seq) superseded Dyce's (11 vols. 1843-46), as that had superseded Weber's (1812), its chief predecessor. Ten of the principal plays are given in the two volumes edited by Mr St Loe Strachey ('Mermaid Series,' 1887). See A. W. Wurd's History of English Dramatic Literature (2 vols. 1875), Fleay's Shakespeare Manual, G. C. Macaulay's Francis Béaumont, a Critical Study (1883), G. Rhys's edition of the Lyric Poems of the two poets (1897), and the bibliography by A. C. Potter in Harvard Bibliographical Contributions (1891).

William Rowley (c.1585-c 1642), actor and playwright, is known as having collaborated with Middleton, Dekker, Heywood, Webster, Mas-He seems to have been singer, and Ford indifferent to dramatic fame of the score of plays in which he had some share we know not A New Wonder, a Woman what his share was Never Vext, All's Lost by Lust, A Match at Midnight, A Shoomaker a Gentleman-all written between 1632 and 1638—are the only plays which bear his name as sole author, but they are partly adaptations of older plays His versification was harsh, but his fellow-dramatists valued his vigour and versatility both in tragedy and comedy rarely attained to pathos, his fund of humour was conspicuous - humour sometimes rich and true, sometimes passing into mere buffoonery His name used to be specially associated with The Witch of Edmonton, published as 'a tragicomedy by divers well esteemed poets, William Rowley, Thomas Dekker, John Ford, etc' probably Dekker had the main share in it, the farcical element being Rowley's The Birth of Merlin, on whose title-page (1662) Shakespeare's name was unfortunately associated with Rowley's, is probably an old play remodelled, with an expansion of the comic element, by Rowley and In The Old Law, by Massinger, Middleton, and Rowley, Mr Bullen regards Act III sc. 1 as a characteristic specimen of Rowley's humour This dread law, much as in Anthony Trollope's Fixed Period, was 'that every man living to fourscore years, and women to threcscore, shall then be cut off as fruitless to the republic,' and Gnotho, anxious to be rid of his wife and marry a new one, bribes the parish clerk to falsify a date in the register in order to hasten the happy despatch

Gnotho You have searched o'er the parish chronicle, sir?

Clerk Yes, sir, I have found out the true age and date of the party you wot on

Gnoth Pray you, be covered, sir

Clerk When you have shewed me the way, sir Guoth O sir, remember yourself, you are a clerk

Clerk A small clerk, sir

Gnoth Likely to be the wiser man, sir, for your greatest clerks are not always so, as 'tis reported.

Clerk You are a great man in the parish, sir

Gnoth I understand myself so much the better, sir, for all the best in the parish pay duties to the clerk, and I would owe you none, sir

Clerk Since you'll have it so, I'll be the first to lude my head

Gnoth Mine is a capcase now to our business in hand Good luck, I hope, I long to be resolved

Clerk Look you, sir, this is that cannot deceive you This is the dial that goes ever true,

You may say ipse dixit upon this witness,

And it is good in law too

Gnoth Pray you, let's hear what it speaks.

Clerk Mark, sir — Agatha, the daughter of Pollux, (this is your wife's name, and the name of her father,) born—Gnoth Whose daughter say you?

Clerk The daughter of Pollux.

Gnoth I take it his name was Bollux.

Clerk Pollux the orthography I assure you, sir, the word is corrupted clse

Gnoth Well, on, sir,—of Pollux, now come on, Castor Clerk Born in an 1540, and now 'tis 99 By this infallible record, sir, (let me see,) she is now just fifty nine, and wants but one.

Gnoth I am sorry she wants so much

Clerk Why, sir? alas, 'tis nothing, 'tis but so many months, so many weeks, so many—

Gnoth. Do not deduct it to days, 'twill be the more tedious, and to measure it by hour glasses were intolerable

Clerk Do not think on it, sir, half the time goes away in sleep, 'tis half the year in nights

Gnoth O, you mistake me, neighbour, I am loath to leave the good old woman, if she were gone now it would not grieve me, for what is a year, alas, but a lingering torment? and were it not better she were out of her pain? 'T must needs be a grief to us both

Clerk I would I knew how to ease you, neighbour!

Gnoth You speak kindly, truly, and if you say but Amen to it, (which is a word that I know you are perfect in,) it might be done. Clerks are the most indifferent honest men,—for to the marriage of your enemy, or the burial of your friend, the curses or the blessings to you are all one, you say Amen to all.

Clerk With a better will to the one than the other, neighbour but I shall be glad to say Amen to any thing might do you a pleasure

Gnoth There is, first, something above your duty [Gives him money] now I would have you set forward the clock a little, to help the old woman out of her pain

Clerk I will speak to the sexton, but the day will go ne'er the faster for that.

Gnoth O, neighbour, you do not conceit me, not the jack of the clock house, the hand of the dial, I mean.—Come, I know you, being a great clerk, cannot choose but have the art to cast a figure

Clerk Never, indeed, neighbour, I never had the judgment to cast a figure

Gnoth I'll shew you on the back side of your book, look you,—what figure's this?

Clerk Four with a cipher, that 's forty

Gnoth So! forty, what's this now?

Clerk The cipher is turned into 9 by adding the tail, which makes forty nine

Gnoth Very well understood, what is't now?

Clerk The 4 is turned into 3, 'tis now thirty nine Gnoth Very well understood, and can you do this again? Clerk. O, easily, sir

Gnoth A wager of that ' let me see the place of my wife's age again

Clerk Look you, sir, 'tis here, 1540

Gnoth Forty drachmas you do not turn that forty into thirty nine!

Clerk A match with you!

Gnoth Done' and you shall keep stakes yourself there they are.

Clerk A firm match—but stay, sir, now I consider it, I shall add a year to your wife's age, let me see—Scirophorion the 17,—and now 'tis Hecatombaion the II If I alter this, your wife will have but a month to live by the law

Gnoth That's all one, sir, either do it, or pay me my wager

Clerk Will you lose your wife before you lose your wager?

Gnoth A man may get two wives before half so much money by 'em, will you do't?

Clerk I hope you will conceal me, for 'tis flat cor ruption

Gnoth Nay, sir, I would have you keep counsel, for I lose my money by't, and should be laughed at for my labour, if it should be known

Clerk Well, sir, there!—'tis done, as perfect a 39 as can be found in black and white but mum, sir,—there's danger in this figure casting

Gnoth Ay, sir, I know that better men than you have been thrown over the bar for as little, the best is, you can be but thrown out of the belfry

Enter the Cook, Tailor, Bailiff, and Butler

Clerk Lock close, here comes company, asses have ears as well as pitchers

Cook O Gnotho, how is 't? here's a trick of discarded cards of us! we were ranked with coats, as long as our old master lived

Gnoth And is this then the end of serving men?

Cool. Yes, 'faith, this is the end of serving men a wise man were better serve one God than all the men in the world

Gnoth 'Twas well spoke of a cook And are all fallen into fasting days and Ember weeks, that cooks are out of use?

Fatlor And all tailors will be cut into lists and shreds, if this world hold, we shall grow both out of request

Butler And why not butlers as well as tailors? If they can go naled, let'em neither eat nor drink.

Clark That's strange, methinks, a lord should turn away his tailor, of all men —and how dost thou, tailor?

Tail I do so so, but, indeed, all our wants are long of this publican, my lord's bailiff, for had he been rent gatherer still, our places had held together still, that are now seam rent, nay cracked in the whole piece

Bailiff Sir, if my lord had not sold his lands that claim his rents, I should still have been the rent gatherer

Cook The truth is, except the coachman and the foot-man, all serving men are out of request

Gnoth Nay, say not so, for you were never in more request than now, for requesting is but a kind of a begging, for when you say, I beseech your worship's charity, 'tis all one as if you say, I request it, and in that kind of requesting, I am sure serving men were never in more request

Cool. Troth, he says true well, let that pass, we are upon a better adventure I see, Gnotho, you have been before us, we came to deal with this merchant for some commodities.

Clerk With me, sir? any thing that I can

But Nay, we have looked out our wives already marry, to you we come to know the prices, that is, to know their ages, for so much reverence we bear to age, that the more aged, they shall be the more dear to us.

Tail The truth is, every man has laid by his widow, so they be lame enough, blind enough, and old enough, 'tis good enough

Clerk I keep the town stock, if you can but name 'em, I can tell their ages to a day

All We can tell their fortunes to an hour, then Clerk Only you must pay for turning of the leaves. Cook O, bountifully—Come, mine first.

But The butler before the cook, while you live, there's few that eat before they drink in a morning

Tail Nay, then the tailor puts in his needle of priority, for men do clothe themselves before they either drink or eat

Bail I will strive for no place, the longer ere I marry my wife, the older she will be, and nearer her end and my ends.

Clerk I will serve you all, gentlemen, if you will have patience

Gnoth I commend your modesty, sir, you are a bailiff, whose place is to come behind other men, as it were in the bum of all the rest

Batl So, sir' and you were about this business too, seeking out for a widow?

Gnoth Alack! no, sir, I am a married man, and have those cares upon me that you would fain run into

Bail What, an old rich wife! any man in this ago desires such a care

Gnoth 'Troth, sir, I'll put a venture with you, if you will, I have a lusty old quean to my wife, sound of wind and limb, yet I'll give out to take three for one at the marriage of my second wife.

Bail Ay, sir, but how near is she to the law?

Gnoth Take that at hazard, sir, there must be time, you know, to get a new Unsight, unseen, I take three to one

Bail Two to one I'll give, if she have but two teeth in her head

Gnoth A match, there's five drachmas for ten at my next wife

Bail A match

Cook I shall be fitted bravely, fifty eight, and up wards, 'tis but, a year and a half, and I may chance make friends, and beg a year of the duke

But Hey, boys! I am made sir butler, my wife that shall be wants but two months of her time, it shall be one ere I marry her, and then the next will be a honey moon

Tail I outstrip you all, I shall have but six weeks of Lent, if I get my widow, and then comes eating tide, plump and gorgeous

Gnoth This tailor will be a man, if ever there were any Bail Now comes my turn, I hope, goodman Finis, you that are still at the end of all, with a so be if Well now, sirs, do you venture there as I have done, and I'll venture here after you Good luck, I beseech thee!

Clerk Amen, sir

Bail That deserves a fee already—there 'tis, please me, and have a better

Clerk Amen, sir

Cool How, two for one at your next wife! is the old one living?

Gnoth You have a fair match, I offer you no foul one, if death make not haste to call her, she'll make none to go to him

But I know her, she's a lusty woman, I'll take the venture

Gnoth There's five drachmas for ten at my next wife But A bargain

Cook Nay, then we'll be all merchants give me Tail And me.

But What has the bailiff sped?

Bail I am content, but none of you shall know my happiness

Clerk As well as any of you all, believe it, sir

Bail O, clerk, you are to speak last always

Clerk I'll remember't hereafter, sir You have done with me, gentlemen?

Enter AGATHA.

All For this time, honest register

Clerk Fare you well then, if you do, I'll cry Amen to't. [Exit

Cook Look you, sir, is not this your wife?

Gnoth My first wife, sir

But Nay, then we have made a good match on't, if she have no froward disease, the woman may live this dozen years by her age.

Tail I'm afraid she's broken winded, she holds silence so long

Cook We'll now leave our venture to the event, I must a wooing

But I'll but buy me a new dagger, and overtake you.

But I'll but buy me a new dagger, and overtake you.

But I'll but buy me a new dagger, and overtake you.

But I'll but buy me a new dagger, and overtake you.

But I'll but buy me a new dagger, and overtake you.

[Exeunt all but Gnotho and 1gatha

Gnoth O wife, wife!

Agatha What ail you, man, you speak so passionately? Gnoth 'Tis for thy sake, sweet wife who would think so lusty an old woman, with reasonable good teeth, and her tongue in as perfect use as ever it was, should be so near her time?—but the Fates will have it so

Aga What's the matter, man? you do an aze me Gnoth Thou art not sick neither, I warrant thee Aga Not that I know of, sure

Gnoth What pity 'tis a woman should be so near her end, and yet not sick!

Aga Near her end, man' tush, I can guess at that, I have years good yet of life in the remainder I want two yet at least of the full number Then the law, I know, craves impotent and useless, And not the able women

Gnoth Ay, alas! I see thou hast been repairing time as well as thou couldst, the old wrinkles are well filled up, but the vermilion is seen too thick, too thick—and I read what's written in thy forehead, it agrees with the church book.

Aga Have you sought my age, man? and, I prithee, how is it?

Gnoth I shall but discomfort thee.

Aga Not at all, man, when there's no remedy, I will go, though unwillingly

Gnoth 1539 Just, it agrees with the book you have about a year to prepare yourself

Aga Out, alas! I hope there's more than so But do you not think a reprieve might be gotten for half a score—and 'twere but five years, I would not care? an able woman, methinks, were to be pitied

Gnoth Ay, to be pitied, but not helped, no hope of that for, indeed, women have so blemished their own reputations now a days, that it is thought the law will meet them at fifty very shortly

Aga Marry, the heavens forbid!

Gnoth There's so many of you, that, when you are old, become witches, some profess physic, and kill good subjects faster than a burning fever, for these and such causes'tis thought they shall not live above fifty

Aga Ay, man, but this hurts not the good old women.

Gnoth I'faith, you are so like one another, that a man cannot distinguish 'em now, were I an old woman, I would desire to go before my time, and offer myself willingly, two or three years before. O, those are brave women, and worthy to be commended of all men in the world, that, when their husbands die, they run to be burnt to death with 'em there's honour and credit' give me half a dozen such wives.

Aga Ay, if her husband were dead before, 'twere a reasonable request, if you were dead, I could be content to be so

Gnoth Fie! that's not likely, for thou hadst two husbands before me.

Aga Thou wouldst not have me die, wouldst thou, husband?

Gnoth No, I do not speak to that purpose, but I say what credit it were for me and thee, if thou wouldst, then thou shouldst never be suspected for a witch, a physician, a bawd, or any of those things and then how daintily should I mourn for thee, how bravely should I see thee buried 'when, alas, if he goes before, it cannot choose but be a great grief to him to think he has not seen his wife well buried. There be such virtuous women in the world, but too few, too few, who desire to die seven years before their time, with all their hearts.

Isa I have not the heart to be of that mind, Lat, indeed, husband, I think you would have me gone

Gnoth No, alas! I speak but for your good and your credit, for when a woman may die quickly, why should she go to law for her death? Alack, I need not wish thee gone, for thou hast but a short time to stay with me you do not know how near 'tis,—it must out, you have but a month to live by the law

Aga Out, alas 1

Gnoth Nay, scarce so much

Aga O, O, O, my heart' [Sawons Gnoth Ay, so' if thou wouldst go away quietly, 'twere sweetly done, and like a kind wife, he but a httle longer, and the bell shall toll for thee.

Aga O my heart, but a month to live !

Gnoth. Alas, why wouldst thou come back again for a month?—I'll throw her down again—O, woman, 'tis not three weeks, I think a fortnight is the most.

Aga Nay, then I am gone already [S-voons Gnoth I would make haste to the sexton now, but I'm afraid the tolling of the bell will wake her again If she be so wise as to go now—she stirs again, there's two lives of the nine gone

Aga O, wouldst thou not help to recover me, husband of Gnoth Alas, I could not find in my heart to hold thee by thy nose, or box thy cheeks, it goes against my conscience.

Aga I will not be thus frighted to my death, I'll search the church records a fortnight! 'tis

Too little of conscience, I cannot be so near,

O time, if thou be'st kind, lend me but a year! [Exit Gnoth What a spite's this, that a man cannot persuade his wife to die in any time with her good will! I have another bespoke already, though a piece of old beef will serve to breakfast, yet a man would be glad of a chicken to supper The clerk, I hope, understands no Hebrew, and cannot write backward what he hath write forward already, and then I am well enough.

'Tis but a month at most, if that were gone, My venture comes in with her two for one

'Tis use enough a' conscience for a broker—if he had a conscience. [Exit

John Ford.

The last great romantic tragedy of the seventeenth century is The Broken Heart This is the masterpiece of John Ford, a poet born twenty-two years later than Shakespeare, and detained, by some condition, the nature of which escapes us, from writing for the stage until long after that playwright's death In another dramatist, Shirley, we shall presently see the splendour of Elizabethan poetry descend into weakness and incoherency, but this is not what we are called upon to witness He, in his finest plays, and pre-eminently in the Broken Heart, reminds us less of the more glowing characteristics of the English school than of other dramatic literatures—that of Greece in the past, that of France in the immediate future must emphasise that severity, we might almost say that rigidity, which distinguishes Ford from all other English dramatists, and draws him nearer to Corneille and Rotrou in their devotion to dramatic discipline

John Ford was baptised at Ilsington, near Ashburton, in South Devon, on the 17th of April 1586 He was admitted to the Middle Temple in 1602, and he was probably the John Ford who had matriculated at Exeter College, Oxford, early in In 1606, being twenty years of age, Ford published a collection of elegies on the Earl of Devonshire, which he entitled Fame's Memorial, in the same year appeared a masque, Honor These unimportant tracts are all Trumphant that we possess of the youth of Ford, and his longsubsequent silence has never been explained has been suggested that some of his lost plays, particularly A Murder of the Son upon the Mother (in which he assisted Webster) and The Fairy Knight (with Dekker), may have been earlier than 1620, the date of his philosophical treatise, A Line of Life, but there is no proof of this Ford reappears in 1624, when The Sun's Darling, a masque he had written with Dekker, was acted at the Cockpit. Soon after this date, it is probable, he took up the profession of a playwright in earnest. Witch of Edmonton, a play by many hands, and his among the rest, belongs to this period, but was not printed until 1658

We cannot be sure that we trace the hand of Ford in any independent work of importance until he is between forty and fifty years of age tragic comedy of The Lover's Melancholy was acted in 1628 and published in 1629 These three great tragedies, 'Iis Pity, the Broken Heart, and Love's Sacrifice, belong to 1633, and Perkin Warbeck to 1634. The Fancies Chaste and Noble was printed in 1638, and The Lady's Trial in 1639 Ford's later works, a tragedy called Beauty in a Trance (1653), and three comedies were in existence until the eighteenth century, when they were burned, with so much else of irreparable value, by Warburton's infamous housekeeper Ford took the anagram 'Fide Honor' as a sort of armorial symbol, and these words generally appear on his title-pages Very little else is known of this poet, who appears to have led a retired life

> Deep in a dump John Ford was alone got, With folded arms and melancholy hat

When Jonson died, in 1637, Ford contributed a poem of the Jonsonus Virbius, and he wrote commendatory verses for Shirley's Wedding These trifles exhaust what is known of the personal history of Ford, who may have died at any time between 1640 and 1660, the probable date is 1656 He would then be seventy years of age

Charles Lamb, who was the earliest critic to perceive the value of Ford, boldly said that he 'was of the first order of poets' But this generous praise may easily produce disappointment in those who pass from it to the writings of Ford. He is austere, dry, monotonous, weighty with sustained intellectual and moral passion, deprived of the music and fancy and changing play of graceful ornament which are the gala-robes Ford is a curiously of the great, popular poets isolated figure, not supple, not various, but always furiously bent, like a stern charioteer, in one unaltered attitude, as he streams along upon the storm of violent emotion Hence to those who seek for beauty in poetry, Ford has it to offer only in its most sombre and lurid varieties, and even the precision of his thought and the purity of his style are not to every taste His highest performance in direct poetry is, doubtless, the episode of the nightingale and the lutanist, in the romantic comedy of the Lover's Melancholy, which should be compared with Crashaw's study on the same theme (page 678)

The play which deals with the ardours and agonies of Giovanni and Annabella is one of the most characteristic, if least pleasing, productions of the age. Here the suppressed horror which is so dear to the Elizabethan dramatists lights up the hollows of the human spirit in a way that is matchless for subtlety and intensity The last scene in which the brother and sister appear is of the highest magnificence as tragedy, and has been justly praised by Mr Swinburne as the finest in Their subject, however, was so repulsive that neither to this great play nor to the less skilful Love's Sacrifice can full justice ever be done It is natural to turn to more normal scenes in the correct but rather cold chronicle-play of Perkin Warbeck, or even to Ford's three graceful but somewhat ineffective comedies ? But the real field for the unbiassed study of Ford's qualities is the incomparable tragedy of the Broken Heart, which remains to us as one of the purest monuments of seventeenth-century poetry. It is this play on which the attention of the general reader may with most safety be concentrated

There is no play, then, in the English language which gives the impression of a fine French tragedy so completely as the Broken Heart, with its exact preservation of the unities, its serried action, its observance of the point of honour, its rapid and ingenious evolution of exalted intrigue Were it not for the dates, we could hardly account this accidental, but the latest possible year of composition for Ford's play is 1633, when Corneille had not finished composing Chitandre, the earliest Yet the reader should none the of his tragedies less be prepared for a performance more in the French than in the English taste, and for a piece perhaps the most 'classic' in our repertory vidual beauties, gushes of exquisite lyrical extravagance, are not in Ford's way The construction with him is not less solid than it is subtle, and it is the concentrated subtilty on which the solidity is built. Racine might have envied the skill with which, from the very first, the fate of Ithocles and Calantha, apparently so secure and so fortunate, flutters in the closed hand of Orgilus His revenge has a quiet resolution which is absolutely demoniac, and it moves, as a stage passion should, in full sight of the audience, though unsuspected by the other

The extreme consistency of Ithocles and Orgilus, as creations, throws into a certain disadvantage the more dimly-outlined Penthea and Calantha When Ithocles dies there is a crisis in the plot so violent that we recover from it with difficulty Penthea is dead and Orgilus assuaged, all the burden of the fifth act falls upon Calantha, whose part has hitherto been a vaguely passive one. The revelation of her ardent love for Ithocles, hitherto so modestly repressed, reawakens our sympathy, and the extraordinary merit of the fifth act consists in its revival, through the multiform passion of Calantha, of our interest in the dead Ithocles and Penthea, so that to the very last our emotions are centred on the beautiful, remorseful figure of Ithocles, for whom the play was certainly composed, and whose one error, followed though it be by a thousand excellent resolves, shatters the whole complicated structure of hope and happiness

From 'The Broken Heart'

Calantha Being alone, Penthea, you have granted The opportunity you sought, and might At all times have commanded

Penthea 'Tis a benefit
Which I shall owe your goodness even in death for My glass of life, sweet princess, hath few minutes Remaining to run down, the sands are spent,
For by an inward messenger I feel
The summons of departure short and certain.

Cal You feed too much your melancholy Pen

Of human greatness are but pleasing dreams
And shadows soon decaying on the stage
Of my mortality my youth hath acted
Some scenes of vanity, drawn out at length
By varied pleasures, sweetened in the mixture,
But tragical in issue beauty, pomp,
With every sensuality our giddiness
Doth frame an idol, are unconstant friends,
When any troubled passion makes assault

On the unguarded castle of the mind.

Cal Contemn not your condition for the proof Of bare opinion only to what end Reach all these moral texts?

Pen To place before ye A perfect mirror, wherein you may see How weary I am of a lingering life, Who count the best a misery

Cal Indeed

You have no little cause, yet none so great As to distrust a remedy

Pen That remedy
Must be a winding sheet, a fold of lead,
And some untrod on corner in the earth —
Not to detain your expectation, princess,
I have an humble suit

Cal Speak, I enjoy it

Pen Vouchsafe, then, to be my executrix, And take that trouble on ye to dispose Such legacies as I bequeath impartially, I have not much to give, the pains are easy, Heaven will reward your piety, and thank it When I am dead, for sure I must not live, I hope I cannot.

Cal Now, bestrew thy sadness,
Thou turn'st me too much woman [Weeps

Pen [aside] Her fair cyes
Melt into passion —Then I have assurance Encouringing my boldness. In this paper
My will was charactered, which you, with pardon,
Shall now know from mine own mouth

Cal Talk on, prithee, It is a pretty earnest.

Pen I have left me
But three poor jewels to bequeath The first is My youth, for though I am much old in griefs,
In years I am a child.

Cal To whom that jewel?

Pen To virgin wives, such as abuse not wedlock
By freedom of desires, but covet chiefly
The pledges of chaste beds for ties of love,
Rather than ranging of their blood, and next
To married maids, such as prefer the number
Of honourable issue in their virtues
Before the flattery of delights by marringe
May those be ever young!

Cal A second jewel

You mean to part with?

Pen 'Tis my fame, I trust
By scandal yet untouched this I bequeath
To Memory, and Time's old daughter, Truth
If ever my unhappy name find mention
When I am fallen to dust, may it deserve
Beseeming charity without dishonour!

Cal How handsomely thou play'st with harmless sport Of mere imagination! speak the last. I strangely like thy will

Pen This jewel, madam, Is dearly precious to me, you must use The best of your discretion to employ This gift as I intend it

Cal Do not doubt me.

Pen 'Tis long agone since first I lost my heart
Long I have lived without it, else for certain
I should have given that too, but instead
Of it, to great Calantha, Sparta's heir,

By service bound and by affection vow'd, I do bequeath, in holiest rites of love, Mine only brother, Ithoeles

Cal

What saidst thou?

Pen Impute not, heaven blest lady, to ambition A faith as humbly perfect as the prayers

Of a devoted suppliant can endow it
Look on him, princess, with an eye of pity,

How like the ghost of what he late appeared

He moves before you

Cal Shall I answer here, Or lend my car too grossly?

Pen First his heart
Shall fall in cinders, scorched by your disdain,
Ere he will dare, poor man, to ope an eye
On these divine looks, but with low bent thoughts
Accusing such presumption, as for words,
He dares not utter any but of service
Yet this lost creature loves ye —Be a princess
In sweetness as in blood, give him his doom,
Or ruse him up to comfort

Cal What new change Appears in my behaviour that thou dar'st Tempt my displeasure?

Pen I must leave the world,
To revel in Llysium, and 'tis just to wish my brother some advantage here,
Yet by my best hopes, Ithoeles is ignorant
Of this pursuit—but if you please to kill him,
Lend him one angry look or one harsh word,
And you shall soon conclude how strong a power
Your absolute authority holds over
His life and end

Cal You have forgot, Penthea, How still I have a fither

Pen But remeinber
I am a sister, though to me this brother
Hath been, you know, unkind, O, most unkind!
Cal Christalla, Philema, where are ye?—Lady,

Your check lies in my silcnce (From Act iii se v)

Song from 'The Broken Heart'

Glories, pleasures, pomps, delights and ease, Can but please.
Outward senses, when the mind Is untroubled, or by peace refin'd Crowns may flourish and decay, Beauties shine, but fade away Youth may revel, yet it must Lie down in a bed of dust Larthly honours flow and waste, Time alone doth change and last. Sorrows mingled with contents prepare Rest for care
Love only reigns in death, though art Can find no comfort for a Broken Heart.

From 'The Lover's Melancholy'

Menaphon Passing from Italy to Greece, the titles Which poets of an elder time have feighted To glorify their Tempe, bred in me Desire of visiting that paradise Fo Thessaly I came, and living private, Without acquaintance of more sweet companions Than the old inmates to my love, my thoughts, I day by day frequented silent groves And solitary walks. One morning early

Fins accident encountered me I heard
The sweetest and most ravishing contention
That art and nature ever were at strife in Amethus I cannot yet conceive what you infer
By art and nature

Men I shall soon resolve ye A sound of music touched mine ears, or rather Indeed entranced my soul As I stole nearer, Invited by the melody, I saw I his youth, this fair faced youth, upon his lute, With strains of strange variety and harmony, Proclaiming, as it seemed, so bold a challenge fo the clear quiristers of the woods, the birds, That, as they flocked about him, all stood silent, Wondering at what they heard. I wondered too

Amet And so do I, good, on!

Men A nightingale,
Nature's best skilled musician, undertakes
The challenge, and for every several strain
The well shiped youth could touch, she sung her own,
He could not run division with more art
Upon his quaking instrument than she,
The nightingale, did with her various notes
Reply to for a voice and for a sound, Amethus, 'tis much easier to believe
That such they were than hope to hear again

Amet How did the rivids part?

Men You term them rightly, I or they were rivals, and their mistress, harmony — Some time thus spent, the young man grew at last Into a pretty anger, that a bird Whom art had never taught cliffs, moods, or notes, Should vie with him for mastery, whose study Had busied many hours to perfect practice To end the controversy, in a rapture Upon his instrument he plays so swiftly, So many voluntaries and so quick, That there was curiosity and cunning, Concord in discord, lines of differing method

Meeting in one full centre of delight

Imet Now for the bird

Men I he bird, ordained to be Music's first martyr, strove to imitate These several sounds, which when her warbling throat lailed in, for grief down dropped she on his lute, And brake her heart. It was the quaintest sadness, to see the conqueror upon her hearse. It weep a funcial elegy of tears, That, trust me, my Amethus, I could chide Mine own unmanly weakness, that made me A fellow mourner with him.

Inct
I believe thee
Iden He looked upon the trophies of his art,
Then sighed, then wiped his eyes, then sighed and cried,
'Alas, poor creature! I will soon revenge
This crucity upon the author of it,
Henceforth this lute, guilty of innocent blood,
Shall never more betray a harmless peace
To an untimely end ' and in that sorrow,
As he was pashing it against a tree,
I suddenly stept in

Amet I hou hast discoursed A truth of mirth and pity

EDMUND GOSSE.

James Shirley.

It has long been one of the commonplaces of literary history that the great series of Elizabethan and Jacobean dramatists, which began with Marlowe, closed with Shirley He was the youngest of them all, having been born on the 18th of September 1596—after the death, that is, of almost all the members of the pre-Shakespearean genera-It is thought that Shirley's birthplace was the parish of St Mary Woolchurch, in the city of He was educated at Merchant Taylors' School, and at St John's College, Oxford, where he attracted the attention of Laud, who was then Laud was very kind to Shirley, but dissuaded him from taking holy orders on account of a large wen which disfigured his left cheek. affliction, greatly softened down, is yet perceptible in the Bodleian portrait. As early as 1618 Shirley published a poem, Echo, or the Unfortunate Lovers, of which no copy is now known to exist. It was probably, however, identical with the Narcissus printed in 1646, and if so, was one of the sensuous and philosophical narratives fashionable at that time, of which Shakespeare's Venus and Adonis is the most celebrated example In this graceful exercise Shirley displays the influence of Marlowe and of Beaumont

As was not unusual in the seventeenth century, Shirley transferred himself from one university to the other, 'he did spend some precious years at Catherine Hall,' Cambridge, where he took his degree. He stayed there, perhaps, until in 1623 he was appointed a master in St Albans Grammar-School But in the meantime he had, in spite of Laud's objection, taken orders and been presented to a living, which, however, he resigned immediately, having become a convert to the Church of Rome It is said that he continued to be a schoolmaster for about two years, but all this portion of Shirley's career is very indistinctly, and probably very inevactly, reported to us

In his twenty-ninth year Shirley took seriously to the stage, doubtless as the only mode of making a livelihood open to him His first play, Love Tricks, was licensed in February 1625, but was not printed until 1631, when it passed through the press as The School of Complement It was very popular, although, to a modern judgment, it seems weak both from a literary and a theatrical point It imitates Shakespeare and Fletcher in the pastoral scenes, and has no particular individu-Yet the style, fluent, urbane, and correct, is that which was to characterise Shirley throughout his long career The first of Shirley's published plays, his comedy of The Wedding, 1629, has more merit of construction, and The Grateful Servant, 1630, placed the poet high among the dwindling band of dramatists who still kept up something of the great Elizabethan tradition Of these survivors, Marston, Heywood, Chapman, and Dekker had long been silent, and the only serious rivals whom the new poet had to encounter were Ben Jonson, Massinger, and Ford

Shirley was now resident in London, and he took a prominent part in the literary life of the His temperament seems to have been, like his verse, graceful and gentle. Among his friends he counted Ford, Massinger, Randolph, Stanley, and Thomas May He now took to the composition of tragedies, of which the earliest may have been The Traitor, acted in 1631 and pub-He wrote other tragedies, and lished in 1635 then turned back to the romantic comedies which best suited his talent. From 1631 to 1635 Shirley produced twelve consecutive comedies, closing with what is his finest work in this class, the admirable Shirley had by this time gained Lady of Pleasure a high reputation for the modesty of his writings, and in July 1633, when registering The Young Admiral, the Master of the Revels volunteered a testimonial to that effect, in which Shirley was encouraged 'to pursue this beneficial and cleanly way of poetry' Charles I said that The Gamester, which was acted in 1633, was 'the best play he had seen for seven years?

It is believed that Shirley went over to Dublin in the early part of 1636 to help Ogilby in working the new theatre which had been built in Werburgh He seems to have remained in Ireland until 1639 or the beginning of 1640 the plays which he produced in Dublin, St Patrick for Ireland is the most original, or at least the most eccentric, the extremely selfcontained dramatist appears on this one occasion to kick over the traces of a studied sobriety Among the Irish plays, The Royal Master and The Humorous Courtier deserve special mention Between Shirley's return from Dublin to London and the first ordinance for the suppression of stage plays, he was the foremost playwright in England, and is believed in this short time to have Of these last plays, The produced ten dramas Cardinal is the best Shirley, who was a pronounced Royalist, and had been valet of the chamber to Queen Henrietta Maria, lost all at the After the battle of Marston Moor he Rebellion accompanied to France the Duke of Newcastle, whom he had aided in poetical composition, but he presently crept back to England, where Thomas Stanley protected him He went back to his old trade of education, and started a successful school in Whitefriars In 1646 he issued a collection of his poems It would seem that he did not benefit from the Restoration In the Great Fire of London, Shirley and his second wife fled from their house near Fleet Street, and, dying of terror and exposure on the same day, were buried in St Giles-in-the-Fields, in one grave, on the 29th of October 1666 We gather that Shirley had suffered from fire before, since his The Grammar War (1635), a didactic production, contains 'A lamentation upon the conflagration of the Muses' habitation'

In the plays of Shirley, which are curiously uniform in manner, we find grace, melody, and The violent elements of the great Elizabethan age seem to have been entirely absorbed, and only the gentle and playful ones left. Shirley wrote with pertinacious industry, and, although a great part of his work is probably lost, between forty and fifty of his tragedies, comedies, tragicomedies, pastorals, and masques have come down In this mass of writing-produced between 1625 and 1655, while English poetry was being subjected to a rapid and surprising transformationthere are no signs of change From The Wedding to The Sisters, Shirley remains exactly the same suave, sweet-tongued, and florid poet, although the England of Shakespeare was shortly to become the England of Dryden The plays of Shuley seem to have been popular on the stage, at all events in the early part of his career, and if we are inclined to consider them loosely constructed and thinly conceived in comparison with those of the great playwrights of the preceding generation, we have only to turn from them to those of his immediate contemporaries—such as Cartwright, Brome, and Jasper Mayne—to see that Shirley preserved far more than any other Commonwealth man the practical tradition of the stage comedies, the Witty Fair One and the Lady of Pleasure display his ornate and profuse fancy to the greatest advantage In the Traitor he comes nearest to being a fine tragedian

From 'The Traitor'

Amidea I have done, pray be not angry,
That still I wish you well may heaven divert
All harms that threaten you, full blessings crown
Your marriage! I hope there is no sin in this,
Indeed I cannot choose but pray for you
This might have been my wedding-day

Oriana Good heaven,

I would it were ' my heart can tell, I take No joy in being his bride, none in your prayers, You shall have my consent to have him still I will resign my place, and wait on you, If you will marry him

Am: Pray do not mock me, But if you do, I can forgive you too

Or: Dear Amidea, do not think I mock. Your sorrow, by these tears, that are not worn. By every virgin on her wedding day, I am compell'd to give away myself. Your hearts were promis'd, but he ne'er had mine. Am not I wretched too?

Ami Alas, poor maid! We too keep sorrow alive then, but I prithee, When thou art married, love him, prithee love him, For he esteems thee well, and once a day Give him a kiss for me, but do not tell him? Twas my desire perhaps? twill fetch a sigh From him, and I had rather break my heart But one word more, and heaven be with you all—Since you have led the way, I hope, my lord, That I am free to marry too?

Prsano Thou art

Ami. Let me beseech you then, to be so kind,

After your own solemnities are done, lograce my wedding, I shall be married shortly Pis To whom?

Ami To one whom you have all heard talk of, Your fathers knew him well—one who will never Give cause I should suspect him to forsake me, A constant lover, one whose lips, though cold, Distil chaste kisses—though our bridal bed Be not adorn'd with roses, 'twill be green, We shall have virgin laurel, cypress, yew, To make us garlands, though no pine do'burn, Our nuptial shall have torches, and our chamber Shall be cut out of marble, where we'll sleep, Free from all care for ever—Death, my lord, I hope, shall be my husband—Now, farewell, Although no kiss, accept my parting tear, And give me leave to wear my willow here.

(From Act IV sc. ui)

Song from 'The Imposture'

You virgins, that did late despair
To keep your wealth from cruel men,
I ie up in silk your careless hair,
Soft peace is come agen.

Now lovers' eyes may gently shoot A flame that will not kill, The drum was angry, but the lute Shall whisper what you will

Sing Io, Io' for his sake,
Who hath restor'd your drooping heads,
With choice of sweetest flowers, make
A garden where he treads

Whilst we whole groves of laurel bring,
A petty triumph to his brow,
Who is the master of our spring,
And all the bloom we owe

(From Act 1 sc 1L)

From 'The Lady of Pleasure'

Steward Be patient, madam, you may have your pleasure

Lady Bornwell 'Tis that I came to town for I would not Endure again the country conversation,
To be the lady of six shires! The men,
So near the primitive making, they retain
A sense of nothing but the earth, their brains,
And barren heads standing as much in want
Of ploughing as their ground. To hear a fellow
Make himself merry and his horse, with whistling Sallinger's Round! To observe with what solemnity
They keep their wakes, and throw for pewter candle sticks!

How they become the Morris, with whose bells They ring all in to Whitsun ales, and sweat, Through twenty scarfs and napkins, till the Hobbyhorse Tire, and the Maid Marian, dissolv'd to a jelly, Be kept for spoon meat!

Stew These, with your pardon, are no argument To make the country life appear so hateful, At least to your particular, who enjoy'd A blessing in that calin, would vou be pleas'd To think so, and the pleasure of a kingdom, While your own will commanded what should move Delights, your husband's love and power join'd

To give your life more harmony You hy'd there Secure, and innocent, beloved of all, Prais'd for your hospitality, and pray'd for You might be envied, but malice knew I would not prophesy, Not where you dwelt But leave to your own apprehension, What may succeed your change

Lady B You do imagine, No doubt, you have talk'd wisely, and confuted London past all defence. Your master should Do well to send you back into the country, With title of superintendent-bailiff

[Enter Sir Thomas Bornwell

Bornwell How now? What's the matter? Stew Nothing, sir Born Angry, sweetheart? Lady B I am angry with myself, To be so miserably restrain'd in things, Wherein it doth concern your love and honour To see me satisfied

Born In what, Aretina, Dost thou accuse me? Have I not obey'd All thy desires? against mine own opinion Quitted the country, and removed the hope Of our return, by sale of that fair lordship We lived in? changed a calm and retired life For this wild town, compos'd of noise and charge?

Lady B What charge, more than is necessary for A lady of my birth and education?

Born I am not ignorant how much nobility Flows in your blood, your kinsmen great and powerful I' the state, but with this, lose not you [the] memory Of being my wife I shall be studious, Madam, to give the dignity of your birth All the best ornaments which become my fortune, But would not flatter it, to ruin both, And be the fable of the town, to teach - Other men loss of wit by mine, employ'd To serve your vast expenses.

Lady B Am I then Brought in the balance? So, sir! Born Though you weigh Me in a partial scale, my heart is honest, And must take liberty to think you have Obey'd no modest counsel, to affect, Nay, study ways of pride and costly ceremony Your change of gaudy furniture, and pictures Of this Italian master, and that Dutchman, Your mighty looking glasses, like artillery, Brought home on engines, the superfluous plate, Antique and novel, vanities of tires, Fourscore pound suppers for my lord, your kinsman, Banquets for t' other lady aunt, and cousins, And perfumes that exceed all train of servants, I o stifle us at home, and shew abroad More motley than the French or the Venction. About your coach, whose rude postillion Must pester every narrow lane, till passengers And tradesmen curse your choking up their stalls, And common cries pursue your ladyship, For hindering of their market.

Lady B Have you done, sir? Born I could accuse the gaiety of your wardrobe, And prodigal embroideries, under which Rich satins, plushes, cloth of silver, dare Not shew their own complexions, your jewels,

Able to burn out the spectators' eyes, And shew like bonfires on you by the tapers - omething might here be spar'd, with safety of Your birth and honour, since the truest wealth Shines from the soul, and draws up just admirers — I could urge something more

Lady B Pray do, I like Your homily of thrift

Born I could wish, madam, You would not game so much

Lady B A gamester too!

Born But are not come to that acquaintance yet, Should teach you skill enough to raise your profit. You look not through the subtilty of cards, And mysteries of dice, nor can you save Charge with the box, buy petticoats and pearls, And keep your family by the precious income. Nor do I wish you should my poorest servant Shall not upbraid my tables, nor his hire, Purchas'd beneath my honour You make play Not a pastime but a tyranny, and vex Yourself and my estate by it

Lady B Good ' proceed

Born Another game you have, which consumes more Your fame than purse, your revels in the night, Your meetings call'd THE BALL, to which repair, As to the court of pleasure, all your gallants, And ladies, thither bound by a subpaina Of Venus, and small Cupid's high displeasure, 'I'is but the Family of Love translated Into more costly sin! There was a Play on 't, And had the poet not been bribed to a modest Expression of your antic gambols in 't, Some darks had been discover'd, and the deeds too In time he may repent, and make some blush, To see the second part danced on the stage My thoughts acquit you for dishonouring me By any foul act, but the virtuous know 'Tis not enough to clear ourselves, but the Suspicions of our shame

Lady B Have you concluded Your lecture?

Born I have done, and howsoever My language may appear to you, it carries No other than my fair and just intent To your delights, without curb to their modest And noble freedom.

Sellinger's Round was a dance called after an actor named St Leger To throw is here said of cock throwing, an old Shrovetide pastime-the prize in this case being candlesticks. Robin Hood, Maid Marian, the hobby horse, and the fool, all in more or less fantastic costumes, were the principal performers in the Old English May day Morris dances.

In The Ball, a comedy partly by Chapman, but chiefly by Shirley, a coxcomb (Bostock), crazed on the point of family, is admirably shown up Marmaduke Travers, by way of fooling him, tells' him that he is rivalled in his suit of a particular lady by Sir Ambrose Lamount

Bostock Does she love any body else? Travers I know not, But she has half a score, upon my knowledge, Are suitors for her favour Bos Name but one,

And if he cannot shew as many coats-

Trav He thinks he has good cards for her, and likes His game well.

Bos Bc an understanding knight, And take my meaning, if he cannot show As much in heraldry-

Irav I do not know how rich, he is in fields, But he is a gentleman.

Bos Is he a branch of the nobility? How many lords can he call cousin? else He must be taught to know he has presumed, To stand in competition with me Frav You will not kill him? Bos You shall pardon me,

I have that within me must not be provok'd, There be some living now, that have been kill'd For lesser matters

Trav Some living that have been kill'd! Bor I mean, some living that have been examples, Not to confront nobility,' and I Am sensible of my honour

7rav His name is Sir Ambrose-

Bos Lamount, a knight of yesterday! And he shall die to morrow, name another 7rav Not so fast, sir, you must take some breath Bos I care no more for killing half a dozen Knights of the lower house, I mean that are not Descended from nobility, than I do To kick my footman an Sir Ambrose were Knight of the sun, king Oberon should not save him, [Enter Sir Ambrose Lamount Nor his queen Mab Trav Unluckily he's here, sir

Bos Sir Ambrose, How does thy knighthood, ha? Lamount My imp of honour! well, I joy to see thee Bos Sir Marmaduke tells me thou art suitor to

Lady Lucina. Lam I have ambition

To be her servant

Bos Hast? Thou'rt a brave knight, and I commend thy judgment Lam Sir Marmaduke himself leans that way too

Bos Why did'st conceal it? come, the more the merrier,

But I could never see you there.

Trav I hope, Sir, we may live?

Bos I'll tell you, gentlemen, Cupid has given us all one livery, I serve that lady too, you understand me, But who shall carry her, the Fates determine, I could be knighted too

Lam That would be no addition to your blood Bos I think it would not, so my lord told me. Thou know'st my lord, not the earl, my t'other Cousin? there's a spark!—his predecessors Have match'd into the blood, you understand He put me upon this lady, I proclaim No hopes, pray let's together, gentlemen,-If she be wise,—I say no more, she shall not Cost me a sigh, nor shall her love engage me To draw a sword, I have vow'd that

Trav You did But jest before

Lam 'Twere pity that one drop Of your heroic blood should fall to the ground

Who knows but all your cousin lords may die? bos As I believe them not immortal, sir Lam Then you are gulf of honour, swallow all,-May marry some queen yourself, and get princes, To furnish the barren parts of christendom

The following lyric is found in Shirley's masque, The Contention of Ajax and Ulysses (1659) said to have been greatly admired by Charles II

Death's Final Conquest.

The glories of our blood and state Are shadows, not substantial things, There is no armour against fate, Death lays his icy hand on kings Scepter and crown Must tumble down, And in the dust be equal made With the poor crooked scythe and spade

Some men with swords may reap the field, And plant fresh laurels where they kill, But their strong nerves at last must yield, They tame but one another still

Early or late

They stoop to fate, And must give up their murmuring breath, When they, pale captives, creep to death

The garlands wither on your brow, Then boast no more your mighty deeds, Upon Death's purple altar now, See, where the victor victim bleeds Your heads must come To the cold tomb, Only the actions of the just Smell sweet, and blossom in their dust.

Shirley's Dramatic Works were edited by Gifford and Dice (6 vols. 1833), and there is a selection of five plays and one masque with a prefatory memoir by the present writer (1888)

EDMUND GOSSŁ

Minor Dramatists — Thomas Nabbes (died about 1645) wrote poor tragedies, tolerable comedies, and rather good masques Microcosmus and Spring's Glory are the best-known masques Some of his miscellaneous poems are good. published his works (except his prose continuation of Knolles's Historie of the Turkes) in his Old English Plays (1887) — Nathaniel Field (1587-1633) was a well-known actor who began to write for the stage about 1610, and produced A Woman is a Weathercock, Amends for Ladies, &c. had the honour of being associated with Massinger in the composition of the Fatal Dowry—Henry Glapthorne, at one time reputed 'one of the chiefest dramatic poets of the reign of Charles I,' is but a minor dramatist though he is fluent and eloquent in style. Five of his plays are printed -Albertus Wallenstein, The Hollander, Argalus and Parthema (his best effort, being part of the Arcadia dramatised), Wit is a Constable, The Ludy's Priviledge These and his poems were reprinted in two volumes in 1874.—Richard Brome (died about 1652) produced twenty-four popular plays, The Northern Lass, The Journal Crew, The Antipodes, The City Wit, The Court Beggar, &c., fifteen of which, believed to be written by himself independently, were reprinted in three vols 1873. He had a share with Dekker in The Lancashire Witches He was at one time servant to Ben Jonson A skilful and successful craftsman, he had neither original power, poetic genius, nor literary culture

Richard Brathwaite, minor poet, was probably born near Kendal in 1588, entered Oriel College, Oxford, in 1604, passed afterwards to Cambridge, and thence to London In 1611 he published The Golden Fleece, a collection of poems, in 1614 three works, one of them a book of pastorals entitled The Poet's Willow, another The Scholler's Medley, and in 1615 the collection of satires, A Strappado for the Devil, in imitation of The Abuses Whipt and Stript of George Wither, his 'bonnie brother' Other works are Nature's Embassie, A Solemne Joviall Disputation, The Smoaking Age, The English Gentleman (1630), The English Gentlewoman (1631), Art asleepe, Husband? (a collection of 'bolster lectures,' a seventeenth-century Mrs Caudle) After his first marriage Brathwaite lived the life of a country gentleman in Westmorland, and after his second in Yorkshire. He died near Richmond, 4th May 1673 Of his thirty books, the Barnabæ Itinerarium, or Barnabee's Journal, published in 1638 under the pseudonym 'Corymbæus,' has been often reprinted under the title of 'Drunken Barnaby's Four Journeys'—a facetious but rather umless and tedious book in rhymed Latin and corresponding doggerel English verse The best known verse is

> In my progress travelling northward Taking farewel of the southward, To Banbury came I, O profane one! Where I saw a puritane one Hunging of his cat on Monday For killing of a mouse on Sunday

The Latin being

In progressu boreali
Ut processi ab australi,
Veni Banbury, O profanum
Ubi vidi Puritanum
Felem facientem furem,
Quod Sabbatho stravit murem.

The next verse is

To Oxford came I, whose companion
Is Minerva, well Platonian
From whose seat do stream most seemly
Aganippe, Hippocrene
Each thing there's the muse's minion,
The horn at Queen's speaks pure Athenian

The frequent allusions to strong ale, and to deep drinking and its joys and inconveniences, quite explain the epithet added in the reprints. In the seventh edition (by Haslewood, 1818) its authorship was first made known. See the life prefixed to the ninth edition (1820). An eleventh edition appeared in 1876.

Brathwaite's work was not all in the same vein. Of 'Drunken Barnaby' there is no trace in The English Gentleman and English Gentlewoman, collectively making a folio of three hundred pages, which is edifying, decorous, and 'high-toned' to a degree, and emulates Burton's Anatomy in the multitude and variety of its citations from Eusebius, Tully, Diogenes Laertius, Plutarch, Augustine, Seneca, St Basil, St Gregory of Nazianzus, Picus de Mirandula, and other authorities ancient or comparatively Vanity, foppery, idleness, hot-headedness, and intemperance of any and every kind are wisely and wittily denounced The corresponding defects in women are deprecated with equal warmth, and an even higher standard of perfect grace, courtesy, and purity established And so careful is the author for happiness in wedded life that he warns the husband not to busy himself too much in dairying lest the wife be aggrieved at this encroachment on her province Amorous poetryincluding Venus and Adonis, though without giving Shakespeare's name—is sternly denounced—In the chapter called 'A select choice and recommendation of sundry bookes of instruction to the perusall of our English gentlewomen,' the authors recommended are SS Hierom, Augustine, Ambrose, Hilary, Gregory (on the virtues of women), also Plato, Seneca, Cicero, 'etc', with the following postscript, which most unhappily omits to specify the works without which the library of no contemporary English lady was complete

But for as much as it is not given to most of you to bee Linguists, albeit many of their workes bee translated in your mother tongue, you may converse with sundry English Authors, whose excellent instructions will sufficiently store you in all points, and if usefully applied conferre no small benefit to your understanding. I shall not need particularly to name them to you, because I doubt not but you have made choice of such faithfull Reteiners and vertuous Bosome friends constantly to accompany you.

Hear 'Drunken Barnaby' on the dangers and disgraces of drinking

Neither onely is restraint to be used in the choice and change of meats, but in the excessive use of drinkes The reasons are two, the one is, it is an enemy to the knowledge of God, the other is this, it is held to be an enfeebler or impairer of the memorative parts, for you shall ever note that deepe drinkers have but shallow Their common saying is, Let us drowne care memories in healths which drowning of care makes them so forgetfull of themselves, as carried away with a brutish appetite, they onely intend their present delight, without reflexion to what is past, or due preparation to what O restraine then this mighty assailant may succeed of Temperance! Bee ever your selves, but principally stand upon your guard, when occasion of company shall induce you, being the last we are to speake of

This Company keeping, how much it both depraved the hopefullest and towardlest wits, daily experience can witnesse. For many wee see civilly affected and temper ately disposed, of themselves not subject to those violent or brain sicke passions which the fumes of drinke beget, till out of a too pliable disposition they enter the lists of Good fellowship (as they commonly terme it) and so become estranged from their owne nature, to partake with Zames in their distempered humour. So as in time by consorting with evill men they become exposed to all immoderate affections, such is the strength of custome ! Whence it is that Saint Basil saith, Passions rise up in a drunken man (note the violence of this distemper) like a swarme of Bees buzzing on every side Now you shall see him compassionately passionate, re solving his humour into teares, anon like a phrenticke man, exercising himselfe in blowes, presently, as if a calmer or more peaceable humour had seized on him, he expresseth his loving nature in congres and kisses So different are the affections which this valiant Mault worme is subject to, yet howsoever out of a desperate Bravado he binde it with oathes that he will stand to his tackling, he is scarce to be credited, for he can stand on no ground

William Browne (1591-c 1643) was a pastoral and descriptive poet, who, like Phineas and Giles Fletcher, adopted Spenser for his model, but less exclusively-for he loved Chaucer and Hoccleve, and was influenced by several of his own contemporaries He was a native of Tavistock, and the beautiful scenery of Devonshire inspired his early strains From Exeter College, Oxford, Browne passed to the Inner Temple, and then was tutor to Robert Dormer, the future Earl of Carnarvon According to Anthony Wood, he was taken into the household of the Herberts at Wilton, and 'there got wealth and purchased an He was living at Dorking towards the close of 1643, and later than this we hear nothing of him A William Browne died at Tavistock in 1643, and another in 1645, but it is not known for certain that either of them was the poet Browne's works comprise Britannia's Pastorals (two books, 1613-16, third book in MS, first printed 1852) and a pastoral poem of inferior merit, The Shephiards In 1620 a masque by him was pro-Pipe (1614) duced at court, called The Inner Temph Masque, but it was not printed till 1772, from a manuscript in Emmanuel College, Cambridge As all Browne's poems were produced before he was thirty years of age, and the best when he was little more than twenty, we need not be surprised at their showing marks of juvenility and frequent echoes of previous poets, especially of Spenser His pastorals obtained the approbation of Selden, Drayton, Wither, and Ben Jonson Britannia's Pastorals are written in flowing heroic couplets, and contain much Browne had great facility fine descriptive poetry of expression, studied nature closely, and knew by heart all the features of the Devon landscape That he has fuled in maintaining his ground must be attributed to his too great expansiveness, the desultory plan of his longer poems, and the lack His shepherds and shepof human interest. herdesses have nearly as little character as the 'silly sheep' they tend, the, allegory is tedious, whilst pure description, that 'takes the place of sense,' even when inspired by a real love of nature, seldom permanently interests the larger number of readers. So completely had some of the poems of Browne vanished from memory that, but for a single copy of them possessed by Thomas Warton, and lent by him to be transcribed, little would have remained of those works which their author fondly hoped would Keep his name enroll'd past his that shines In gilded marble, or in brazen leaves.

Warton cites the following lines of Browne as containing a group of the same images as the morning picture in L'Allegio of Milton

By this had chanticleer, the village clock,
Bidden the goodwife for her maids to knock,
And the swart ploughman for his breakfast stay'd,
That he might till those lands were fallow laid
The hills and valleys here and there resound
With the re-echoes of the deep mouth d hound
Lach shepherd's daughter, with her cleanly peal,
Was come afield to milk the morning's meal,
And ere the sun had climb'd the eastern hills,
To gild the mutt'ring bourns and pretty rills,
Before the lab'ring bee had left the hive,
And nimble fishes which in rivers dive
Began to leap, and eatch the drowned fly,
I rose from rest, not in felicity

Browne celebrated the death of a friend under the name of Philarete in a pastoral poem. Milton took thence suggestions for Lycidas, there is an obvious—perhaps inevitable—similarity in some of the thoughts and images. On the other hand, Browne has been compared with Keats amongst the moderns, and Keats is known to have admired his Elizabethan prototype.

A Descriptive Sketch.

O what a rapture have I gotten now ! That age of gold, this of the lovely brow Have drawn me from my song! I onward run Clean from the end to which I first begun But ye, the heavenly creatures of the West, In whom the virtues and the graces rest, Pardon! that I have run astray so long, And grow so tedious in so rude a song, If you yourselves should come to add one grace Unto a pleasant grove or such like place, Where here the curious cutting of a hedge There, by a pond, the trumming of the sedge Here the fine setting of well shading trees The walks there mounting up by small degrees, The grivel and the green so equal he, It, with the rest, draws on your ling'ring eye Here the sweet smells that do perfume the ur, Arising from the infinite repair Of odorifcrous buds and herbs of price, (As if it were another Paradise) So please the smelling sense, that you are fain Where last you walk'd to turn and walk again. There the small birds with their harmonions note. Sing to a spring that smileth as she float-For in her face a many dimples show, And often skips as it did dancing go Here further down an over arched alley, That from a hill goes winding in a valley,

You spy at end thereof a standing lake, Where some ingenious artist strives to make The water (brought in turning pipes of lead Through birds of earth most lively fashioned) To counterfeit and mock the sylvans all, In singing well their own set madrigal This with no small delight retains your car, And makes you think none blest but who live there Then in another place the fruits that be In gallant clusters decking each good tree Invite your hand to crop some from the stem, And liking one, taste every sort of them Then to the arbours walk, then to the bowers Thence to the walks again, thence to the flowers, Then to the birds, and to the clear spring thence, Now pleasing one, and then another sense Here one walks oft, and yet anew begin'th, As if it were some hidden labyrinth

Evening

As in an evening when the gentle air Breathes to the sullen night a soft repair, I oft have sat on Thames' sweet bank to hear My friend with his sweet touch to charm mine car, When he hath play'd, as well he can, some strun That likes me, straight I ask the same again, And he as gladly granting, strikes it o'er With some sweet rulish was forgot before, I would have been content if he would play In that one strain to pass the night away, But fearing much to do his patience wrong, Unwillingly have ask'd some other song So in this diff'ring key, though I could well A many hours but as few minutes tell. Yet lest mine own delight might injure you, Though loath so soon, I take my song anew

Night.

The sable mantle of the silent night Shut from the world the ever joysome light, Care fled away, and softest slumbers please To leave the court for lowly cottages, Wild beasts forsook their dens on woody hills, And sleightful otters left the purling rills, Rooks to their nests in high woods now were flung, And with their spread wings shield their naked young, When thieves from thickets to the cross ways stir, And terror frights the lonely passenger, When nought was heard but now and then the how! Of some vild cur, or whooping of the owl

The Sirens' Song (From The Inner Lemple Masque)

Steer hither, steer, your winged pines, All beaten mariners, Here lie Love's undiscover'd mines, A prey to passengers, Perfumes far sweeter than the best Which make the Phœnix' urn and nest. Fear not your ships, Nor any to oppose you save our hps, But come on shore, Where no joy dies till love hath gotten more

For swelling waves our panting breasts, Where never storms arise, Exchange, and be awhile our guests For stars gaze on our eyes

The compass love shall hourly sing, And as he goes about the ring, We will not miss To tell each point he nameth with a kiss.

Browne thus ingeniously draws illustrations from a rose

Look as a sweet rose fairly budding forth Bewrays her beauties to th' enamour'd morn, Until some keen blast from the envious North Kills the sweet bud that was but newly born Or else her rarest smells delighting Make her herself betray, Some white and curious hand inviting To pluck her thence away

So recently as 1852 a third part of Britannia's Pastorals was first printed, from the original minuscript in the library of Salisbury Cathedral Though imperfect, this continuation is in some passages fully equal to the earlier portions The following is part of a description of Psyche

Her cheekes the wonder of what eye beheld Begott betwixt a filly and a rose, In gentle rising plaines devinely swelled, Where all the graces and the loves repose Nature in this peece all her workes excelled, Yet showd her solfe imperfect in the close, For she forgott (when she soe faire did rayse her) To give the world a witt might duely prayse her

When that she spoake, as at a voice from heaven On her sweet words all eares and hearts attended, When that she sung, they thought the planetts seaven By her sweet voice might well their tunes have mended,

When she did sight, all were of joye bereaven, And when she smyld, heaven had them all befriended. If that her voice, sighes, smiles, see many thrilled, O had she kissed, how many had she killed!

Her slender fingers (neate and worthy made To be the servants to soe much perfection) Joyned to a palme whose touch woulde streight invade And bring a sturdy heart to lowe subjection Her slender wrists two diamond braceletts lade. Made richer by soc sweet a soules election O happy braceletts ! but more happy he To whom those armes shall as a bracelett be!

Aubrey said Browne was the author of the famous epitaph, 'Underneath this sable herse,' usually attributed to Ben Jonson (see above at page 411), and Mr Bullen and other critics think it is really Browne's

Browne's works were edited by Thomas Davies (1772) Mr W C Hazlitt (2 vols. Roxburghe Club, 1868) and by Goodwin, with Mr Bullen's introduction (2 vols 1894)

Lady Elizabeth Carey, or Carew, the daughter of a patroness of Spenser, Nash, and other poets, is believed to be the author of a longwinded poem, The Tragedie of Marian the faire Queene of Jewry (1613) She married Sir Thomas Berkeley, and died in 1635 But the poem is sometimes attributed to her mother, known by the same names, a daughter of Sır John Spencer of Althorpe, and wife of the heir of the first Lord Hunsdon The following chorus on revenge, from Act IV, is not without a certain noble dignity

The fairest action of our human life
Is scorning to revenge an injury,
For who forgives without a further strife,
His adversary's heart to him doth tie.
And 'tis a firmer conquest truly said,
To win the heart than overthrow the head

If we a worthy enemy do find,

To yield to worth it must be nobly done,
But if of baser metal be his mind,

In base revenge there is no honour won. Who would a worthy courage overthrow, And who would wrestle with a worthless for?

We say our hearts are great, and cannot yield,
Because they cannot yield, it proves them poor
Great hearts are tasked beyond their power, but seld.
The weakest him will the loudest roar
Truth's school for certain doth this same allow,
High heartedness doth sometimes teach to bow.

A noble heart doth teach a virtuous scorn.

To scorn to owe a duty over long,

To scorn to be for benefits forborne,

Fo scorn to he, to scorn to do a wrong,

I o scorn to bear an injury in mind,

Fo scorn a free born heart slave like to bind

But if for wrongs we needs revenge must have, Then be our vengeance of the noblest kind, Do we his body from our fury save, And let our hate prevail against our mind?

And let our hate prevail against our mind? What can 'gainst him a greater vengeance be, Than make his foe more worthy far than he?

Had Marian scorned to leave a due unpaid,
She would to Herod then have paid her love,
And not have been by sullen passion swayed
To fix her thoughts all injury above
Is virtuous pride—Had Marian thus been proud,
Long famous life to her had been allowed

Lord Herbert of Cherbury combined in a curious way the fame of soldier, statesman, poet, and philosopher, and though the brother of the saintly George Herbert, became notorious (after his Edward was born death) as the father of deism 3rd March 1583 at Eyton, in Shropshire before he had finally quitted his studies at University College, Oxford, he married an heiress four years older than himself At James I's coronation he was made a Knight of the Bath, in 1608 he visited France, and in 1610 was at the recapture of In 1614 he was with Maurice of Orange, travelled through Germany and Italy, and got into trouble attempting to recruit Protestant soldiers in Linguedoc for the Duke of Savoy Made a member of the Privy Council, he was sent to France as ambassador (1619), and tried negotiation between Louis XIII and his Protestant subjects in vain, was dismissed, and was sore embarrassed by debts and law-suits He was in 1624 made a peer of Ireland, and in 1629 of England with the title of Baron Herbert of Cherbury When the civil war broke out he at first sided very half-heartedly with the royalists, but in 1644 surrendered to the parliamentarians He died in London, 20th August 1648 His De Veritate (1624) is an antiempirical theory of knowledge of four principal faculties or groups of faculties One is the internal sense or conscience, another the external sense or perception, the third, reason, and the fourth, natural instinct, the source of divinely implanted primary truths, much resembles the common-sense of the Scottish philosophy Truth is distinguished from revelation, from the probable, from the possible, and from the false His De Religione Gentilium (not published till 1663), destined to be regarded as the 'charter of the deists,' and copied by Blount and others, proves that all religious recognise five main articles—that there is a supreme God, that He ought to be worshipped, that virtue and purity are the main part of that worship, that sins should be repented of, and that there are rewards and punishments in a future state The Expeditio Buckinghami Ducis (1656) is a vindication of the ill-fated Rochelle expedition The ill-proportioned Life and Raigne of King Henry VIII (1649), digested into annuls, glorifies Henry absurdly, and is on the whole prolix, though tales of sieges and ceremonials, such as the author's soul delighted in, are rendered with much graphic detail verbatim reports of speeches whose tenor he could only guess, Herbert allowed himself an ultra-Thucydidean freedom How little modern historical canons appealed to this sincere and honest man is evident from the fact that he puts into the mouth of one of Henry's bishops, at a council held half a century ere he himself was born, a succinct and orderly statement and defence of those identical 'five articles' which it was Herbert's own especial glory to have formulated! His Autobiography, a brilliant picture of the man and of contemporary manners, is a masterpiece in its kind, but is disfigured by overweening self-glory Oddly enough, it is on his exceptionally handsome person, his Quivotic exploits of bravery in the field, his valiant duels, and the admiration accordingly bestowed on him by fair ladies that he chiefly prides himself, there is little in the record about his philosophy or his theological views, though he really attached great importance to them He was the friend of Donne, Selden, Ben Jonson, Grotius, and Gassendi The Poems, Litin and English, reveal a representative of the 'metaphysical' school. Donne was his master, and the disciple is the more rugged and But some of the lyrics suggest Herrick, obscure and resemblances to Browning and Tennyson have been pointed out. He has, according to Mr Churton Collins, the credit of having been the first to recognise (though he did not invent the measure, see Vol III p 120) the possibilities of the stanza of In Memoriam, he brought out its harmony and 'passed it almost perfect into Tennyson's hands.' The enthusiasm as well as sincerity of his nature is exemplified in the following reference to his philosophy in the Autobiography, and suggests rather one who believes overmuch than the un believer—an inconsistency often pointed out by those who assailed his deism as an inadequate system of belief. Herbert's devout deism was of course very different from the profane and spiteful deism of Blount, who put much that was in Herbert to a use he never dreamt of

Being thus doubtful in my chamber one fine day in the summer, my casement being open towards the south, the sun shining clear, and no wind stirring, I took my book De Verstate in my hands, and kneeling on my knees, devoutly said these words 'O thou eternal God, author of this light which now shines upon me, and giver of all inward illuminations, I do beseech thee of thy infinite goodness to pardon a greater request than a sinner ought to make. I am not satisfied enough whether I shall publish this book De Veritate, if it be for thy glory, I beseech thee give me some sign from heaven, if not, I shall suppress it!' I had no sooner spoke these words, but a loud, though yet gentle noise came forth from the heavens (for it was like nothing on earth), which did so cheer and comfort me, that I took my petition as granted, and that I had the sign I demanded, whereupon also I resolved to print my book. This, how strange soever it may seem, I protest before the Eternal God is true, neither am I any way superstitiously deceived herein, since I did not only clearly hear the noise, but in the serenest sky I ever saw, being without all cloud, did, to my thinking, see the place from whence it came

In his Autobiography he tells of the close relations established between himself and the Constable of France, the Duke de Montmorency, and of his hunting in the ducal forests

That brave constable in France testifying now more than formerly his regard of me, at his departure from Merlou to his fair house at Chantilly, five or six miles distant, said, he left that castle to be commanded by me, as also his forests and chases, which were well stored with wild boar and stag, and that I might hunt them when I He told me also, that if I would learn to ride pleased the great horse, he had a stable there of some fifty, the best and choicest as was thought in France, and that his escuyer, called Monsieur de Disancour, nor inferior to Pluvenel or Labrove, should teach me. I did with great thankfulness accept his offer, as being very much addicted to the exercise of riding great horses, and as for hunting in his forests, I told him I should use it sparingly, as being desirous to preserve his game. He commanded also his escuyer to keep a table for me, and his pages to attend me, the chief of whom was Monsieur de Mennon, who, proving to be one of the best horsemen in France, keeps now an academy in Paris, and here I shall re count a little passage betwixt him and his master, that the inclination of the French at that time may appear, there being scarce any man thought worth the looking on, that had not killed some other in duel

Mennon desiring to marry a niece of Monsieur Disancour, who it was thought should be his heir, was thus answered by him 'Friend, it is not time yet to marry, I will tell you what you must do if you will be a brave man, you must first kill in single combat two or three men, then afterwards marry and engender two or three children, or the world will neither have got nor lost by you,' of which strange counsel, Disancour was no other wise the author than as he had been an example, at least of the former part, it being his fortune to have fought three or four brave duels in his time.

And now, as every morning I mounted the great horse, so in the afternoons I many times went a hunting, the manner of which was this The Duke of Montmorency having given orders to the tenants of the town of Merlou, and some villages adjoining, to attend me when I went a hunting, they, upon my summons, usually repaired to those woods where I intended to find my game, with drums and muskets, to the number of sixty or eighty, and sometimes one hundred or more persons, they entering the wood on that side with that noise, discharging their pieces and beating their said drums, we on the other side of the said wood having placed mastiffs and greyhounds, to the number of twenty or thirty, which Monsieur de Montmorency kept near his castle, expected those beasts they should force out of the wood if stags or wild boars came forth, we commonly spared them, pursuing only the wolves, which were there in great number, of which are found two sorts, the mastiff wolf, thick and short, though he could not indeed run fast, yet would fight with our dogs, the greyhound wolf, long and swift, who many times escaped our best dogs, though when he were overtaken, easily killed by us, without making much resistance. Of both these sorts I killed divers with my sword while I stayed there

One time also it was my fortune to kill a wild boar in this manner the boar being roused from his den, fled before our dogs for a good space, but finding them press him hard, turned his head against our dogs, and hurt three or four of them very dangerously. I came on horse back up to him, and with my sword thrust him twice or thrice without entering his skin, the blade being not so stiff as it should be the boar hereupon turned upon me, and much endangered my horse, which I perceiving, rid a little out of the way, and leaving my horse with my lackey, returned with my sword against the boar, who by this time had hurt more dogs, and here happened a pretty kind of fight, for when I thrust at the boar some times with my sword, which in some places I made enter, the boar would run at me, whose tusks yet by stepping a little out of the way I avoided, but he then turning upon me, the dogs came in, and drew him off, so that he fell upon them, which I perceiving, ran at the boar with my sword agrun, which made him turn upon me, but then the dogs pulled him from me aguin, while so relieving one another by turns, we killed the boar. At this chase Monsieur Disancour and Mennon were present, as also Mr Townsend, yet so as they did endeavour rather to withdraw me from, than assist me in the danger which boar, some part being well seasoned and larded, I presented to my uncle Sir Francis Newport, in Shrop shire, and found most excellent meat

Herbert was a great stickler on the point of honour

There happened during this siege [of Juliers by the allies against the Emperor in 1610] a particular quarrel betwixt me and the Lord of Walden, eldest son to the Earl of Suffolk, lord treasurer of England at that time, which I do but unwillingly relate, in regard of the great esteem I have of that noble family, howbeit, to avoid misreports, I have thought fit to set it down truly that lord having been invited to a feast in Sir Horace Vere's quarters, where (after the Low Country manner) there was liberal drinking, returned not long after to Sir

Edward Cecil's quarters, at which time, I speaking merrily to him, upon some slight occasion, he took that offence at me, which he would not have done at another time, insomuch that he came towards me in a violent manner, which I perceiving, did more than half way meet him, but the company were so vigilant upon us that before any blow past we were separated, howbeit, because he made towards me, I thought fit the next day to send him a challenge, telling him, that if he had any thing to say to me, I would meet him in such a place as no man should in terrupt us Shortly after this Sir Thomas Payton came to me on his part, and told me my lord would fight with me on horseback with single sword, and, said he, I will be his second, where is yours? I replied that neither his lordship nor myself brought over any great horses with us, that I knew he might much better borrow one than myself, howbeit, as soon as he shewed me the place, he should find me there on horse back or on foot. whereupon, both of us riding together upon two geldings to the side of a wood, Payton said he chose that place, and the 'time break of day the next morning I told him I would fail neither place nor time, though I knew not where to get a better horse than the nag I rid on, and as for a second, I shall trust to your nobleness, who, I know, will see fair play betwixt us, though you come on his side but he urging me again to provide a second, I told him I could promise for none but myself, and that if I spoke to any of my friends in the army to this purpose, I doubted least the business might be discovered and prevented

He was no sooner gone from me, but night drew on, myself resolving in the mean time to rest under a fair oak all night, after this, tying my horse by the bridle unto another tree, I had not now rested two hours, when I found some fires nearer to me than I thought was possible in so solitary a place, whereupon also having the curiosity to see the reason hereof, I got on horseback again, and had not rode very far, when by the talk of the soldiers there, I found I was in the Scotch quarter, where finding in a stable a very fair horse of service, I desired to know whether he might be bought for any reasonable sum of money, but a soldier replying it was their captain's, Sir James Areskin's chief horse, I demanded for Sir James, but the soldier answering he was not within the quarter, I demanded then for his lieutenant, whereupon the soldier courteously desired him to come to me, this lieutenant was called Montgomery, and had the reputation of a gallant man, I told him that I would very fain buy a horse, and if it were possible, the horse I saw but a little before, but he telling me none was to be sold there, I offered to leave in his hands one hundred pieces, if he would lend me a good horse for a day or two, he to restore me the money again when I delivered him the horse in good plight, and did besides bring him some present as a gratuity

The lieutenant, though he did not know me, suspected I had some private quarrel, and that I desired this horse to fight on, and there upon told me, Sir, whosoever you are, you seem to be a person of worth, and you shall have the best horse in the stable, and if you have a quarrel and want a second, I offer myself to serve you upon another horse, and if you will let me go along with you upon these terms, I will ask no pawn of you for the horse I told him I would use no second, and I desired him to accept one hundred pieces, which I had there about me, in pawn for the horse, and he should hear from me shortly again, and that though I did not take his noble offer of coming along with me, I should evermore rest much obliged to him, whereupon giving him my purse with the money in it, I got upon his horse, and left my nag besides with him

Riding thus away about twelve o'clock at night to the wood from whence I came, I alighted from my horse and rested there till morning, the day now breaking I got on horseback, and attended the Lord of Walden with his second. The first person that appeared was a foot man, who I heard afterwards was sent by the Lady of Walden, who as soon as he saw me, ran back again with all speed, I meant once to pursue him, but that I thought it better at last to keep my place. About two hours after Sir William St Leiger, now lord president of Munster, came to me, and told me he knew the cause of my being there, and that the business was discovered by the Lord Walden's using so early that morning, and the suspicion that he meant to fight with me, and had Sir Thomas Payton with him, and that he would ride to him, and that there were thirty or forty sent after us, to hinder us from meeting, shortly after many more came to the place where I was, and told me I must not fight, and that they were sent for the same purpose, and that it was to no purpose to stay there, and thence rode to seek the Lord of Walden, I stayed yet two hours longer, but finding still more company came in, rode back again to the Scotch quarters, and delivered the horse back again, and received my money and mag from Lieutenant Montgomery, and so withdrew myself to the French quarters, till I did find some convenient time to send again to the Lord Walden

Being among the French, I remembered myself of the bravado of Monsieur Balagny, and coming to him told him I knew how brave a man he was, and that as he had put me to one trial of daring, when I was last with him in his trenches, I would put him to another, saying, I heard he had a fair mistress, and that the scarf he wore was her gift, and that I would maintain I had a worther mistress than he, and that I would do as much for her sake as he, or any else, durst do for his Balagny here upon looking merrily upon me, said that for his part, he had no mind to fight on that quarrel I looking hereupon somewhat disdainfully on him, said he spoke more like a paillard than a cavalier, to which he answering nothing, I rode my ways, and afterwards went to Monsieur Terant, a French gentleman that belonged to the Duke of Montmorency, formerly men tioned, who telling me he had a quarrel with another gentleman, I offered to be his second, but he saying he was provided already, I rode thence to the English quarters, attending some fit occasion to send again to the Lord Walden I came no sooner thither, but I found Sir Thomas Somerset with eleven or twelve more in the head of the English, who were then draw ing forth in a body or squadron, who seeing me on horseback, with a footman only that attended me, gave me some affronting words, for my quarrelling with the Lord of Walden, whereupon I alighted, and giving my horse to my lackey, drew my sword, which he no sooner saw but he drew his, as also all the company with him, I running hereupon amongst them, put by some of their thrusts, and making towards him in particular, put by a thrust of his, and had certainly run him through, but that one Lieutenant Prichard, at that instant taking me by the shoulder, turned me aside, but I recovering myself again, ran at him a second time, which he perceiving, retired himself with the company to the tents which were near, though not so fast but I hurt one Proger, and some others also that were with him, but they being all at last got within the tents, I finding now nothing else to be done, got to my horse again, having received only a slight hurt on the outside of my ribs, and two thrusts, the one through the skirts of my doublet, and the other through my breeches, and about eighteen nicks upon my sword and hilt, and so rode to the trenches before Juliers, where our soldiers were.

Not long after this, the town being now surrendered, and every body preparing to go their ways, I sent again a gentleman to the Lord of Walden to offer him the meeting with my sword, but this was avoided not very handsomely by him (contrary to what Sir Henry Rich, now earl of Holland, persuaded him)

After having taken leave of his excellency Sir Edward Cecil, I thought fit to return on my way homewards as far as Dusseldorp I had been scarce two hours in my lodgings when one Lieutenant Hamilton brought a letter from Sir James Areskin (who was then in town like wise) unto me, the effect wherof was, that in regard his Lieutenant Montgomery had told him that I had the said James Areskin's consent for borrowing his horse, he did desire me to do one of two things, which was, either to disavow the said words, which he thought in his conscience I never spake, or, if I would justify them, then to appoint time and place to fight with him. Having considered a while what I was to do in this case, I told Lieutenant Hamilton that I thought myself bound in honour to accept the more noble part of his proposition, which was to fight with him, when yet perchance it might be easy enough for me to say that I had his horse upon other terms than was affirmed, whereupon also giving Lieutenant Hamilton the length of my sword, I told him that as soon as ever he had matched it, I would fight with him, wishing further to make liaste, since I desired to end the business as speedily as could be Lieutenant Hamilton hereupon returning back, met in a cross street (I know not by what miraculous adventure) Lieutenant Montgomery, conveying divers of the hurt and manned soldiers at the siege of St Juliers unto that town, to be lodged and dressed by the surgeons there, Hamilton hereupon calling to Montgomery, told him the effects of his captain's letter, together with my answer, which Montgomery no sooner heard, but he replied (as Hamilton told me afterwards), I see that noble gentleman chooseth rather to fight than to contradict me, but my telling a lie must not be an occasion why either my captain or he should hazard their lives. I will alight from my horse, and tell my captain presently how all that matter past, whereupon also he relating the business about borrowing the horse, in that manner I formerly set down, which as soon as Sir James Areskin heard, he sent Lieutenant Hamilton to me presently again, to tell me he was satisfied how the business past, and that he had nothing to say to me, but that he was my most humble servant, and was sorry he ever questioned me in that

Lord Herbert's most famous poem is 'an Ode upon a question moved whether love should continue for ever,' and begins thus

Having interr'd her Infant birth,

The wat'ry ground, that late did mourn,
Was strew'd with flow'rs, for the return
Of the wish'd Bridegroom of the Earth.

The well accorded Birds did sing
Their hymns unto the pleasant time
And in a sweet consorted chime
Did welcome in the cheerful Spring

To which, soft whistles of the Wind, And warbling murmurs of a Brool, And varied notes of leaves that shook An harmony of parts did bind.

While doubling joy unto each other All in so rare consent was shown, No happiness that came alone, Nor pleasure that was not another

George Herbert (1593-1633) was of noble birth, but It es in history as a pious country clergyman—'holy George Herbert,' who

His elder brother was the famous and unorthodox Lord Hernert of Chernury George pa ed from Westminster in 160) to Frinity College, Cambridge, in 1614 has elected a fellor, and 115 public ora or 1619-27. He was the intimute friend of Sir Henry Wotton and Dr Donne, and Lord Bacon is said to bare entermined such a high regard for his learning and judgment that he submitted his works to him sefore publication. The poet was also in frour worth £120 per annum, which Queen Elizabeth had formerly given to Sir Philip Sidney. With inis, says Izaak Walton, 'and his annuity, and the advantages of his college, and of no oratorship, he enjoyed his genteel humour for clothes and court-like company, and coldon looked to wards Cambridge unless the king vere there that then, he never failed.' The death of the Ling and of two powerful friends, the Duke of Richmond and the Marquis of Hamilton, destroyed Herbert's court hopes, and, induced the reto by A cholas Ferrar and Laud, ne took holy orders in 163c and vas made rector of Bemerton, in Willishire where he passed the remainder of his life. After describing his marriage on the third day after his first interview with the lady, Izaak relates, vitu characteristic simplicity and minuteness, a quaint episode in the ne. incumbent's preparation for 'The third day after he as made rector of Bemerton, and had changed his so ord and silk clothes into a canonical habit, he returned so habited with his friend Mr Woodnot to Bemerton, and immediately after he had seen and saluted his wife, he said to her You are no v a minister's vife, and must no v so far forget your fither's nouse as not to claim a precedence of any of your parishioners, for you are to kno that a priest's vafe can challenge no precedence or place but that which she purchases by her obliging humility, and I am sure places so purchased do best become And let me tell you, I am so good a herald no to assure you that this is truth." And she was so meck a vife as to assure him it was no veying ne is to her, and that he should see her observe it ath a cheerful willingness?

Herbert discharged his pastoral dut es with saintly real and purity, but his strength was not equal to his self-imposed tasks, and he died in I chruar, 1633. Lo e and devotion to the mother Church of England shines through all his poems His principal v ork is The Temple, or Sacred Poems and Private Ljaculations It was not printed till the year after his death, but was so - ell received that Walton says twenty thousand copies vere sold in a few years. Less audacious than his friend Donne, he yet permitted himself a land of imagery that attracts some and repels others. James Montgomer, and his Temple vis 'decotion turned into masquerade' Dr George Macdonald, on the other hand, holds that his use of homelest imagery for highest thought ranks him the highest kind of poets. His originality, his imaginative gift, his quaint humour, are undisputed. He is less sweet, less exquisite, has less of the ecstatic temper th King James, who gave him a sinecure office I than Crashaw, but is terser more English, nore genuine In his own way he was very fastidious his workmanship is elaborate, his rhythms are often intricate. He was a musician, and sang his own hymns to the lute or viol, one catches echoes of his music in the harmonious cadence of his verses. Crashaw and Vughan, Charles the Martyr and Baxter the Puritan, Cowper and Coleridge, were amongst the warmest admirers of the Temple—more, perhaps, for the pregnancy and devoutness of his spiritual thoughts than for the purely poetic worth of his verse. His poetry alone would not have secured him so many loving readers had it not been for his single minded and lovable character, enshrined in the pages of good old Walton,

Vertue

Sweet day! so cool, so calm, so bright—
The bridall of the earth and skie,
The dews shall weep thy fall to night,
For thou must die.

Sweet rose, whose hue, angrie and brave, Bids the rish gazer wipe his eye, Thy root is ever in its grave, And thou must die

Sweet spring, full of sweet days and roses, A box where sweets compacted lie, Thy music shews ye have your closes, And all must die

Onely a sweet and vertuous soul,
Like seasoned timber, never gives,
But though the whole world turn to coal,
Then chiefly lives

The Pulley

When God at first made man,
Having a glasse of blessings standing by,
'Let us,' said He, 'poure on him all we can,
Let the world's riches, which dispersed he,
Contract into a span'

So strength first made a way,
Then beautic flowed, then wisdome, honour, pleasure,
When almost all was out, God made a stay,
Perceiving that, alone of all His treasure,
Rest in the bottome lay

'For if I should,' said He,
'Bestow this jewell also on my creature,
He would adore my gifts instead of me,
And rest in Nature, not the God of Nature
So both should losers be

'Yet let him keep the rest,
But keep them, with repining restlessness,
Let him be rich and wearie that at least,
If goodnesse lead him not, yet wearinesse
May tosse him to my breast'

Matins

I cannot ope mine eyes
But Thou art ready there to catch
My mourning soul and sacrifice,
Then we must needs for that day make a match.

My God, what is a heart? Silver, or gold, or precious stone, Or starre, or rainbow, or a part Of all these things, or all of them in one?

My God, what is a heart, That Thou shouldst it so eye and wooe, Pouring upon it all Thy art, As if that Thou hadst nothing els to do?

Indeed, man's whole estate
Amounts, and richly, to serve Thee,
He did not heaven and earth create,
Yet studies them, not Him by whom they be

Teach me Thy love to know,
That this new light which now I see
May both the work and workman shew,
Then by a sunne beam I will climb to Thec.

Thy torch doth shew the way

The other dayes and thou
Make up one man, whose face thou art,
Knocking at heaven with thy brow
The worky daies are the back part,
The burden of the week lies there,
Making the whole to stoop and bow,
Till thy release appeare.

The Collar

I struck the board, and cry'd, 'No more; I will abroad'

What, shall I ever sigh and pine? My lines and life are free, free as the road, Loose as the winde, as large as store Shall I be still in suit?

Have I no harvest but a thorn To let me bloud, and not restore What I have lost with cordiall fruit?

Sure there was winc

Before my sighs did drie it, there was corn Before my tears did drown it, Is the yeare onely lost to me? Have I no bayes to crown it, No flowers, no garlands gay? all blasted, All wasted?

Not so, my heart, but there is fruit, And thou hast hands

Recover all thy sigh-blown age On double pleasures, leave thy cold dispute Of what is fit and not, forsake thy cage, Thy rope of sands

Which pettie thoughts have made, and made to thee Good cable, to enforce and draw,

And be thy law.

While thou didst wink and wouldst not see

Away 1 take heed, I will abroad

Call in thy death's head there, tie up thy fears,

He that forbears

To suit and serve his need

Deserves his load

But as I rav'd and grew more herce and wilde

At every word,

Methought I heard one calling, 'Childe,' And I reply'd, 'My Lord'

Herbert was decidedly High Church in sympathies, attached importance to the things Puritains made light of, and though he does not insist on asceticism for all, gives in the Parson quite painful prescriptions as to the extent to which fasting should be carried at the specified days and seasons His native sagacity and insight are well shown in the chapter of the Country Parson suggestively called 'The Parson's Lye,' in which it will be noted that he assumes Gerson, chancellor of the University of Paris, to be the author of the Inntatio Christi

The countrey parson, at spare times from action, stand ing on a hill and considering his flock, discovers two sorts of vices, and two sorts of vicious persons are some vices whose natures are alwayes clear and evident, as adultery, murder, hatred, lying, &c. There are other vices, whose natures, at least in the beginning are dark and obscure, as covetousnesse and gluttony So likewise there are some persons who abstrin not even from known sins there are others, who when they know a sin evidently, they commit it not. It is true, indeed, they are long a knowing it, being partiall to themselves, and witty to others who shall reprove them from it man may be both covetous and intemperate, and yet hear sermons against both, and himselfe condemn both in good earnest And the reason hereof is, because the natures of these vices being not evidently discussed or known com monly, the beginnings of them are not easily observabled, and the beginnings of them are not observed, because of the suddain passing from that which was just now lawfull, to that which is presently unlawfull, even in one con So, a man dining eats at first lawfully tinued action but proceeding on, comes to do unlawfully, even before he is aware, not knowing the bounds of the action, nor when his eating begins to be unlawfull. So a man storing up mony for his necessary provisions, both in present for his family and in future for his children, hardly perceives when his storing becomes unlawfull vet is there a period for his storing, and a point or center when his storing, which was even now good, passeth from good to bad -Wherefore the parson, being true to his businesse, hath exactly sifted the definitions of all vertues and vices, especially canvassing those whose natures are most stealing, and beginnings uncertain Particularly, concerning these two vices not because they are all that are of this dark and creeping disposition, but for example sake, and because they are most common, he thus thinks -

First, for covetousnes he lays this ground soever, when a just occasion cals, either spends not at all, or not in some proportion to God's blessing upon him, is covetous The reason of the ground is manifest, because wealth is given to that end, to supply our occa Now, if I do not give every thing its end, I abuse the creature, I am false to my reason, which should guide me, I offend the supreme Judg, in perverting that order which He hath set both to things and to reason The application of the ground would be infinite. But in brief, a poor man is an occasion, my countrey is an occasion, my friend is an occasion, my table is an occasion, my apparell is an occasion. If in all these and those more which concerne me, I either do nothing, or pinch, and scrape, and squeeze blood, indecently to the station wherein God hath placed me, I am covetous. particularly, and to give one instance for all, If God have given me servants, and I either provide too little for them or that which is unwholsome, being sometimes baned [diseased] meat, sometimes too salt, and so not com petent nourishment, I am covetous I bring this example because men usually think that servants for their mony are as other things that they buy, even as a piece of wood which they may cut, or hack, or throw into the fire, and, so they pay them their wages, all is well -Nay to descend yet more particularly, if a man hath wherewithall to buy a spade, and yet hee chuseth rather to use his neighbour's and wear out that, he is covetous Nevertheless, few bring covetousness thus low, or consider it so narrowly, which yet ought to be done, since there is a justice in the least things, and for the least there shall be a judgment Countrey people are full of these petty injustices, being cunning to make use of another, and spare themselves And scholers ought to be diligent in the observation of these, and driving of their generall school rules even to the smallest actions of life which while they dwell in their bookes, they will never finde, but being seated in the countrey, and doing their duty faithfully, they will soon discover, especially if they carry their cycs ever open, and fix them on their charge, and not on their preferment

Secondly, for gluttony, the parson lays this ground He that either for quantity eats more than his health or imployments will bear, or for quality is licorous after dainties, is a glutton, -as he that eats more then his estate will bear, is a prodigall, and hee that eats offensively to the company, either in his order or length of cating, is scandalous and uncharitable rules generally comprehend the faults of eating, and the truth of them needs no proof So that men must eat, neither to the disturbance of their health, nor of their affairs, (which, being over burdened or studying dainties too much, they cannot wel dispatch,) nor of their estate, nor of their brethren One act in these things is bad, but it is the custom and habit that names a glutton think they are at more liberty then they are, as if they were masters of their health, and so they will stand to the pain, all is well. But to eat to one's hurt com prehends, besides the hurt, an act against reason, because it is unnaturall to hurt oneself, and this they are not masters of Yet of hurtfull things I am more bound to abstain from those which by my own experience I have found hurtfull, then from those which by a common tradition and vulgar knowledge are reputed to be so -That which is said of hurtfull meats, extends to hurtfull As for the quantity, touching our imploy ments, none must eat so as to disable themselves from a fit discharging either of divine duties, or duties of their So that if after dinner they are not fit (or unweeldy) either to pray or work, they are gluttons. Not that all must presently work after dinner For they rather must not work, especially students, and those that are weakly But that they must rise so as that it is not meate or drink that hinders them from working guide them in this there are three rules First, the custome and knowledge of their own body, and what it can well digest. The second, the feeling of themselves in time of eating, which because it is deceitfull (for one thinks in eating that he can eat more then afterwards The third is the observation with what he finds true) appetite they sit down This last rule joyned with the first never fails For knowing what one usually can digest, and feeling when I go to meat in what disposi tion I am, either hungry or not, according as I feele myself, either I take my wonted proportion or diminish of it Yet phisicians bid those that would live in health, not keep an uniform diet, but to feed variously, now more, now lesse And Gerson, a spirituall man, wisheth all to incline rather to too much, then to too little, his reason is, because diseases of exinanition are more dangerous then diseases of repletion. But the parson distinguisheth according to his double aime, either of abstinence a morall vertue, or mortification a divine When he deals with any that is heavy and carnall, he gives him those freer rules. But when he meets with a refined and heavenly disposition, he carryes them higher, even somtimes to a forgetting of themselves, knowing there is One Who, when they forget, remembers for As when the people hungered and thirsted after our Saviour's doctrine, and tarryed so long at it that they would have fainted had they returned empty, He suffered it not, but rather made food miraculously then suffered so good desires to miscarry facula Prudentum is a collection of about a thousand short sayings and proverbs from various quarters, many of them, as Herbert says, 'outlandish,' but some of them no doubt his own Thus there are some from Burton (see page 440)

See Herbert's Works in Prose and Verse, with the Life by Izaak Walton and notes by Coleridge (1846), other editions by Nichol (1863), Grosart (1876), and Shorthouse (1882) and an excellent anonymous Life (S P C K, 1893)

George Wither (1588-1667) was a voluminous author, in the midst of disasters that would have damped the spirit of any but an enthusiast of his happiest strains were composed in prison, spite of stone walls and iron bars, his fancy was among the hills and plains, with shepherds hunting, or loitering with Poesy by rustling boughs and There is a delightful freshmurmuring springs ness and natural vivacity in Wither's carly poetry, though he became harsh, obscure, and affected when the brightness of youth passed from him At his best he had great diversity of style and subject, and a gift of true poetical feeling and Wither, born on the 11th of June 1588, at Bentworth, near Alton, in Hampshire, studied at Magdalen College, Oxford, and was entered at Lincoln's Inn For his satire Abuses Stript and Whipt (1613) he was thrown into the Marshalsea, where he composed several of his best pocms, and in particular his pastoral, The Shepheards Hunting In the civil war Wither took the popular side, and sold his paternal estate to raise a troop of horse for the Parliament rose to the rank of major, and in 1642 was made governor of Farnham Castle During the struggles of that period the poet was made prisoner by the royalists and stood in danger of capital punishment, when Denham interfered for his brother-bard, alleging that as long as Wither lived he (Denham) would not be considered the worst poet in England The joke was a good one if it saved Wither's life He was afterwards Cromwell's major-general in Surrey, and Master of the Statute Office From the sequestrated estates of the royalists Wither obtained a considerable fortunc, but the Restoration came, and he was stripped of all his possessions He remonstrated loudly and angrily, his remonstrances were voted libels, and for a satire on the Parliament of 1661 the unlucky poet was again thrown into prison. He was released, under bond for good behaviour, in 1663, and died in London on the 2nd of May 1667

Wither's fame is derived chiefly from his early poems, written before he had come under Puritan influences or been embroiled in the war. The Shepheard's Hunting (in which Willy is his friend the poet William Browne, and Philarete is himself) was issued in 1615, as was also Fulcha. His Motto, a confession in two thousand lines of verse, appeared in 1621, his Juzenilia, a reprint of all his best work, in 1622. Faire Virtue or the Mistresse of Philarete (1622) displays Wither's genius in its transitional state Certain portions of this collection of lyrics have extraordin try beauty, such as the opening lines descriptive of the poet's home in Hampshire, but the beauties are interspersed, with long passages of the dullest and commonest kind, showing how rapidly Wither was losing his charm Much of Wither's religious poetry is sweet, tender, and devout (though as he advanced in life much of it, like his version of the Lord's Prayer and the Creed, became little better than doggerel) The Hymns and Songs of the Church (1623) were set to music by Orlando Gibbons The Psalms of David translated appeared in 1632, the Limblems Ancient and Modern in 1635 Among the two hundred and thirty hymns in Hallelujali, another collection-designed for persons and purposes as various as members of Parliament, fullers, poets, tailors, for sheep-shearings, for house-warmings-there are two or three still found in modern hymn-books, such as 'Behold the Sun that seemed but now,' 'The Lorg is King and heareth' Wither's satirical and controversial works were numerous but without merit

Long before his death his poetry had fallen into oblivion Pope in the Dunctad stigmatised him as 'wretched Withers'-'Withers' is a rccognised spelling of the family name-and spoke of him as sleeping among the dull of ancient days, safe where no critics damn Bishop Percy was kindler, holding him 'not altogether devoid of genius' But George Ellis, in his Specimens of Early English Poets (1790), was the first to call to mind 'that playful fancy, pure taste, and artless delicacy of sentiment, which distinguish the poetry of his early youth' Sir Egerton Brydges, Southcy, Hallam, and especially Charles Lamb (in the Essay of 1818) restored him to his place in the Temple of Fame Wither's poem on Christmas affords a lively picture of the manners of the times Address to Poetry, the one cheering companion of his prison solitude, recounts the various charms and the 'divine skill' of his Muse, that had derived nourishment and delight from the 'meanest objects' of external nature—a daisy, a bush, or a tree, and, when these picturesque and beloved scenes of the country were denied him, could gladden even the vaults and shades of a prison

From 'The Shepheards' Hunting'

Philarete Cheere thee, honest Willy, then, And begin thy song agen Willy Faine I would, but I doe feare When againe my lines they heare, If they yield they are my rimes, They will faine some other crimes, And 'tis no safe ventring by Where we see Detraction ly For doe what I can, I doubt, She will picke some quarrell out, And I oft have heard defended, Little said, is soone amended Phil See'st thou not in clearest dayes, Oft thicke fogs cloud heav is rayes,

And that vapours which doe breath From the earths grosse wombe beneath, Seeme not to us with black steames, To pollute the sunnes bright beames, And yet vanish into ayre, Leaving it unblemisht faire? So (my Willy) shall it bee With Detractions breath on thee. It shall never rise so hie, As to strine thy poesie As that sunne doth oft exhale Vapours from each rotten vale, Poesie so sometime drunes Grosse concerts from muddy braines, Mists of envy, fogs of spight, I wixt mens judgements and her light But so much her power may do, That shee can dissolve them to If thy verse doe bravely tower, As shee makes wing, she gets power Yet the higher she doth sore, Shee's affronted still the more Lill shee to the high'st hath past, Then she rests with fame at last, Let nought therefore thee affright But make forward in thy flight For if I could match thy rime, To the very starres I'de clime There begin again and flye Till I reach'd Æternity But (alasse) my Muse is slow For thy place shee flags too low Yea, the more's her haplesse fate, Her short wings were clipt of late. And poore I, her fortune ruing, Am my selfe put up a muing But if I my cage can rid, I'le flye where I never did And though for her sake I'me crost, Though my best hopes I have lost, And knew she would make my trouble Ten times more then ten times double I should love and keepe her to, Spight of all the world could doe. For though banish't from my flockes, And confin'd within these rockes, Here I waste away the light, And consume the sullen night, She doth for my comfort stay, And I eepes many cares away Though I misse the flowry helds, With those sweets the spring tyde yeelds, Though I may not see those groves Where the shepheards chant their loves, (And the lasses more excell, Then the sweet voye'd Philomel,) Though of all those pleasures past Nothing now remaines at last But Remembrance (poore reliefe) That more makes then mends my griefe Shee's my mindes companion still, Maugre envies evill will (Whence she should be driven to, Wer't in mortals power to do , She doth tell me where to borrow Comfort in the midst of sorrow,

Makes the desolatest place To her presence be a grace, And the blackest discontents To be pleasing ornaments In my former dayes of blisse, Her divine skill trught me this, That from every thing I saw, I could some invention draw And raise pleasure to her height, Through the meanest objects sight. By the murmure of a spring, Or the least boughes rustching, By a dazic whose leaves spied, Shut when Tytan goes to bed, Or a shady bush or tree, She could more infuse in mee Then all Natures beautics can In some other wiser man By her helpe I also now Make this churlish place allow Some things that may sweeten gladnes, In the very gall of sadnes The dull loannesse, the blacke shade, That these hanging vaults have made, The strange musicke of the waves, Beating on these hollow cives, This blacke den which rocks embosse Over growne with eldest mosse, The rude portals that give light, More to Terror then Delight, This my chamber of Neglect, Wall'd about with Disrespect,-From all these and this dull ayre, A fit object for Despaire, She hath trught me by her might To draw comfort and delight. Therefore thou best earthly blisse, I will cherish thee for this, Poesie, thou sweet'st content That e're heav'n to mortals lent Though they as a trifle leave thee Whose dull thoughts cannot concerve thee, Though thou be to them a scorne, That to nought but earth are borne Let my life no longer be Then I am in love with thee. Though our wise ones call thee madnesse Let me never taste of gladnesse If I love not thy madd'st fits, More then all their greatest wits. And though some too seeming holy Doe account thy raptures folly, Thou dost teach me to contemne What make Knaves and Fooles of them

The Steadfast Shepherd.

Hence away, you Syrens, leave me,
And unclaspe your wanton armes,
Sugred words shall ne're deceive me,
(Though thou prove a thousand charmes.)
Fie, fie, forbeare,
No common snare
Could ever my affection chaine
Your painted baits,
And poore deceits,
Are all bestowed on me in youne.

Than

I'me no slave to such as you be, Neither shall a snowy brest, Wanton eye, or lip of ruby, Ever robb me of my rest Goe, goe, display

Your beauties ray

To some ore soone enamour'd swaine.

Those common wiles
Of sighs and smiles

Are all bestowed on me in vaine

I have elsewhere vowed a dutie, Turne away thy tempting eyes. Shew not me a naked beautic, Those impostures I despise.

My spirit lothes,

Where gawdy clothes
And funed othes may love obtaine

I love her so

Whose looke sweares No, That all your labours will be vaine.

Can he prize the tainted posies Which on every brest are worne, That may plucke the spotlesse roses From their never touched thorne?

I can goe rest
On her sweet brest
That is the pride of Cynthia's traine.
Then hold your tongues,

Your mermaid songs
Are all bestow'd on me in vaine

Hee's a foole that basely dallies Where each peasant mates with him Shall I haunt the thronged vallies, Whilst ther's noble hils to climbe?

No, no, though clownes
Are skar'd with frownes,
I know the best can but disdaine
And those He prove,
So shall your love

Be all bestowed on me in vaine

Yet I would not dagne embraces With the greatest fairest shee, If another shar'd those graces, Which had beene bestowed on me

I gave that one,
My love, where none
Shall come to robb me of my game.
Your fickle hearts

Makes teares, and arts, And all, bestowed on me in vaine

I doe scorne to vow a dutie Where each lustfull lad may wooe Give me her whose sun like beautie Buzzards dare not soare unto

Shee, shee it is Affoords that blisse,
For which I would refuse no paine.
But such as you,
I ond fooles, adue,

You sceke to captive me in vaine. Provid she seem'd in the beginning, And disdaind my looking on But that coy one in the winning, Proves a true one being wonne.

What ere betide,
Shee 'I nere divide
The favour shee to me shall daigne
But your fond love
Will fielde prove
And all that trust in you are vaine

Therefore know, when I enjoy one, (And for love employ my breath), Shee I court shall be a cov one.

Shee I court shall be a coy one, I hough I winne her with my death

A favour there I ew ayme at dare

And if perhaps some lover plaine, Shee is not wonne,

Nor I undone,

By placing of my love in vaine.

Leave me then, you Syrens, leave me, Seeke no more to worke my harmes Crastic wiles cannot deceive me Who am proofe against you'r charmes

You labour may
To lead astray

The heart that constant shall remaine

And I the while Will sit and smile,

To see you spend your time in vaine
(From The Mistresse of Philarete)

Christmas

So now is come our joyfulst feast, Let every man be jolly Each roome with yvie leaves is drest, And every post with holly

Though some churles at our mirth repine, Round your forheads gurlands twine, Drowne sorrow in a cup of wine

And let us all be merry

Now all our neighbours chimneys smoke, And Christmas blocks are burning, Their ovens they with bak't meats choke, And all their spits are turning

> Without the doore let sorrow he And if for cold it hap to die, Weele bury't in a Christmas pye,

And evermore be merry

Now every lad is wondrous trimin, And no man minds his labour Our lasses have provided them A bag-pipe and a tabor

Young men and mayds, and girles and boyes, Give life to one anothers joyes And you mon shall by their noyse

Perceive that they are merry

Ranke misers now doe sparing shun Their half of musicke soundeth And dogs thence with whole shoulders run, So all things there aboundeth

The countrey folke themselves advance,
For crowdy mutton's come out of Lrance
And Jack shall pipe, and Jyll shall dannee,
And all the towne be merry

Ned Swish hath fetcht his bands from piwne, And all his best appirell Brish Nell hath bought a ruff, of lange

Brisk Nell hath bought a ruffe of lawne, With droppings of the barrell. And those that hardly all the yeare Ifad bread to eat or raggs to weare,
Will have both clothes and daintie fare
And all the day be merry

Now poore men to the justices
With capons make their arrants, errands
And if they hap to faile of these,
They plague them with their warrants
But now they feed them with good cheere,
And what they want, they take in beere
For Christmas comes but once a yeare,
And then they shall be merry

Good farmours in the countrey nurse The poore, that else were undone Some land lords spend their money worse On lust and pride at London

> There the roysters they doe play, Drabb and dice their lands away, Which may be ours another day

And therefore lets be merry

The clyent now his suit forbeares, I he prisoners heart is eased, The debtor drinks away his cares, And for the time is pleased

Though others purses be more fat,
Why should we pine or grieve at that?
Hang sorrow, care will kill a cat,
And therefore lets be merry

Harke how the wagges abrode doe call Each other foorth to rambling Anon youle see them in the hall, For nutts and apples scambling

Harke how the roofes with laughters sound! Annon they'l thinke the house goes round For they the sellars depth have found.

And there they will be merry

The wenches with their wassell bowles, About the streets are singing The boyes are come to catch the owles, The wild mare in is bringing

Our kitchin boy hath broke his boxe, And to the dealing of the oxe, Our honest neighbours come by flocks, And here they will be merry

Now kings and queenes poore sheep cotes have, And mate with every body The honest now may play the knave, And wise men play at noddy

> Some youths will now a mumming goe Some others play at Rowland hoe, And twenty other gameboyes moe

Because they will be merry

Then wherefore in these merry daies, Should we, I pray, be duller? No, let us sing some roundelayes, To make our mirth the fuller

And whilest thus inspir'd we sing, Let all the streets with ecchoes ring Woods and hills and every thing,

Beare witnesse we are merry

(From the Miscellany appended to The Mistresse of Philarete)

In Hampshire crowdy is a kind of pie, the wild mare, a see saw in Shakespeare is here the Yule log, gamebojes is gambols

A Sonnet upon a Stolne Kisse

Now gentle sleepe hath closed up those eyes,
Which waking kept my boldest thoughts in age
And free accesse unto that sweet lip hes,
From whence I long the rosie breath to draw
Me thinkes no wrong it were, if I should steale
From those two melting rubies one poore kisse
None sees the theft, that would the thiefe reveale,
Nor rob I her of ought which she can misse
Nay, should I twenty kisses take away,
There would be little signe I had done so
Why then should I this robbery delay?
Oh! she may wake, and therewith angry grow
Well, if she do, He back restore that one,
And twenty hundred thousand more for lone
(From the Miscellany appended to The Mistresse of Philarete)

The Author's Resolution in a Sonnet

Shall I, wasting in despute
Dye because a woman's fair?
Or make pale my cheeks with care,
Cause anothers Rosie are?
Be she fairer than the Day
Or the flowry Meads in May,
If she thinke not well of me,
What care I how faire she be?

Shall my seely heart be pin'd
Cause I see a woman kind?
Or a well disposed Nature
Joyned with a lovely feature?
Be she meeker, kinder than Turtle dove or Pellican
If she be not so to me,
What care I how kind she be?

Shall a woman's Vertues move
Me to perish for her Love?
Or her wel deservings knowne
Make me quite forget mine own?
Be she with that Goodness blest
Which may merit name of best
If she be not such to me,
What care I how good she be?

Cause her Fortune seems too high
Shall I play the fool and die?
She that beares a Noble mind,
If not outward helpes she find,
Thinks what with them he wold do,
That without them dares her wooe
And unlesse that Minde I see What care I how great she be?

Great, or good, or kind, or faire
I will ne're the more despaire
If she love me (this beleeve)
I will die ere she shall grieve
If she slight me when I wooe,
I can scorne and let her goe,
For if she be not for me
What care I for whom she be?

(From Fidelia)

The principal editions of Wither's works are the Spenser Society's reprints (1871-83) and that edited by Mr Frank Sidgwick (2 vols. 1903). Mr Arber issued Philarete and Fidelia in his 'English Garner, and Henry Morley published a selection in 1891

Francis Rous (1579–1659), who divides with King David the honour of being the sweet psalmist of the Scottish people, was a Cornishman, born at his father's house of Halton, near Saltash Oxford he was already known as a sonneteer, and before he was twenty he had published Thule or Virtues History, a poem in imitation of Spenser He graduated at Leyden too, and entered the Temple, but, settling in the country, produced between 1616 and 1627 a series of theological and devotional works- Veditations of Instruction, The Arte of Happines, The Oyl of Scorpions, &c He was sent up to the House of Commons by Truro in 1625, was conspicuous in Parliament, and in 1643 was made provost of Eton College. He withdrew from the Presbyterian party, became a strong Independent, was a member of Cromwell's Council of State, and a month or two before his death was by Cromwell created a Lord of Parlia-He was a strenuous opponent both of popery and of Arminianism, and continued to write theological and political pamphlets and treatiseson the Mystical Marriage of the Soul to the Saviour, the Heavenlie Academie, &c , and a number of his most important speeches have been preserved His translation of the Psalms (1643) was not sanctioned by the English Parliament, but after being revised by himself (1646) and altered in a good many places by a Scottish committee, was adopted both by the General Assembly and the Scottish Parliament Like the Westminster Assembly's Shorter Catechism, also an English production, the metrical translation of the Psalms became not merely part of the most cherished spiritual inheritance of the Scottish nation, but an important element in its intellectual education for more than two centuries It served even as a kind of model for verse-writing to those who had access to few more poetical standards, and was only gradually extruded from its supremacy as the vehicle of praise in the public worship of the chief Presbyterian communions after the middle of the nineteenth century. It is mostly in 'common' ballad metre, with some 'long' metre psalms and a few 'peculiar' metres, is literal to (often over) the verge of unintelligibility, utterly lacking the dignity of the original, and as verse is harsh, uncouth, and generally hardly befter than But it is terse, simple, sincere, has won favourable comment from critics with no predilection for things Presbyterian or Scottish, was regarded as an adequate rendering of the psalter by a nation far from illiterate, and was interwoven with the most sacred associations of many generations of earnest Christian people

Rous's version of the Psalms was printed in 1643, revised in 1646, and approved by the Long Parliament, but never came into use in England. The first metrical version used in Scotland from the Reformation till 1650 was the English 'Old Version' by Sternhold, Hopkins, and others There was a version by King James and the Earl of Stirling (printed 1631), one by Mure of Rowallan (circulated in MS), and one by Zachary Boyd (1646), but none of these was ever adopted for public worship The General Assembly of the Kirk of Scotland, having Rous's version sent to them by the English Parliament, appointed a committee (including Zachary Boyd) to revise Rous's version for use in Scotland, taking advantage of Mure's and Boyd's versions, and in 1650 sanctioned the result of the committee's labours, still the standard version in Scotland We give the last three verses of the Twenty-third Psalm in Rous's two versions, and that finally adopted by the Kirk of Scotland in 1650 Boyd's is given at page 515. A comparison will show how completely the so called 'Scottish' version may still be regarded as the handswork of the old English Roundhead

Rous's Original Version, 1643

And though I were even at death's doore, yet would I feare none ill, Thy rod, thy staffe do comfort me, and thou art with me still

Thou hast my table richly spread in presence of my foe, My head with oile thou dost anoint, my cup doth overflow

Thy grace and mercy all my daies shall surely follow me,
And ever in the house of God my dwelling place shall be

Rous's own Revised Version, 1646

Yea though I walk in death's dark vale
I'le fear no evil thing,
Thou art with me, thy rod, thy staffa to me do comfort bring

Before me thou a table fitt'st in presence of my foes My head thou dost with oile anoint, my cup it overflowes

Goodnesse and mercy all my life shall surely follow me, And in God's house for evermore my dwelling place shall be

Rous revised by the Scottish Committee, 1650

Yen, though I walk in death's dark vale, yet will I fear none ill

For thou art with me, and thy rod and staff me comfort still

My table thou hast furnished in presence of my foes, My head thou dost with oil anoint, and my cup overflows

Goodness and mercy all my life shall surely follow me And in God's house for evermore my dwelling place shall be.

James VI. to the Civil War.

HEN the various racial and tribal elements in North Britain had been hammered into one monarchy, it was the Anglic stock of the Lowlands and not the Scotic of the West Highlands that obtained the upper hand

under the Celtic line of kings, and it was their language-the Anglian, Northumbrian, or Northern English-spoken in the same form from the Forth to the Humber, that became the national language, and assisted in the process, not yet quite completed, of welding the several peoples of the north (Celtic, Anglic, Norse, and other) into one nation The Highlander is yet very unlike the Lowlander in many points of temperament and character, but the national type is the essentially Anglo-Savon, utterly un-Celtic Lowlander, hyper-English in his caution, 'dourness,' and undemonstrativeness In Bede's mouth Scotta-land meant the land of the Irish settlers in Argyll, of the Scoti, but byand-by the Southrons naturally came to regard as Scots all the subjects of the sovereign officially styled King of Scots, and called his whole country Scotland Inevitable, too, it was that the Lowlanders, though Anglic to the bone, should, in contradistinction to the Southern English with whom they were so often at war, at length speak of themselves as Scots But apparently they carefully avoided speaking of their language as Scottish Till the sixteenth century the Scottish tongue in Lowland usage meant the Scotic Erse or Irish Gaelic of Argyll It was not till a time of special embitterment in the long wars between the northern and southern kingdoms, when north of Tweed resentment against the Southrons had reached its highest pitch, that, as we have seen, a Lowlander was moved to speak of the Lowland vernacular as Scottis (see page 164) And long before this the influence of Southern English on this Lowland tongue was quite marked

The charm and power of the poetry of Chaucer contributed very largely to make the English of the southern Midlands the literary language for the whole of the great southern kingdom, reducing alike the tongue of the northerners in Northumbria and of the southerners in Sussex and Hampshire to the rank of provincial dialects Chaucer's power is seen in the fact that his combination of the native Midland English with the Norman-Trench, which for three hundred years had been the literary language of England, was henceforth, though to a very great extent French in vocabulary, to be regarded as the 'well of English undefiled' In Scotland French never was the literary tongue, and though some Scots writers at times affected a pedantic Gallicism, the vernacular of the Lowlands never admitted anything like the same proportion of French words as did literary English, the words for which, in reading Lowland Scots, an Englishman requires a glossary are in the vast majority of cases words of pure English stock, fallen in England into desuetude But on the vernacular benorth the Tweed Chaucer's influence was also powerful, and southern forms became more and more frequent in Scots prose and verse. The Reformation (see page 166) gave a prodigious impulse to the Anglicising process, and the period from the first Reformation to what in Scotland is called the Second Reformation may be regarded as the last age during which the northern vernacular, the Lowland Scots, was the national tongue of the country beyond the Tweed Of Scottish national literature in the national tongue it might at the accession of James to the crown of England have been said—as a century later at the union of the kingdoms was said by the Scottish chancellor of the Scottish parliament and polity-' Now there's ane end of ane old song' For from the union of the crowns it became the ambition of educated Scotsmen to write, and to be able to speak, the literary English of the court and of the south And when in the beginning of the eighteenth century there was a revival of Lowland Scots it was not as a national tongue but as a provincial vernacular, admitted to literary use only for certain specific purposes For the general purposes of literature English remained the vehicle, nobody now wrote books in Scotch Even Burns wrote many poems in English, and his letters are invariably in English, and rather florid English' (save on the two or three occasions when he wrote a facetious and extravagant jargon) Scott made admirable use of an eclectic and partially Anglicised Lowland Scots for dialogue in his novels and in some of his songs, but even in writing the history of Scotland for a Scottish boy, he would have regarded as absurd any attempt to indite the work in the Lowland vernacular he knew and loved so well in James's reign, then during the commotions begun under his successor the Lowland Scots ceases to be the normal literary instrument of The vernacular was reserved for increasingly restricted purposes and for secondary literary uses, in conversation even the educated went on speaking at home a mixed dialect quite is much Scottish as Lighsh. But the language of the pulpit and the bar, as well as of books, approximated very closely to English, with northern vords and frequent Scotticisms it might be, the transitional compounds of Scottish-Linglish or Finalish Scottish are many, curious, and a mously B, the middle of the seventeenth proportioned century many Scotsmen wrote passible Linglish, though when they essayed to speak it their tongue bearryed them—the Scottish accent' remained indefensible, even to this day a perfectly Lughsh tongue in a Scott sh mouth is sufficiently But with the educated it is a matter of in ton it on and utter use, hardly at all of vocabulary or dialect

The outstanding fact in the history of Scottish literative (see piges 107, 168 is that, from the later part of the sixteenth century and throughout the next, notable names are-in contrast with carlier profusion-sadly ten in number. Against scores of fimous English writers, including Spenser and Shakespeare, Sidney and Raleigh, Hooker and Brean, it is difficult to choose a dozen Scotsmen as worth naming it all, even if one includes Montgomery and Ayton, the Luds of Stirling and Ancrum. Who but specialists read even Drummond now? Sapier was a genius, but he does not belong to hierature, Rutherford and Leighton are prized for their spiritual and devotional power. We set to the national credit all the Scottish authors who-like Drummond and most of the others in verse, life the amazing Sir Thomas Urguhart, the 'Bluidy Mackenzie,' and Eletcher of Saltoun in prose-wrote no longer Scotch, but is good English is they could comprise But even so, Scotland has little or nothing to set alongside the works of Hobbes, Milton, Jeremy Li lor, Bunyan, Dryden, nothing at ill to give promise of a coming renascence—of Hume and Ad un Smith, of Dug ild Stewart, Smollett, Boswell, Henry Mackenaic, Burns, in the eighteenth century, or of Scott and Jeffrey, of Chalmers, Christopher North, Carlyle, in the nineteenth.

As Professor Masson testifies, he is but a poor Scotsman valo, noting the literary insignificance of Scotland in the seventeenth century, forgetsthat it was then precisely that Scotland exerted its most decisive influence on the general history of the British islands, or doubts that the result was largely 'traceable to Scotland's obstinate perseverance so long in her own peculiar politico coclesiastical controversy, and to what had been argued or done in the course of it, on one side or the other, by such men as Andrew Melville, Alexander Henderson, Argyle, Montrose, Claver house, and Carstares' The century may be roughly divided into two halves, and the barrenness of this most birren period is mitigated by the first appearance—or by the redaction in something like their present shape—of many of the Scottish bullads

King James VI. and I. (1566-1625), the Scottish Solomon, would have been untrue to himself had he not even in boyhood cherished the ambition of gaining fame as an author 'The wisest fool in Christendom' was exceptionally well educated, and had some literary aptitude Macaulay, exaggerating antitheses as usual, iffirmed that he was made up of two men—'a nervous drivelling fool, who acted,' and 'a witty well read scholar, who wrote, disputed, and harangued' But his writing, like his disputing and haranguing, was mostly tedious and to little purpose

He beg in to publish when a boy of eighteen, and in the Scottish vernicular An Schort Freatise of Scottis Poesie (1584) contained 'reulis and crutelis to be observit and eschewit,' absurd and irbitrary many of them, but all early literary criticism has historic value The Irealise was followed by his Essayes of a Prentise in the Divine alit of Poeste, in which he doubtless illustrated as fir as he could his rules and cautions, without too great success—the experiments comprised sonnets m Scottish, Ane Schort Poeme of Tyme, also m Scottish, The Phania, inspired by Pliny, in seven-line stanzas, and a close and fairly spirited translation of L'Uranie of Du Bartas, who, as ambassador from the King of Navarre, flattered the King of Scots to the top of his bent later volume of Poetwall Exercises contains more translations from Du Bartas, the king's extraordinary doggerel glorification of the battle of I cpanto in billad metre, ind a translation of the same into French by the admiring diplomit, as the work of 'the Apollo of our time'! This longest of James's poems (nearly a thous ind lines) runs like this

The I urquish Host in manner like Themselves they did array,
The which two Bashaas did command
And order everic way
For Portan Basha had in charge
To governe all by land,
And Ah Basha had by sea
The only chefe command

The Schoot Poeme of Tyme belongs to a decidedly higher category

James's metrical version of the Psalms (said to be mainly the Earl of Stirling's work) was not pub-In 1901 Mr R S Rait, who had lished till 1631 (in The Royal Rhetorician, 1900) reprinted the Treatise, the Essays, and the Counterblast, printed (in folio) nineteen unprinted poems and prose pieces from a volume of James's MSS found in the Bodleian in 1900

James's most noted prose publications, almost wholly in English as he understood it (not without pronounced Scotticisms), are the Damonology (1597), the Basilicon Doron (1599), and A Counterblast against Tobacco (1604), but he issued four Meditations on Scripture and a tractate on the Oath of Allegiance The Doron was written for the instruction of his son Prince Henry a short time before the union of the crowns Allowance being made for James's 'high' view of the royal prerogative, it is a shrewd, sensible, and well-worded treatise on the duties and responsibilities of kings He instances the evil example of James V, 'who by his adulterie bred the wracke of his lawfull daughter and heire, in begetting that bastard, who unnaturally rebelled, and procured the ruine of his owne Soverane and sister,' and he denounces 'such famous invectives as Buchanans or Knoxes Chronicles, and if any of these infamous libels remaine untill your daies, use the law upon the keepers thereof' In the preface to the Damonology the king displays his learning in maintaining the existence and criminality of witches, who he says abounded in Scotland

Sorcery and Witchcraft

The fearefull abounding at this time in this Countrey of these detestable slaues of the Diucl, the Witches or enchaunters, hath mooued mee (beloued Reader) to dispatch in post, this following Treatise of mine, not in any wise (as I protest) to serue for a shew of my learning and ingine, but onely (moued of conscience) to preasse thereby, so farre as I can, to resolue the doubting hearts of many, both that such assaults of Satan are most certainely practised, and that the instruments thereof ments most seucrely to be punished against the dainnable opinions of two principally in our aage, whereof the one called Scot, an Englishman, is not ashamed in publike Print to deny, that there can be such a thing as Witch craft and so maintaines the old errour of the Sadduces in denying of spirits, The other called Wierus, a German Physition, sets out a publike Apologie for all these crifts folkes, whereby, procuring for their impunitie, he plainely be wrayes himselfe to have bene one of that profession And for to make this Treatise the more pleasant and facill, I have put it in forme of a Dialogue, which I have divided into three Bookes The first speaking of Magie in generall, and Necromancie in speciall The second, of Sorcerie and Witch craft and the third containes a discourse of all these kinds of spirits, and Spectres that appeares and troubles persons, together with a conclusion of the whole worke My intention in this labour is onely to prooue two things, as I have already said The one, that such druelish artes have bene and are The other, what exact triall and seuere punishment they merit and therefore reason I, What kinde of things are possible to be performed in these Arts, and by what naturall causes they may be, not that I touch every particular thing of the Diuels power, for that were infinite but onely to speake scholastickely, (since this cannot be spoken in our language) I reason vpon genus, leauing species and differentia to bee comprehended As for example, speaking of the power of Magiciens, in the first booke and sixt Chapter, I say, that they can suddenly cause be brought vnto them all kinds of daintie dishes by their familiar spirit, since as a thiefe he delights to steale, and as a spirit he can subtilly and suddenly ynough transport the same vnder this genus may be comprehended all particulars depending thereupon, such as the bringing Wine out of a wall (as wee haue heard oft to haue bene practised) and such others, which particulars are sufficiently prooued by the reasons of the generall.

How Witches Travel

Philomathes But by what way say they, or thinke yee it possible they can come to these valuavfull conventions? Epistemon There is the thing which I esteeme their senses to be deluded in, and though they lie not in confessing of it, because they thinke it to be trew, yet not to be so in substance or effect for they say that by divers meanes they may conucene either to the adoring of their Master, or to the putting in practise any seruice of his, committed vnto their charge one way is naturall, which is naturall riding, going, or sailing, at what houre their master comes and aduertises them and this way may be easily beleeued another way is some what more strange, and yet it is possible to bee trew which is, by being carried by the force of the spirit which is their conducter, either aboue the earth, or aboue the Sea swiftly, to the place where they are to meete which I then

do

am persuaded to bee likewise possible, in respect that as Habakkul was carried by the Angel in that forme, to the den where Daniel lay, so thinke I, the diuell will be readie to imitate God, as well in that as in other things which is much more possible to him to doe, being a Spirit, then to a mighty wind, being but a naturall Meteore, to trans port from one place to another, a solide body, as is commonly and daily seene in practise But in this violent forme they cannot be carried but a short bounds, agreeing with the space that they may retaine their breath for if it were longer, their breath could not remaine vnex tinguished, their body being carried in such a violent and forcible maner, as by example If one fall off a small height, his life is but in perill, according to the hard or soft lighting but if one fall from an high and stay [steep] rocke, his breath will be forcibly banished from the body, before he ean win to the earth, as is oft seene by experience And in this transporting they say themselues, that they are invisible to any other, except amongst themselues, which may also be possible in my opinion For if the deuil may forme what kinde of impressions he pleases in the aire, (as I have said before, speaking of Magic) why may hee not farre easilier thicken and ob scure so the aire that is next about them, by contracting it straite together, that the beames of any other mans eyes cannot pierce thorow the same, to see them? But the third way of their comming to their conventions, is that wherein I thinke them deluded for some of them say, that being transformed in the likenesse of a little beast or foule, they will come and pierce through whatsoeuer house or church, though all ordinarie passages be closed, by whatsoeuer open the aire may enter in at And some say that their bodies lying still, as in an extasie, their spirits will be raushed out of their bodies, and caried to such places, and for verifying thereof, will give evident tokens, as well by witnesses that have seene their body lying sencelesse in the meane time, as by naming persons whom with they met, and giving tokens what purpose was amongst them, whom otherwise they could not haue knowen for this forme of journeying, they affirme to use most, when they are transported from one coun trey to another

In his Counterblast James declares that many of the nobles and gentry spent three and four hundred pounds [Scots, it is to be hoped] a year on tobacco The man, he says, who introduced it was 'generally hated,' meaning Raleigh He seems to have done Raleigh an injustice (small compared with his other sins against him !) in making him It was almost certainly the introducer of tobacco Drake or Hawkins who brought tobacco hither, but Raleigh had doubtless much to do with promoting its popularity by encouraging the growth James concludes his Counterblast with these emphatic words 'Smoking is a custome loathsome to the eye, hatefull to the nose, harmefull to the braine, dangerous to the lungs, and in the blacke stinking fume thereof, neerest resembling the horrible Stigian smoake of the pit that is bottomlesse.'

Alexander Hume (1560?–1609), a son of Patrick Hume, Baron Polwarth, studied at St Andrews and Paris for the Scottish bar, held some court appointments, but in 1598 forsook the world to enter the Church, and died the sternly Puritan minister of Logie in 1609 He published a volume of Hymns or Sacred Songs in the year 1599 most finished poem is a description of a summer's day, which he calls the Day Estivall The natural aspects of Scottish landscape are painted with truth and clearness, and the poem is instinct with It opens as follows devout feeling

> O perfite light, which shaid away shed, divided The darkenes from the light, And set a ruler ou'r the day, over Ane uther ou'r the night,

Thy glorie, when the day foorth flies, Mair vively dois appeare, lively Nor at mid day unto our eyes The shining Sun is cleare

The shaddow of the earth anon Remooves and drawes by, Sine in the East, when it is gon, Appeares a clearer sky,

Quhilk Sunne perceives the little larks, The lapwing and the snyp, And tunes their sangs like nature's clarks, O'er midow, mure, and stryp

The summer day of the poet is one of unclouded splendour

> The time sa tranquill is and still, That na where sall ye find, Saif on ane high and barren hill, An air of peeping wind

All trees and simples, great and small, That balmy leif do beir. Nor thay were painted on a wall, Nae mair they move or steir

The rivers fresh, the callor streames cool Ou'r rocks can softlie rin, The water cleare like chrystall seames, And makes a pleasant din

The condition of the Scottish labourer would seem to have been then more comfortable than at present, and the climate of the country warmer, for Hume describes those working in the fields as stopping at midday, 'noon meat and sleep to take,' and refreshing themselves with 'caller wine' in a cave, and 'sallads steeped in oil'. As the poet lived four years in France, he was doubtless drawing on his Continental recollections for some of the features in this picture At length 'the gloaming comes, the day is spent,' and the poet concludes in a strain of pious gratitude and joy

> What pleasour were to walke and see Endlang a river cleare. The perfite forme of everie tree Within the deepe appeare

The salmon out of cruifs and creils, Uphailed into skowts, The bels and circles on the weills Through lowpping of the trouts.

The Triumph of the Lord is his account of the 'defait of the Spanish Navie.' He prefixes to his poem an exhortation to the Scottish youth to forswear profane sonnets, vain ballads, and fabulous romances (which we must think were not very much in demand), denounced popery, and published some sermons and a treatise on conscience The Hymns and Songs were published by the Bannatyne Club in 1832, and there is the Rev Menzies Fergusson's Alexander Hume, an early Poet-Pastor of Logie (Paisley, 1899)

Sii Robert Ayton (1570-1638), Scottish courtier and poet, was the son of Ayton of Kinaldie, near St Andrews, graduated at St Andrews, studied law at Paris, and was ambassador to the Emperor James I appointed him one of the gentlemen of the bed-chamber, and private secretary to his queen, besides conferring upon him the honour of knighthood Ben Jonson told Drummond that Sir Robert loved him (Jonson) dearly says he was acquainted with all the wits in Engand, specially naming Hobbes of Malmesbury He was a man of culture, wrote verses in French, Latin, and Greek, and was one of the first Scotsmen to write English, prose and verse, with tolerable purity He was, indeed, one of the very earliest of the Cavalier poets, and Dryden accounted some of his verses as amongst the best of that age. He was buried in Westminster Diophanius and Charidora is not a great poem, though better than his stilted and awkward The best known of his shorter Latin verses poems-some of them wonderfully felicitous-is Inconstancy Upbraided (sometimes called To an Inconstant Mistress)

I loved thee once, I'll love no more,
Thine be the grief as is the blame,
Thou art not what thou wast before,
What reason I should be the same?
I'le that can love unloved again,
Hath better store of love than brain
God send me love my debts to pay,
While unthrifts fool their love away

Nothing could have my love o'erthrown,
If thou hadst still continued mine,
Yea, if thou hadst remained thine own,
I might perchance have yet been thine.
But thou thy freedom did recall,
That it thou mightst elsewhere enthral,
And then, how could I but disdain
A captive's captive to remain?

When new desires had conquered thee,
And changed the object of thy will,
It had been lethargy in me,
Not constancy, to love thee still Yea, it had been a sin to go
And prostitute affection so,
Since we are taught no prayers to say
To such as must to others pray

Yet do thou glory in thy choice,

Thy choice of his good fortune boast,
I'll neither grieve nor yet rejoice,

To see him guin what I have lost,

The height of my disdain shall be,

To laugh at him, to blush for thee,

To love thee still, but go no more

A begging at a beggar's door

On rather slender authority another famous poem (of which Burns made a rather poor Scotch version) has been credited to him, as has also the prototype of Burns's Auld Lang Syne Probably the poem An Inconstant Mistress, given below, was confounded with Inconstancy Upbraided, given above

I do confess thou 'rt smooth and fur,
And I might have gone near to love thee,
Had I not found the slightest prayer
That lips could speak had power to move thee
But I can let thee now alone,
As worthy to be loved by none

I do confess thou'rt sweet, yet find
Thee such an unthrift of thy sweets,
Thy favours are but like the wind,
Which kisses everything it meets,
And since thou canst love more than one,
Thou'rt worthy to be kissed by none.

The morning rose that untouched stands,
Armed with her briers, how sweet she smells!
But plucked and strained through ruder hands,
Her sweets no longer with her dwells,
But scent and beauty both are gone,
And leaves fall from her one by one

Such fate ere long will thee betide,
When thou hast handled been a while
Like fair flowers to be thrown aside,
And thou shalt sigh, when I shall smile,
To see thy love to every one
Hath brought thee to be loved by none

The first verse (first of six) of Old Long Synu is as follows

Should old acquaintance be forgot, And never thought upon? The flames of love extinguished, And freely past and gone? Is thy kind heart now grown so cold, In that loving breast of thine, That thou canst never once reflect On old long sync?

The Earl of Stirling—William Alexander of Menstrie (1567?-1640), made an earl by Charles I in 1633—was a conspicuous Scottish courtier and public functionary as well as a fairly prolific poet Born at Menstric, in the house which afterwards gave buth to Sir Ralph Abercromby, he studied at Glasgow and Leyden, travelled in France, Sp iin, and Italy, and published Aurora (1604) and a series of four Monarchicke Tragedies - Darius (1603), Crasus (1604), The Alexandræan Tragedy (1605), and Julius Cæsai (1607) The theme is in all four the fall of ambition, and the method is an imitation of the Greek dramit, the plays are dignified in style and contain some fine lyrics, but they are utterly wearisome. He was knighted by 1609, in 1613 was attiched to the household of Prince Charles, in 1614 was made Master of Requests for Scotland, and published Part I of his huge poem Doomesday (not completed till He received in 1621 the grant of 'Nova Scotia,' a vist tract in Canada and what now is the United States, in 1631 he was made sole printer of King Junes's version of the Psalms From 1626 till his death he was the Secretary of State for Scotland, and in 1627-31 he was also made Keeper of the Signet, a Commissioner of Lachequer, and a Judge of the Court of Session The French pushed their conquests in America, und Alexander's grant of lands became valueless Long unpopular as too self-seeking and avaricious, he was now suspected and hated. In 1630 he was created Viscount and in 1633 Earl of Stirling, in 1639 also Earl of Dovan (Burns's 'crystal Devon'), but he died insolvent in London next year tragedies are not dramatic, but their quatrains are graceful. The songs, sonnets, elegies, and madrigals forming the Amora are marred by concerts, yet show fancy and ingenuity, his friendly rival, Drummond, said he was a better poet than Tasso His amitory poems Stirling did not include in his collected Recreations with the Muses (1637) Julius Casar play contains some passages rather noticeably resembling Shakespeare's, but as the greater drama was almost certainly written some years before, there is no ground for holding—as used to be held—that Shakespeare borrowed from Stirling I famous passage in the Tempest was supposedsomewhat hypercritically (though in this case the date of the Fen fiel, 1611 or thereabouts, would permit the derivation)—to be also derived from the I irl of Stirling In his play of Darr is the reflection,

Of glassic scepters let fruie greatnesse vaunt, Not scepters no, but reeds, which (rus dup) break, And let eve flatt'ring shows our wits enchant, All perish dure, ere of their pomp men speak Those golden palaces, those gorgeous halfs, With furniture superfluonsly faire,
Those stately courts, those skie encountring walls,
Do vanish all like vapours in the agre
O' what affliction jealous greatnesse beares,
Which still must travell to hold others downe,
Whil'st all our guards not guard us from our feares,
Such toile attends the glory of a crowne.

inevitably recalls Shakespeare's lines

 And, like this insubstantial pageant faded, Leave not a rack behind

The following is one of the Earl of Stirling's best sonnets

I sweare, Aurora, by thy starrie eyes,
And by those golden lockes whose locke none ships,
And by the coroll of thy rosic hippes,
And by the naked snowes which beautic dies,
I sweare by all the jewels of thy mind,
Whose like yet never worldly treasure bought,
Thy solide judgement and thy generous thought,
Which in this darkened age have clearely shin'd
I sweare by those, and by my spotlesse love,
And by my secret yet most fervent fires,
That I have never nurs'd but chast desires,
And such as modestic might well approve
Then since I love those vertuous parts in thee,
Shouldst thou not love this vertuous mind in me?

Robert Earl of Ancrum (1578-1654), son of Ker of Ancrum and grandson of Ker of Ferniehirst, enjoyed the favour of James and of Charles I, by whom he was promoted to various court appointments and made Larl of Ancrum On Charles's execution he retired to Amsterdam, where he died in debt. He translated the Psalms, like others of his contemporaries, and the following sonnet, addressed to Drummond of Hawthornden in 1624 (as reproduced in Ker's Correspondence, 1875), shows how since the unions of the crowns the Scottish vernacular was being supplemed by English

Sweet solitary life. Ionely, dumb joy,
That need'st no warnings how to grow more wise.

William Drummond of Hawthornden (1585–1649) rose as a poet above mere provincial fame, and was associated in friendship and genius with his great English contemporaries. His father, Sir John Drummond, was gentleman-usher to King James, and the poet seems to have inherited his reverence for royalty—few authors have been more outspoken in their loyalty. Having graduated at Edinburgh and studied civil law in France (1607–8), he succeeded his father in 1610 as second laird of Hawthornden—a perfect home for a poet. In all Scotland there are few more beautiful glens than the cliffs, caves, and wooded banks of the Esk at Hawthornden, hereafter to be known for Drum-

From the Engraving prefixed to his Works (Edinburgh, 1711)

mond's sake as 'classic Hawthornden,' and close by is the ornately sculptured Roslin Chapel, besung by Scott. Drummond was a most accomplished man, well read not merely in Greek and Latin literature, but in French, Italian, Spanish, and Hebrew In 1613 he published Tears on the Death of Maliades, or Henry, Prince of Wales In 1616 appeared a volume of Poems Amorous, Funerall, Divine, Pastorall, in Sonnets, Songs, Sextains, Madrigals, chiefly of love and sorrow The death of his wife (1614), within a year of her marriage, was keenly felt, he did not marry again for eighteen years Forth Feasting, a Panegyru to the King's Most Excellent Majesty (1617), congratulates James effusively and lengthily on his revisiting his native country of Scotland Drummond spent his life mainly between poetry and mechanical experiments—the poet patented a new kind of pistol, a pike, a battering-ram, a telescope, a burning glass, an anemometer, and a condenser abhorred the Covenant, but was constrained to subscribe it, relieving his feelings by bitterly sarcastic verses His affection for the royal cause and the king's person was so keen that grief for the royal martyr's death hastened his own Flowers of Zion appeared in 1623 his prose works include a History of the Five Jameses, some royalist and polemical tracts, and The Cypresse Grove, a prose meditation on death, which Professor Masson pronounces 'superlatively excellent,' insomuch that there is, he thinks, nothing of the same length superior, if anything quite equal to it, in all Sir Thomas Browne or Jeremy Taylor-though the style is in places laboured Drummond was intimate with Drayton, and his friendship with Ben Jonson was cemented by a memorable visit paid to him by Jonson at Hawthornden in the winter of 1618 On the 25th of September the magistrates of Edinburgh conferred the freedom of the city on Jonson, and on the 26th of October following he was entertained by the civic authorities to a banquet During Jonson's stay at Hawthornden, the Scottish poet kept notes of the opinions expressed by the great dramatist, and chronicled some of his foibles and failings (see page 403) It should be remembered that his notes were private memoranda, never published by himself, and their truth has been partly confirmed from other sources mond's poetry is sweet rather than strong, many of his sonnets are admirable and exquisite, and, as compared with his other poems, have fewer conceits and more natural feeling, elevation of sentiment, and grace of expression. He wrote a number, of madrigals, epigrams, and other short pieces, some of which are rather coarse. purity of his language, the harmony of his verse, and the play of fancy, musical sweetness, and melancholy mysticism are conspicuous features, but his range was manifestly limited. With more energy and force of mind he would have been a greater favourite with Ben Jonson-and with posterity He shows pronounced traces of Italian influence, but he was more sensitive to natural scenery than any of his contemporaries, and he was one of the first to see and record the beauty of a snow-clad hill

From 'Forth Feasting'

What blustring Noise now interrupts my Sleep? What ecchoing Shouts thus cleave my chrystal Deep, And seem to call me from my wat'ry Court? What Melody? What Sounds of Joy and Sport, Are convey'd hither from each neighbouring Spring? With what loud Rumours do the Mountains ring? Which in unusual Pomp on Tip toes stand, And (full of Wonder) overlook the Land? [bright, Whence comes these glitt'ring Throngs, these Meteors This golden People glancing in my Sight? Whence doth this Praise, Applause and Love, arise? What Lord star East-ward draweth thus all Eyes? Am I awake? Or have some Dreams conspired To mock my Sense with what I most desir'd? View I that living Face, see I those Looks, Which with Delight were wont t' amaze my Brooks?

Do I behold that Worth, that Man divine, This Age's Glory, by these Banks of mine? Then find I true what long I wish'd in vain, My much beloved Prince is come again, So unto them whose Zenith is the Pole, When Six black Months are past, the Sun doth roll So after Lempost to Sea tossed Wights Taire Helen's Brothers show their chearing Lights So comes Arabia's Wonder from her Woods, And far far off is seen by Memphis Floods, The feather'd Sylvans cloud like by her fly, And with triumphing Plaudits beat the Sky, Nyle marvels, Serap's Priests (entranced) rave, And in Mygdonian Stone her Shape ingrave, In lasting Cedars they do mark the Time In which Apollo's Bird came to their Clime

Let Mother Earth now deckt with Flow'rs be seen And sweet breath'd Zephyres curl the Meadows green, Let Heaven weep Rubies in a Crimson Show'r, Such as on Indies Shoars they use to pour Or with that golden Storm the Fields adorn, Which Jove rain'd when his Blew ey'd Maid was born. May never Hours the Web of Day out weave, May never Night rise from her sable Cave Swell proud my Billows, faint not to declare Your Joys as ample us their Causes are For Murmurs hourse, sound like Arion's Harp, Now delicately flat, now sweetly sharp, And you my Nymphs, rise from your moist Repair, Strow all your Springs and Grots with Lillies fair, Some swiftest footed, get them hence, and pray Our Floods and Lakes come keep this Holy day, What e're beneath Albama's Hills do run, Which see the rising or the setting Sun, Which drink stern Grampius' mists, or Ochel's Snows Stone rolling Tay, Time Tortoise like that flows, The pearly Don, the Dees, the fertile Spey Wild Neverne, which doth see our longest Day, Ness smoaking Sulphur, Leave with Mountains crown'd Strange Lowmond for his floating Isles renown'd The Irish Rian, Ken, the Silver Air, The snaky Dun, the Ore with rushy Hair, The Christal streaming Nid, loud bellowing Clyde, Tweed which no more our Kingdoms shall divide Rank swelling Annan, Lid with curled Streams, The Eskes, the Solway where they lose their Names, To ev'ry one proclaim our Joys and Feasts, Our Triumphs, bid all come and be our Guests And as they meet in Neptune's azure Hall, Bid them bid Sea Gods keep this Festival, This Day shall by our Currants be renown'd, Our Hills about shall still this Day resound Nay, that our Love more to this Day appear, Let us with it henceforth begin our Year

To Virgins, Flow'rs, to Sun burnt Earth, the Rain, To Mariners fur Winds amidst the Main, Cool Shades to Pilgrims, which hot glances burn, Arc not so pleasing as thy blest Return That Day (dear Prince)

Epitaph on Prince Henry

Stry, Passenger, see where enclosed hes The Paragon of Princes, fairest Frame, Time, Nature, Place, could show to mortal Eyes, In Worth, Wit, Virtue, Miracle of Fame At least that Part the Larth of him could claim This Marble holds (hard like the Destinies)

For as to his brave Sp'rit, and glorious Name, The one the World, the other fills the Skies. Th' immortal Amaranthus, princely Rose, Sad Violet, and that sweet Flow'r that bears In Sanguine Spots the Tenor of our Woes, Spread on this Stone, and wash it with your Tears Then go and tell from Gades unto Inde, You saw where Earth's Perfections were confin'd

Milton in his Lycidas introduced in the same way the fabled origin of the hyacinth

Inwrought with figures dim, and on the edge Like to that sanguine flower, inscribed with woe.

To his Lute

My Lute, be as thou wert when thou did grow With thy green Mother in some shady Grove, When immelodious Winds but made thee move, And Birds their Ramage did on the bestow Since that dear Voice which did thy sounds approve, Which wont in such harmonious Strains to flow, Is reft from Earth to tune those Spheres above, What are thou but a Harbinger of Woe? Thy pleasing Notes be pleasing Notes no more, But Orphans Wailings to their fainting Ear, Each Stroke a Sigh, each Sound draws forth a Tear, For which be silent as in Woods before Or if that any Hand to touch thee daign,

Like widow'd Turtle still her Loss complain

The Praise of a Solitary Life

Thrice happy he who by some shady Grove, Far from the clam'rous World, doth live his own Though solitary, who is not alone, But doth converse with that eternal Love O how more sweet is Birds harmonious Moan, Or the hoarse Sobbings of the Widow'd Dove, Than those smooth Whisperings near a Prince's Throne, Which Good make doubtful, do the Evil approve! O how more sweet is Zephyr's wholesome Breath, And Sighs embalm'd, which new born I low'rs unfold, Than that Applause vain Honour doth bequeath! How sweet are Streams to poyson drunk in Gold! The World is full of Horrors, Troubles, Slights, Woods harmless Shades have only true Delights.

To a Nightingale

Sweet Bird that sing'st away the early Hours, Of Winters past or coming void of Carc, Well pleased with Delights which present are, Fair sersons, budding Sprays, sweet smelling Flow'rs To Rocks, to Springs, to Rills, from leavy Bow'rs, Thou thy Creator's Goodness dost declare, And what dear Gifts on thee he did not spare, A Stain to humane Sense in Sin that low'rs What Soul can be so sick, which by thy Songs (Attir'd in sweetness) sweetly is not driven Quite to forget Larth's Furmoils, Spites and Wrongs, And lift a reverent Eye and Thought to Heaven? Sweet artless Songster, thou my Mind doest raise, To Ayres of Spheres, yea and to Angels layes

Sonnets

In Mind's pure Glass when I my self behold. And lively see how my best Days are spent, What Clouds of Care above my Head are rol'd, What coming Ill, which I cannot prevent

My course begun I wearied do repent,
And would embrace what Reason oft hath told,
But scarce thus think I, when Love hath control d
All the best Reasons Reason could invent
Tho sure I know my Labour's End is Gricf,
The more I strive that I the more shall pine,
That only Death shall be my last Relief
Yet when I think upon that Tace divine,
Like one with Arrow shot, in Laughter's place,
Maugre my Heart, I joy in my Disgrace.

I know that all beneath the Moon decays,
And what by Mortals in this World is brought,
In Time's great Periods shall return to nought,
That fairest States have fatal Nights and Days.
I know that all the Muses heavenly Lays,
With toil of Sp'rit, which are so dearly bought,
As idle Sounds of few or none are sought,
That there is nothing lighter than vain Praise
I know frail Beauty like the purple Flower,
To which one Morn oft Birth and Death affords,
That Love a jarring is of Minds Accords,
Where Sense and Will bring under Reason's Power
Know what I list, all this cannot me move,
But that (alas) I both must Write, and Love

There is no ground, happily, for attributing to Drummond, as was done till quite lately, the coarse, clever, farcical macaronic, Polemo-Muddinia, published anonymously in 1683, and probably written by an obscure pamphleteer and rhymester, Samucl Colvill, who was publishing his things between 1670 and 1690

In this passage from the Cypress Grove we see Drummond dealing with one of the great problems of urn burial somewhat in the spirit and after the manner of Browne

For to easy censure it would appear that the soul, if it can fore see that divorcement which it is to have from the body, should not without great reason be thus over grieved, and plunged in inconsolable and unaccustom'd sorrow considering their near union, long familiarity and love, with the great change, pain, and ugliness, which are apprehended to be the inseparable attendants of death

They had their being together, parts they are of one reasonable creature, the harming of the one is the weaking of the working of the other. What sweet contentments doth the soul enjoy by the senses? They are the gates and windows of its knowledge, the organs of its delight. If it be tedious to an excellent player on the lute to abide but a few months the want of one, how much more the being without such noble tools and engines be painful to the soul? And if two pilgrims which have wandred some few miles together, have a hearts grief when they are near to part, what must the sorrow be at parting of two so loving friends and neverloathing lovers as are the body and soul?

Death is the violent estranger of acquaintance, the eternal divorcer of marriage, the ravisher of the children from the parents, the stealer of parents from their children, the interier of fame, the sole cause of forgetfulness, by which the living talk of those gone away as of so many shadows or age worn stories all strength by it is enfeebled, beauty turned into deformity and rottenness, honour into contempt, glory into baseness. It is the reasonless breaker off of all actions, by which we enjoy no more the sweet pleasures of earth, nor contemplate the stately revolutions of the heavens. The sun perpetu ally setteth, stars never rise unto us it in one moment robbeth us of what with so great toil and care in many years we have heaped together by this are successions of linages cut short, kingdoms left heirless, and greatest states orphaned it is not overcome by pride, soothed by flattery, tam'd by intreaties, brib'd by benefits, softned by lamentations, nor diverted by time. Wisdom, save this, can prevent and help every thing. By death we are exiled from this fair city of the world, it is no more a world unto us, nor we any more a people unto it runcs of phanes, palaces, and other magnificent frames, yield a sad prospect to the soul, and how should it without horror view the wrack of such a wonderful masterpicce as is the body?

Drummond's poems have been edited for the Maitland Club (1832), by Peter Cunningham (1833), W D Furnbull (1857), and W C. Ward (1894). See the Life by Professor Masson (1873) and the essay in Edinburgh Shetches also Prof H Walker's Three Centuries of Scottish Literature (1893).

John Spottiswoode, successively Archbishop of Glasgow (consecrated 1610) and of St Andrews (1615) in the reign of James VI, was born in 1565 The son of the Superintendent (practically bishop) of Lothian, he was educated at the University of Glasgow, and became a parish minister in 1583. He went to London as King James's chaplain in A strenuous and active promoter of the king's scheme for the establishment of Episcopacy in Scotland, he stood high in the favour of James, as well as of Charles I, by whom he was made Lord Chancellor of Scotland in 1635 He reluctantly entered into the king's unwise measures for introducing a liturgy into Scotland, and became hateful to the Covenanting party. He was present in St Giles's Church in Edinburgh during the fateful Jenny Geddes riot. The Glasgow Assembly of 1638 deposed and excommunicated the archbishop. who retired to London and died there in 1639 He wrote, at the command of James, a History of the Church of Scotland, from 203 to 1625 A.D. When the king was told that some passages in such a work might possibly bear too hard upon the memory of his mother, he desired Spottiswoode to 'write and spare not,' and yet, says Bishop Nicolson, 'the historian ventured not so far with a commission as Buchanan did without one' The history was published in London in 1655, and is fair on the whole, though not always impartial.

Destruction of Monasteries.

Whilst these things thus passed, John Knox returned from Geneva unto Scotland [1559], and joining with the Congregation, did preach to them at Perth—In his sermon he took occasion to speak against the adoration of images, shewing that the same tended to God's dishonour, and that such idols and monuments of superstition as were erected in churches ought to be pulled down, as being offensive to good and godly people. The sermon ended and the better sort gone to dinner, a priest, rather to try men's affections than out of any devotion, prepared to say Mass, opening a great case wherein was the history of divers saints exquisitely carved—A young boy that stood by saying that such boldness was insufferable, the priest give him a blow. The boy in an anger casting a stone at the priest, happened to break one of the pictures where upon a stir was presently raised, some of the common sort falling upon the priest, others running to the altar and breaking the images, so as in a moment all was pulled down in the church that carried any mark of idolatry The people upon the noise thereof assembled in great numbers, and invading the cloisters, made spoil of all they found therein. The Franciscans had store of provi sion, both of victuals and household stuff amongst the Dominicans the like wealth was not found, yet so much there was as might show the profession they made of poverty to be feigned and counterfeit. The Curthusians, who passed both those in wealth, were used in like manner, yet was the prior permitted to take with him what he might carry of gold and silver plate spoil was given to the poor, the rich sort forbearing to meddle with any part thereof But that which was most admired was the speed they made in demolishing those edifices. For the Charter house (a building of exceeding cost and largeness) was not only ruined, but the stones and timber so quickly taken away, as in less than two days space a vestige thereof was scarce remaining to be seen They of Couper in Fife hearing what was done at Perth, went in like manner to their church, and defreed all the images, altars, and other instruments of idolatry, which the curit took so heavily, as the night following he put violent hands on himself

The noblemen remained at that time in St Andrews, and because they foresaw this their answer would not be well accepted, and feared some sudden attempt (for the queen with her I renchmen lay then at Falkland), they sent to the lairds of Dun and Pittarrow, and others that favoured religion in the countries of Angus and Mearns, and requested them to meet at St Andrews the fourth day Meanwhile they themselves went to the town of Crail, whither all that had warning came, showing great forwardness and resolution, and were not a little encouraged by John Knox, who, in a sermon made unto them at the same time, put them in mind of that he had forctold at Perth, how there was no sincerity in the queen regent's dealing, and that conditions would not be kept as they had found Therefore did he exhort them not to be any longer deluded with fair promises, seeing there was no peace to be hoped for at their hands, who took no regard of contracts and covenants solemnly sworn And because there would be no quietness till one of the parties were masters, and strangers expulsed out of the kingdom, he wished them to prepare themselves either to die as men, or to live victorious

By this exhortation the hearers were so moved, as they fell immediately to the pulling down of altars and images, and destroyed all the monuments which were abused to idolatry in that town. The like they did the next day in Anstruther, and from thence came directly to St Andrews. The bishop hearing what they had done in the coast town, and suspecting they would attempt the same reformation in the city, came to it well accompamed, of purpose to withstand them, but after he had tried the affections of the to visinen, and found them all inclining to the Congregation, he went away early the next morning towards I ilkland to the queen that day being Sunday John Knox preached in the parish church, taking for his theme the history of the and applying the corruption which was at that time in Terusalem to the present estate of the Church, and declar ing what was the duty of those to whom God had given authority and power, he did so incite the juditors, as, the sermon being ended, they went all and made spoil of the churches, razing the monasteries of the Black and Grey friars to the ground

James VI and a Refractory Preacher

The king perceiving by all these letters that the death of his mother was determined, called back his umbas sadors, and at home gave order to the ministers to temember her in their public prayers, which they denied to do, though the form prescribed was most christian and lawful, which was, that it might please God to illumi nate her with the light of his truth, and save her from the apparent danger wherein she was east. Upon their denial, charges were directed to command all bishops, ministers, and other office bearers in the Church to make mention of her distress in their public prayers, and commend her to God in the form appointed. Lut of all the number only Mr David Lindsay at Leith and the king's own ministers gave obedience. At Ldinburgh, where the disobedience was most public, the king, purposing to have their fault amended, did appoint the third of hebinary for solemn prayers to be made in her behalf, command ing the bishop of St Andrews to prepare himself for that day, which when the ministers understood, they stirred up Mr John Cowper, a young man not entered as yet in the function, to take the pulpit before the time and exclude the bishop. The king coming at the hour appointed, and seeing him in the place, called to him from his seat, and said, 'Mr John, that place is destined for another, yet since you are there, if you will obey the charge that is given, and remember my mother in your prayers, you shall go on.' He replying, 'that he would do as the Spirit of God should direct him,' was commanded to leave the place and making as though he would stry, the captain of the guard went to pull him out, where upon he burst forth in these speeches. 'This day shall be a witness against the ling in the great day of the Lord ' and then denouncing a wo to the inhabitants of Ldinburgh, he went down, and the bishop of 5t Andrews entering the pulpit did perform the duty required noise was great for a while amongst the people after they were quieted, and had heard the bishop (as he was a most powerful preacher) out of that text to Finiothy discourse of the duty of Christians in praving for all men, they grieved sore to see their teachers so fir overtaken, and condemned their obstinacy in that point In the afternoon Cowper was called before the conneil, where Mr Walter Balcanquel and Mr William Watson, ministers of the town, accompanying him, for some fille speeches that escaped them at this time were both discharged from preaching in I dinburgh during his imposts a pleasure, and Cowper sent prisoner to Blackness.

David Calderwood (1575-1650), a minister of the Kirk of Scotland at Crailing, in Royburghshire, was in 1617 imprisoned and banished for procesting against royal encroachments on the Church's rights. In Holland he wrote in Latin Illare Damasce time, an impeachment of the Angli-Gospel touching our Saviour's purging of the Temple, I can Church polits, in virtue of which he was quoted by Dutch divines as 'Eminentissimus Calderwood' On his return to Scotland, now minister it Pencaitland, he compiled an elaborate History of the Kirk. An abridgment, entitled The True History of the Church of Scotland, was printed in 1646, and the complete work, printed from the manuscript in the British Museum, was issued in eight volumes, Edinburgh, 1841–49, published by the Wodrow Society Calderwood, an unyielding Presbyterian, does not err on the side of tenderness to Episcopalians or Erastians This is his account of the various functions at the reception in Edinburgh of James VI's queen, Anne of Denmark, in 1590

Upon Tuisday, the 19th of May, the queene made her entrie in Edinburgh She came by the south side of the toun, by the West Port, in a coache A young boy descending in a globe, which opened, delivered certane keyes, with a Bible and a Psalme Booke Johne Russell made an harangue in Latine, and the cannons of the castell were discharged. The nobles of Scotland and the Danish road before, and a trune of laders behind The queene herself road in a coache drawin with eight hors, accompanied with the citicens in their gownes, and some of them careing a pale of purple velvet above the coache At the strait of the Bow, Mr Hercules Rollocke, Maister of the Grammar Schoole, made an oratioun At the Butter Trone, there were some young weomen coastlie apparrelled, standing upon a scaffold, playing upon organs, and singing of Mr Johne Craig's sonne, a young boy, had a short oratioun to her At the Tolbuth were five youths, clothed in gentlewomen's apparell, one having a sword, another a ballance, the thrid a booke, the fourth a target, and other two with their signes, all representing Peace, Plentie, Policie, Justice, Liberallitie, and remperance Everie one expouned the significa tioun of their owne signes Theraster, the queene went into the kirk, and satt in the east end, in the loft, under a faire cannable of velvet. Mr Robert Bruce made the sermoun, which being ended within halfe an houre, the queene is brought furth Comming by the Croce, they see there Bacchus drinking, and casting glasses, violers playing, and musicians singing At the Salt Trone was represented the king's genealogie, and at the root of the tree a young boy made an oratioun in Latine. At the port of the Nether Bow were repre sented the seven planets, and the weird givin in Latine, and a faire jewell, of a great price, called the A, was givin to the queene All the way there went, before the honest men of the toun, twentie foure youths clothed, some with cloth of silver, others with white taffetie, and golden chaines about their neckes, legges, and armes, and visoures on their faces, making them seeme Mores The fore staires were covered with tapestrie or faire coverings Mr Andrew Melvill made an oratioun to the ambassaders, to their great admiratioun The king acknowledged that he had honoured him and his countrie that day, promised never to forgett it, and commanded to print it with all diligence. The day following it was delivered to the printer, with an epigramme of dedica tioun to the king, and entituled Eteparloxion Josephus Scaliger, after the sight of it, wrote to Mr Andrew and said, 'Profecto nos talia non possumus' Lipsius reading it, said, 'Re vera Andreas Melvinus est serio doctus' Upon Saturday, the 23d, the Danish ambassaders were banketted by the toun of Edinburgh in the Coine House

The weird was a forecast of the future as indicated by the positions of the stars, the Coine or Cuinzie House was the Mint of Scotland, in a close or lane off the Cowgate.

John Row (1568–1646), minister of Carnock, in Fife, wrote a Historie of the Kirk of Scotland from 1588 to August 1637, which, with a continuation to July 1639, by his son, of the same name, was edited in 1842 by David Laing for the Maitland and the Wodrow Societies

Zachary Boyd (1585?-1653), a pious and learned divine of the Scottish Church, has had the unhappy fate to be handed down by tradition as the translator of Scripture into doggerel rhyme. One of the Boyds of Penkill, in Ayrshire, he studied at Glasgow, St Andrews, and Saumur (where his cousin, Boyd of Trochrig, afterwards Principal of Glasgow University, was then professor) Hc spent sixteen years in France, declined a chair at Saumur, and in 1623 became minister of the Barony Church in Glasgow, he was also rector and vice-chancellor of the university there, and to it left his books and a sum of money He was a staunch Covenanter, disapproved Cromwell's supremacy, and, preaching before the victorious general in Glasgow Cathedral, 'ruled at him to his face' He wrote incessantly, and published The Last Battell of the Soul in Death (1629, republished 1831), prose meditations for the sick, a poem on Leslie's victory at Newburn (1640), the preliminary of the great civil war, numerous sermons and pamphlets, The Garden of Zion (2 vols 1644), verse paraphrases of large parts of Scripture—the first volume mainly the Lings of Judah, the second volume containing 'the books of Job, Ecclesiastes, and Song of Songs, all in English verse,' and The Psalmes of David in Meeter (1646) Among his manuscripts are, besides sermons, miscellaneous poems more or less sacred in substance, versions of The Foure Evangels, and Zioit's Flowers, containing in 26,080 lines of verse the fall of Adam, Abel murdered, the Tower of Babel, Abraham and Israc, Joseph and his brethren, and other ten scriptural stories or episodes, down to John the Baptist and the New Jerusalem in the Revelation, together with two edifying but not quite scriptural stories of the Gunpowder Plot and the world's vanities Four of them were printed from the manuscript in 1855 The stories-belated miracle-plays or scriptural 'interludes'-are paraphrased into an imperfectly dramatic form, and are each detailed by some six or eight speakers Thus in 'Jonah' the speakers' are '1 The Lord 2 Jonah. 3 The Shipmaster 4. The Sailors 5 The King of Ninive. 6 The men of Ninive' And in 'John the Baptist' Herod, Herodias, and 'the hangman' take their respective parts as well as the Lord, Elizabeth, Gabriel, and John and his disciples Common rumour credited him with having translated the whole of the Scriptures into verse, and his versions are alluded to as 'Zachary Boyd's Bible' He was one of the committee appointed in 1648 to revise the version of the Psalms by the English Cromwellian, Francis Rous, for use in the Church of Scotland, in some points this version, sung in Scotland from that date till the present day, more closely follows Boyd's and Sir William Mure's than Rous's translation How very similar Boyd's is to Rous's and the use-and-wont 'Scotlish version' may be seen by comparing the renderings given at page 503 with Boyd's of the same three verses of Psalm xxIII

Yea though through valley of death's shade I walk, I'le fear no ill, For thou art with me, thy rod and thy staffe me comfort still.

Thou set'st in presence of my foes a table me before, Mine head with oyl thou dost anoint, my cup it runneth o're

Goodnesse and mercy all the dayes of my life surely shall Me follow, and in the Lord's house for ever I will dwell

The version, though rude, had the merit of being a pretty close translation, and is at least not grotesque. The same cannot be said for the translations in which Zachary permits himself more freedom—though even here there are scenes vividly conceived and lines not lacking in undeniable vigour and uncouth lucidity. The following part of the history of Jonah may be given as perhaps the ne plus ultra of unpoetic verse, a good man's efforts to make sacred story impressive becoming, for lack of humour on his part, a caricature far from solemnising in its effects

The Sailors Now over board hee throwne is by and by, Where in the waters he doth sprawling ly There Jonah is, God's wrath for to appease, Ev'n head and eares downe soused in the seas.

But what is this that near him wee doe see,
Like to a tower wambling on the sea, wallowing
A monster great, the Leviathan strong,
With beame like jawes which followes him along
A little space the whale did round him play,
To write his time, but in a short delay
He wheel'd about, and in a trice wee sawe
The living man he buri'd in his mawe

Waves rest content, the surges no more beate, The sea's growne kind, the billowes no more threate, All is made quiet, clouds no more doe frowne, Heav'ns pleased well, doe with their smiles look downe, Waves swell'd before lye levell in their place, Without a wrinkle, smooth as is the glasse No wamblings now, the sea it is tranquill, Heav'ns lowre no more, all is both calme and still.

Jonah I did rebell, heere is my day of Doome,
Feasts damty seeme until the reck'ning come
Alas' too late, it now repenteth me,
That I refus'd to goe to Ninive,
I thought to lurk, but now my miseries
Me clearely tell, God hath unvailed eyes,

And that hee will ov'rtake them by and by, Who ev'r they bee that from his face doe fly I understood that God was good and kind, But mongrell thoughts with foly pierc'd my mind, Heere apprehended, I in prison ly, What goods will ransome my captivity? What house is this, where's neither fire nor candle, Where I no thing but guts of fishes handle? I and my table are both heere within, Where day ne'er dawn'd, where sun did never shine The like of this on earth man never saw, A living man within a monster's mawe, Buried under mountains which are high and steep, Plung'd under water hundrethe fathomes deep Not so was Noah in his house of tree, For through a window hee the light did see Hee sail'd above the highest waves, a wonder, I and my boat are all the waters under Hee in his ark might goe and also come, But I sit still in such a strait'ned roome, As is most uncouth, head and feet together, Among such grease as would a thousand smother I find no way now for my shrinking hence, But heere to lye and die for mine offence. Light persons were in Noah's hulk together, Comfortable they were each one to other, In all the earth like unto mee is none, Farre from all living I heere lye alone, Where I entomb'd in melancholy sink, Choak't, suffocat, with excremental stink This grieves mee most, that I for grievous sinne, Incare'rd lye within this floating in.

Within this cave with greefe my heart is gall'd, Lord heare the sighs from my heart's centre hal'd, Thou know'st how long I have been in this womb, A living man within a living tomb, O what a lodging! wilt thou in those vaults, As in a Hell most dark, correct my faults? I neither kno when day doth shine, or night Comes for my rest, I'm so depriv'd of sight, Though that the judgement's uncouth sure I share, I of God's goodnesse never will despaire.

I'le turne to him, and in those words will pray Within this whale, what God indites I'le say

By reason of my trouble, I to God who heard me cry'd,
Out of hell's belly did I cry,
Thou heard'st my voice, I cry'd.

For thou hast cast me in the deepe, in midst ev'n of the sea, Floods compast me, thy billowes all, and waves past over me.

[Here follow, in the same common measure, seven verses more of pretty literal translation from Jonah 11. 1-9.]

Above all Gods O Lord thou dost excell,
I hope thou'lt free me from this paunch of Hell,
And that thou wilt this monster now command,
That it disgorge me out upon the land.
O draw me out of this my moving cave,
And bring thy Jonah from this living grave,
O heare my prayers from this darksome place,
I with my teares flee to thy throne of grace

It was inevitable that such poor doggerel should be parodied by still worse, especially on the part of writers desiring, like Samuel Colvill in The Whitgg's Supplication (1681), to throw ridicule on the Presbyterian clergy. And it is by the parodies falsely credited to him that poor Zachary is commonly remembered in Scotland to this day. Thus Colvill made Boyd deliberately put on record.

There was a man called Job
Dwelt in the land of Uz,
He had a good gift of the gob,
The same case happen us!

Another part of Job's story was declared to be

Job's wife said to Job,
Curse God and die
O no, you wicked scold,
No, not I

Of Jacob, they put into Boyd's mouth this version

And Jacob made for his wee Josie,
A tartan coat to keep him cosic,
And what for no? there was nae harm
To keep the lad baith saft and warm

Boyd's manuscripts are in the library of Glasgow University See the biographical notice prefixed to Neil's reprint of four of the poems from Zion's Flovers (1855)

Robert Baillie was born at Glasgow in 1599, and educated at the university of that city 1622 he received Episcopal ordination, and was shortly after presented to the parish of Kilwinning In 1637 he refused to preach in favour of Laud's service-book, in 1638 sat in the famous General Assembly of Glasgow, in 1639 served as chaplain in the Covenanting army at Duns Law, and in 1640 was selected to go to London, with other commissioners, and draw up charges against Archbishop Laud On his return to Scotland in 1642 he was appointed joint-professor of Divinity at Glasgow In 1643 he was again sent to London as a delegate to the Westminster Assembly, and in 1649 was chosen by the Church to proceed to Holland and invite Charles II to accept the Covenant and crown of Scotland He performed his mission skilfully, and after the Restoration was made Principal of Glasgow University A competent scholar, he corresponded (in Latin) with Voetius and other Continental scholars, and was master of thirteen languages, including Arabic and Ethiopic. His affectionate letters to Sharp showed that, even till after the 'great renunciation' had actually been accomplished, he refused to believe in the future archbishop's treachery to the Presbyterian A representative of all that was best and most temperate in the Covenanting Church of his age, he died July 1662 His Letters and Journals, edited by David Laing (3 vols Bannatyne Club, 1841-42), give a vivid picture of Scotland—political, ecclesiastical, academical, domestic-in a most confused and distracting time of feud, faction, and civil war, and his record of the Westminster Assembly and its proceedings is very valuable. He wrote in a Scotch which was very nearly provincial English, with many Scotticisms and not a few Scotch words His first letter from London in 1640 to his wife at Kilwinning describes Strafford's first appearance before the Long Parliament

I know thow does now long to hear from me. I wrote to thee on Saturday was eight days from Durham day we went to Darntoun, where Mr Alexander Henderson and Mr Robert Blair did preach to us on Sonday At supper, on Sonday, the post with the Great Seall of England for our safe conduct, came to us, with the Earle Bristol's letter to Lowdoun, intreating us to make haste On Monday we came, before we lighted, to Boroubrig, twentie fyve myles On Tuesday we rode three short posts, Ferribrig, Toxford, and Duncaster There I was content to buy a bobin wastcoat. On Wednesday we came ane other good journey to Newwark on Trent, where we caused Dr Moyslie sup with us On Thurs day we came to Stamfoord, on Fryday to Huntingtown, on Saturday to Ware, where we rested the Sabbath, and heard the minister, after we were warned of the ending of the service, preach two good sermons On Monday morning we came that tuentie myle to London before sun ryseing, all weell, horse and men, as we could wish, diverse merchands and their servants with us, on httle naigs, the way extreamlie foule and deep, the journies long and continued, sundrie of us unaccustomed with travell, we took it for God's singular goodness that all of us were so preserved, none in the companie held better out than I and my man, and our little noble naigs From Killwinning to London I did not so much as stumble this is the fruit of your prayers. I was also all the way full of courage, and comforted with the sense of God's presence with my spirit. We were by the way great expences, their inns are all like palaces, no marvell they extors their guests for three incalls, course enough, we would pay, together with our horses, sixteen or seventeen pound Sterling Some three dish of creevishes, like little partans, two and fourty shillings Sterling Our lodgeings here were taken in the common garden Rothes, Mr Archbald Johnstoun in one, Dumfermling, Mr Alexander Hendersoun in one, the three Barrouns in one, the three Burgesses in one, Lowdoun, whom we expect this night, in a fifth, where Mr Blair hes a chamber, I another, our men a third our house mails everie week above eleven pound Sterling. The Citie is desyreous we should lodge with them, so, to morrow I think we must flitt.

All things here goes as our heart could wish. The Lieutenant of Ireland came bot on Monday to toun late, on Tuesday rested, on Wednesday came to Parliament, bot ere night, he was caged. Intollerable pryde and oppression cryes to Heaven for a vengeance. The Lower House closed their doores, the Speaker keeped the keyes till his accusation was concluded. Thereafter, Mr Pym went up, with a number at his back, to the Higher House, and, in a prettie short speech, did, in name of the Lower House, and in name of the Commons of all Eng land, accuse Thomas Earle of Strafford, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, of high treasone, and required his person to be arreisted till probation might be heard So Pym and his back were removed, the Lords began to consult on that strange and unexpected motion The word goes in haste to the Lord Lieutenant, where he was with the King with speed he comes to the House, he calls rudelie at the doore, James Maxwell, keeper of the Black Rod, opens, his Lordship, with a proud glouming countenance, makes towards his place at the boordhead bot at once manie bids him void the House, so he is forced in confusion to got to doore till he was called After consultation, being called in, he stands, bot is commanded to kneell, and, on his knees, to hear the sentence Being on his knees, he is delyvered to the keeper of the Plack Rod, to be prisoner till he was cleared of these crymes the House of Commons did charge him with offered to speak, bot was commanded to be gone without In the outer roome James Maxwell required him, as prisoner, to deliver his sword, when he had gotten it, he cryes, with a loud voyce, for his man to carric my Lord Lieutenant's sword This done, he makes through a number of people towards his contch, all gazzing, no man capping to him, before whom that morning the greatest of England would have stood discovered all crying, What is the matter? He said, A small matter I warrand yow! They replyed, Yes indeed, high treason is a small matter! Coming to the place where he expected his coatch, it was not there, so he behooved to returne that same way through a world of gazeing people. When at last he had found his coatch, and was entering, James Maxwell told him, Your Lord ship is my prisoner, and must got in my coatch, so he behooved to doe ... l or some dayes too manie went to visit him, bot since, the Parliament has commanded his keeping to be straiter Pursevants were dispatched to Ireland, to open all the ports, and to proclaime that all who had grievances might come over, also to fetch over Sir George Ratcliffe, who will be caused to depone manie The chief is, his intention with the Irish armic, and so manie as the King could make, to fall on the I nglish lords, who are the countrie way, his cruell monopolies, whereby he sucked up, for his own use, the whole substance of Ireland My Lord Montnoris, Sir John Clatworthie, the Chancellor, hes been chief informers The King was much commoved, the Mar queis, by the deliverie of Pym his speech, did somewhat calme him The Parliament of Ireland is sitting a remonstrance from them, without ame knowledge of things done here, came this day to the King, which, they say, has calmed him much, and turned his minde somewhat from the Deputie

We were extreamlie welcome here The Parliament hes granted ane hundred thousand pound Sterling, whereof we shall have near fourtie in present money, to pay our armic six weekes, without prejudice to exact what, according to our bargain, is more due to us from the four shyres. Burton, I hear, is come to toun, Bustwick and Prin are coming, as they were sent for, Lightoun has been twyce heard, and on I ryday, is hoped, sall be absolved. I incolne, on Saturday, did sitt in Parliament, and his petition, to have his cause discussed in Parliament, received. The King, in his first speech, did call us rebels, bot much murmuring being at that style, he thought good, two dayes thereafter, to make a speech to excuse that phrase, and to neknowledge us his subjects, to whom he had sent his Great Seall, and with whom he was in treatie, to settle a perfect agreement, with their consent and approbation

On Luysday list was here a fast. Mr Blur and I preached to our commissioners at home, for we had no cloathes for outgoing. Mame ministers used greater freedome than ever here was heard of Episcopacie it self beginning to be cryed down, and a Covenant cried up, and the Liturgie to be scorned. The Toun of I ondon, and a world of men, minds to present a petition, which I have seen, for the abolition of Bishops, Deanes, and all their apertcanances. It is thought good to delay it till the Parliament have pulled down Canterburie and some prime Bishops, which they minde to doe so soon as the King has a little digested the bitterness of his I ieutenant's censure. Hudge things are here in working The mighty hand of God be about this great work! We hope this shall be the joyfull harvest of the teares that thir manie yeares hes been sawin in thir kingdomes here are wearse of Bishops This day a committee of ten noblemen, and three of the most innocent Bishops, Carlile, Salisburie, Winchester, are appointed to cognosce by what meanes our pacification was broken, and who advysed the King, when he had no money, to enter in warre without consent of his State. We hope all shall goe weell above our hopes. I hope they will not neglect me, prayer is our best help for albeit all things goes on here above our expectation, yet how soone, if God would but wink, might the devill, and his manifold in struments here watching, turn our hopes in fear! When we are most humble, and dependant on God, whose hand alone has brought this great work to the present passe, we are then most safe. This day I have heard that Conterburie hes ane Apologic at the presse, if it be so, at once I will have more to doc

Darnton Derntonn, &c., are contracted forms of Darlington, erceushes is one of many former English spellings of erayfish, all derived from the old French word now spelt tereusses, partons in Scotch for crabs, the Marquess is the Marques of Hamilton, Lightonn, Archbishop Leighton and Canterbure, Archbishop Land

William Lithgow, born at Lanark in 1582, had already visited the Shetlands, Bohemia, Switzerland, &c, when, in 1610, he set out on foot from Paris to Palestine and Egypt His second tramp (1614-16) led him through North Africa from Tunis to Fez, and home by way of Hungary and In his last journey (1619-21) to Spain viâ Ircland he was seized as a spy at Miliga and tortured At London, Gondomar, the Spanish am bassador, promised him reparation, but contented himself with promising So Lithgow assaulted, or by another account was assaulted by, him in the king's anteroom, for which he was clapped into the Marshalsea. He died it Lanirk, perhaps in 1645 He claimed to have wilked more than 36,000 miles, and was as Protestant as he was greedy of money His interesting but euphuistic Rare Adventures and Paineful Peregrinations was published in a complete form in 1632 (12th ed 1814), incompletely in 1614 Besides he wrote The Stage of Breda (1637), Siege of Newcastle (1645), Poems (ed. by Mudment, 1863), &c Lithgow, like the Earls of Ancrum and Stirling and Drummond of Hawthornden, belonged to the first generation of Scotsmen who wrote, or aimed to write, English rather than the contemporary form of Scotch

Sicilian Duellists

And now having followed the Italian saying St me, her a s'ar so'o come mala accompani to [sie']. It is better for a man to be alone than in ill company, I traversed the kingdome to Trapundie [Trapani], seeking transportation for Africke, but could get none, and returning thence overthwart the iland, I call to memory being lodged in the bourge of Saramutza belonging to a young baron, and being bound the way of Castello Francko, eight miles distant and appertaining to another young noble youth, I rose and marched by the breach of day, where it was my lucke, half way from either towne, to find both these beardlesse barons lying dead and new killed in the fields, and their horses standing tyed to a bush beside them, whereat being greatly moved, I approached them, and perceiving the bodies to be richly cled with silken stuffes, facily [facilely, easily] conjectured what they might be, my host having told me the former night that these two barones were at great discord about the love of a young noble woman, and so it was for they had fought the combat for her sake, and for their own For as fire is to gunpowder, pride lay slaine here so is ambition to the heart of man, which, if it be but touched with selfe love, mounteth aloft and never bendeth downward till it be turned into ashes. here it proved, for that ladies sake, that troppo amore turned to presto dolore Upon which sight, to speake the truth, I searched both their pockets, and found their two silken purses full loaden with Spanish pistolls, whereat my heart sprung for joy, and taking five rings off their foure hands, I hid them and the two purses in the ground, half a mile beyond this place, and returning againe, leaped to one of their horses, and came galloping back to Saramutza, where, calling up my host, I told him the accident, who, when he saw the horse, gave a shout for sorrow, and running to the castle, told the lady the Baron's mother, where, in a moment, she, her children, and the whole town, runne all with me to the place, some cled, some naked, some on footte, and some on horse, where when come, grievous was it to behold their woful and sad lamentations thus seeing them all mad and distracted of their wits with sorrow, left them without good night, and coming to my treasure, made speedy way to Castello Francko, where bearing them the like news, brought them all to the like distraction and flight of feet.

Ireland in 1619

I remember I saw in Irelands North-parts two re markable sights. The one was their manner of tillage, ploughs drawne by horse tayls, wanting garmshing, they are only fastened with straw or wooden ropes to their bare rumps, marching all side for side, three or foure in a ranke, and as many men hanging by the ends of that untoward labour It is as bad a husbandry, I say, as ever I found among the wildest savages alive, for the Cara mins, who understand not the civill form of agriculture, yet they delve, hollow, and turn over the ground with manuall and wooden instruments but they the Irish have thousands of both kingdomes daily labouring beside them, yet they can not learne, because they will not learne, to use garnishing, so obstinate they are in their barbarous consuetude, unless punishment and penalties were inflicted, and yet most of them are content to pay twenty shillings a yeare, before they wil change their custome.

The other as goodly-sight I saw was women travayling or toyling at home, carry their infants about their necks and laying their dugges over their shoulders, would give sucke to the babes behinde their backes, without taking them in their armes. Such kind of breasts, me thinketh, were very fit to be made money bags for East or West-

Indian merchants, being more than halfe a yard long, and as well wrought as any tanner, in the like charge, could ever mollific such leather

As for any other customes they have, to avoyd pro haitie I spare, onely before my pen fice over seas I would gladly shake hands with some of our churchmen there, for better are the wounds of a friend, than the sweet smile of a flatterer, for love and trueth cannot dis semble. Many dissembling impudents intrude themselves in this high calling of God, who are not trucky neither worthily thereunto called, the ground here arising either from a carnall or carelesse presumption, otherwise from needy, greedy, and lacke of bodily maintenance Such is now the corruption of time, that I know here even mechanick men admitted in the place of pastors, yea, and rude bred souldiers, whose education was at the musket-mouth, are become there both Lybian, grave, and unlearned church men Nav, besides them [un]professed, indeed professed schollers whose warbling mouthes, ingorged with spoonefuls of bruised Latine, seldonie or never expressed, unless the force of quaffing spew it forth from their empty sculles, such, I say, interclude their doctrine between the thatch and the church walls tops, and yet their smallest stipends shall amount to one, two, three, or foure hundred pounds a year

Whereupon you may demand mee, how spend they, or how deserve they this? I answer, Their deserts are nought, and the fruite thereof as naughtily spent, for sermons and prayers they never have any, neither never preached any, nor can preach. And although some could, as perhaps they seeming would, they shall have no auditour (as they say) but bare walls, the plants of their parishes being the rootes of mere. Insh. As concerning their carrage in spending such sacrilegious fees, the course is thus

The alehouse is their church, the Irish priests their consorts, their auditors be, Fill and fetch more, their text Spanish sack, their prayers carrousing, their singing of psalmes the whiffing of tobacco, their last blessing aqua vita, and all their doctrine sound drunkenness. And whensoever these parties meete, their parting is Dane like, from a Dutch pot, and the minister still purse bearer, defrayeth all charges for the priest ments of religion, like Podolian Polonians, they succumbe, their conference only pleading mutuall forbearance, the minister affrayed of the priests' wood carnes, and the priests as fearfull of the minister's apprehending or denoting them, contracting thereby a Gibconized covenant, yea, and for more submission's sake, hee will give way to the priest to mumble masse in his church, where in all his life he never made prayer nor sermon.

Loe there are some of the abuses of our late weak and stragling ecclesiasticks there, and the soule sunke sorrow of godless epicures and hypocrites. To all which, and much more, have I been an ocular testator, and sometimes a constrained consociat to their companeonry, yet not so much inforced, as desirous to know the behaviour and conversation of such mercenary Jebusites Great God amend it, for it is a great pity to behold it, and if it continue so still, as when I saw them last, O farre better it were, that these ill bestowed tythes, and church wall rents, were distributed to the poore and needy, than to suffocate the swine fed bellies of such idle and prophane parasites

And here another general abuse I observed, that whensoever any Irish dye, the friend of the defunct (besides other fccs) paying twenty shillings to the English curate, shall get the corpse of the deceased to be buried within the church, yea often even under the pulpit foot, and for lucre interred in God's sanctuary when dead, who, when alive, would never approach nor enter the gates of Sion, to worshipe the Lord, nor conforme themselves to true religion. Truely such, and the like abuses, and evill examples of lewd lives, have been the greatest hinderance of that land's conversion, for such, like wolves, have been from time to time but stumbling blocks before them, regarding more their own sensuall and licentious ends, than the glory of God, in converting of one soul unto his church

Now as concerning the unconscionable carriage of the Hybernian clergy, ask mee, and there my reply As many of them (for the most part) as are Protestant ministers have their wives, children, and servants in vested Papists, and many of these church men at the houre of their death, like dogges return back to their Witness the late Viccar of Calin (be former vomit longing to the late and last Richard Larl of Desmond, who being on his deathbed, and having two hundred pounds a year, finding him selfe to forsake both life and stipend, sent strught for a Romish priest, and received the Papall sacrament confessing freely in my audience that he had been a Romane Catholick all his life, dissembling onely with his religion for the better muntaining of his wife and children And being brought to his buriall place, he was interred in the church, with which he had played the ruffian all his life, being openly carried at mid-day with Jesuits, priests, and friers of his own nation, and after a contemptible manner, in derision of our profession and lawes of the kingdoin

Elsewhere in his travels he has described the Caramins as a tribe of savage Lybians in the north of Africa, hence Lybian applied to the Irish clergy is uncomplimentary. And in his sojourn in Poland, he has explained what the inhabitants of the province of Podolia had suffered from their next neighbours, the heathen Fartars. Wood carnes, wild Irish Lernes.

John Barclay, author of the Argenis, was born in 1582, at Pont-'t- Yousson, in Lorraine, where his father, a Scotsman, was professor of Law Owing, it is said, to persecution on the part of the Jesusts, he came with his father to England about 1603, and either in that year or two years later he published his Euphormionis Satyricon, a politicosatirical romance, chiefly directed against the Jesuits, supplements to which were the second part (1607), the Apologia (1611), and the Icon Antmorum (1614) In 1616 he left England and went to Rome, where he died, a good Catholic, in In the same year appeared his Argenis, according to Cowper 'the best romance that ever was written' It was written in Latin, and was translated into French, Spanish, Italian, Dutch, Polish, &c There are three English versions, besides one entered at Stationers' Hall by Ben

Jonson in 1623, but never published. published was by Le Grys and May in 1628, the last was by Clara Recve in 1772 It resembles the Arcadia in its romantic adventures, the Utopia in its discussion of political problems, and, a seventeenth - century roman a clef, under disguised names and circumstances reviews the events and personages of European history during the later half of the sixteenth century. The story of the loves of Polyarchus and Argenis is really i political allegory, containing clever allusions to the state of Europe, more particularly of Ir ince during the time of the League, to Queen Elizabeth, Henri IV, and Philip II It influenced I'cnelon's Télémaque, may be said to have led the way to Calprenede, Scudery, and Madame de la Fayette, and has merited the admiration of readers as dissimilar as Richelieu, Leibnitz, and Coleridge See Dupond, L'Argénis de Barclai (1875)

Arthur Johnston (or Jonston, Latinised Jonstonus, c 1587-1641), remarkable among Scotsmen, along with George Buchanan, as a writer of Latin poetry who attained to European reputation Born at Caskieben, near Aberdeen, he studied at Aberdeen, graduated in medicine at Padui (1610), and resided for about twenty years in France. On his return to Britain he obtained the patronage of Archbishop Laud, was appointed physician to Charles I, and became rector of King's College, Aberdeen He wrote Latin clegies and epigrams, a paraphrase of the Song of Solomon, a collection of short poems (published in 1637) entitled Musa Aulicæ, and (his greatest work) a complete version of the Psalms He also edited and contributed to the Deliciæ Poetarum Scotorum, Litin poems by various Scottish authors In Hallam's opinion 'The Scots certainly wrote Latin with a good cir and considerable elegance of phrase inclined to think that Johnston's Psalms, all of which are in elegiac inetre, do not fall short of those of Buchanan, either in clegince of style or correctness of Latinity' Sir William Geddes is content to rank Johnston after, but close to, his great countryman. Editing a collection of the writers of Latin verse in Aberdeen, especially during the reigns of James I and Charles I - the period when such verse was in Scotland the normal and recognised vehicle of poetic expression'-Sir Willium accounts Johnston as foremost 'of a cultured group of scholars such as no other city in Scotland, or even in the British Isles, could match at the period when they appeared?

Principal Sir William Goddes edited a magnifice it edit on of the works of Johnston for the New Spilding Club (1998) 410, 10,205, in the Wina Latina Perdo ensity.

THE BALLADS SCOTTISH AND ENGLISH

BALLAD is, in ordinary use, a term for any narrative poem, usually in the simple measure of which a notable example is

Lord William was buried in St Mary's kirk, Ludy Margret in Mary's quire, Out o' the lady's grave grew a bonny red rose, And out o' the knight's a briar

Such poems may be written in the most civilised ages, by the most cultivated authors-by Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, or Sir Charles Hanbury But these and similar compositions Williams are mere mimicries of what is more technically styled the ballad - the narrative lolks lied, or popular tale in verse. Every Volks-lied, of course, or traditional poem is not a narrative ballad, it may be a personal lyric, or a begging song (quîte), as in our songs of the Hogmanay season, the ancient Rhodian swallow song, and many French examples The word 'ballad,' then, is here used for a traditional and popular narrative poem, usually of unknown authorship

The sources whence we derive the Scottish and English ballads may be either printed books, or broadsheets, or manuscripts, or oral tradition Very old printed sources of certain ballads exist. 'A Gest of Robyn Hode' may be 'anywhere from 1492 to 1534, the year of the death of Wynkyn de Worde,' the printer Even after the renovations of printers and reciters, 'a considerable number of Middle English forms remain,' and Professor Child conceived that 'the little epic' may have been 'put together' (out of ballads) 'as early as 1400, or There are no firm grounds on which to base an opinion' Nothing is certainly known as to the date of Robin Hood himself, if he was a In Piers Plowman (c. 1377) Sloth real character says that he knows rhymes of Robin Hood better than his paternoster. It is not, then, perhaps, too arbitrary to regard Robin Hood ballads as a popular genre, and of considerable antiquity, in the middle of the fourteenth century, though the ballads as extant are later Printed as early as the end of the fifteenth century, ballads continued to be published and hawked about, as by Shakespeare's Autolycus, to clowns who 'loved ballads but even too well' Many of these would be modern, things written on public events and prodigies by persons of the lowest literary standing would be really ancient traditional ballads, of unknown date and authorship Collections of the broadsheets were made by amateurs, as by Mr Pepys, and there were manuscript collections, such as the famous folio edited with elegance by Bishop Percy, and with accuracy by Mr Furnivall eighteenth century saw the collections of Allan Ramsay, Herd, Pinkerton, and others (the editors often altering at will, except Ritson and, probably, Herd), while the inineteenth century opened with Scott's Border Muistrelsy, followed by Motherwell, Buchan, Jamieson, Kinloch, and others Foreign savants have also made vast collections in almost every European land, and to these have been added gatherings out of Asiatic and savage regions

The authorship of the traditional ballads has been matter of controversy The present writer's contribution on ballads to the Encyclopædia Britannica was written in 1875, and has been criticised by Mr 7 F Henderson in Scottish Vernacular Literature (1898) Space does not afford room for a reply, nor is it necessary to specify the modifications which are here made in the older We must begin by discriminating between at least three classes (1) The historical ballads of relatively modern date, such as 'The Bonny Earl o' Moray' and 'The Queen's Marie,' which cannot be earlier than the reigns of James VI and Mary Stuart respectively (2) Such ballads as 'The Boy and the Mantle,' 'King Arthur and King Cornwall,' and 'The Marriage of Sir Gawain' Concerning these, Professor Child says that they 'are clearly not of the same rise, and not meant for the same ears, as' the ballads in his first volume 'They would come down by professional rather than domestic tradition, through ministrels rather than knitters and weavers' Thus Professor Child distinguishes between ballads chanted by professional minstrels and ballads chanted by the populace for the populace As to the authorship of the ballads of professional minstrels, it was more or less literary 'The Boy and the Mantle' implies knowledge of a romance extant in three MSS of the thirteenth century, a piece translated into Norse prose in 1217-63 The data occur in 'Perceval le Gallois' of the second half of the twelfth century, and also in the Welsh Triads These data, briefly, are magical tests of chastity, and one of them is as old as an Egyptian popular tale recounted by Herodotus (11 111) Such magical tests are, of course, in origin purely popular, or even savage, but the setting and circumstances of this ballad are literary, being directly derived from the early mediæval Arthurian From the same sources, and with adaptations from a chanson de geste of Charlemagne's voyage to Jerusalem, come 'Sır Gawaın's Marriage' and 'King Arthur and King Cornwall' There are in these pieces popular data of worldwide diffusion, such as impossible feats to be performed under peril of death, but the source of the ballads, as they stand, is literary they are based on romances widely circulated in manuscript. Some lowly professional immstrel was doubtless the author of ballads in this category

The third class is more puzzling it is the large class of traditional bailed narrative poems, such as 'The Elfin Knight,' 'Riddles,' 'Willie's Lady,' 'Young Tamlane,' and very many others fessor Child does not attribute the diffusion of these to professional minstrels, and their data are popular, and underived (as in the second class) from known romances What marks them as popular is their wonderfully wide diffusion, their close resemblance to prose Marchen (which are found all over the world, and are certainly not of literary authorship), with their folklore incidents, based on universal superstitions and Despite their general uniformity and common character, these ballads occur in numerous variants, fragments of one being embedded in another, after the manner of Marchen, so that it is not possible to discover any one absolutely original form and type. This is the natural result of centuries of oral tradition, reciters had omitted, iltered, transposed, modified, and modernised the language, introduced modern details of weapons. costume, and the like Consequently, though there must have been an original author-literary or popular, amateur or professional - of each ballid, his date and name and condition remain unknown these ballads as they exist are popular patchwork. As they exist they are the work of this, that, and the other maker and reciter things fishioned by men of the people for the people, and by the people altered into scores of In some cases a prose tale has been versified, in others, fragments of prose alternating with verse leave dubious the original shape, whether verse or prose, or a medley of both, as in 'Aucassin and Nicolete,' and in many East African ballad stories (see Motherwell, 'Young Berchan and Susy Pie,' Minstrelsy, 1827, p 15, and Steere's Swalult Tales, 1870, p 7) in this sense that the so-called 'communistic' source of certain ballids is to be understood, in this sense they were made 'by the people, for the people' They stand on much the same footing is the Marchen or popular tales of the world, to which no one dreams of assigning a professional or literary origin, for they are found in countries where there is no literature and no class of professional narrators or poets From these tales the ballads only vary by the vehicle of verse The date when they were first circulated in one kind of verse or another is not to be ascertained, though the familiar ballad measure is not certainly known to be older than the early fifteenth century

The objection that the people does not versify applies only to the modern populate of civilised Europe. Mr Henderson says that 'the heart of the people—is now, and probably ever was, wholly untrained in the art of poetical expression'. This opinion is based on neglect of popular and savage literature. That the people does compose in poetry, from the Australian, African, and American tribes to the Gypsies of Spain and the Finns, is matter of indisputable The sagas prove the same fact for certainty the Scandinavian race, and very old I rench writers speak of purely popular dittics on Roland That the peasantry of early medieval Scotland and England were inerprishe of what the peasants of modern Greece can do, or could do at the time of the War of Independence, it is hard to They certainly preserved, recited, altered, mingled, and modernised ballads which are full of universal popular ideas and situations—ballads which are merely popular Marchen in rhymc These processes of popular alteration and combination lasted, historically, at least till the end of the seventeenth century, as is proved by the numerous variants of the 'Queen's Maric,' bised, with great departure from fact, on an historical incident of 1563. It is true that Professor Child regarded this as one of the latest of all ballads, and based, not on a tragedy of the court of Mary Stuart, but on an event of 1719 at the court of Peter the Great The present writer, by arguments published in Blackwood's Magazine (vol clviii), was fortunate enough to alter Professor Child's theory, as he was so kind as to state in a private letter Mr Henderson also accepts (as regards the date and place of the events out of which this ballad arose) the arguments which thus influenced Professor Child

The theory of the large popular share in the origin and development of many ballids has its adversary in the hypothesis that most billads are degraded adaptations, by professional minstrels, of literary chansons de geste (heroic early mediaval French epics) and of literary lays and romances Scott himself wrote, as regards 'Lord Thomas and Fur Annie,' that, in his opinion, 'the further our researches are extended, the more we shall see ground to believe that the romantic ballads of later times are, for the most part, abridgments of the ancient metrical romances, narrated in a smoother stanza and a more modern lan-This corresponds with Scott's theory that Marchen are the residuum of higher and more literary mights, whereas many mights are Marchen organised and decorated by literary art, as in the Odyssey and the Argonautica

Akm to Scott's is the view of Professor Courthope, who writes, in his History of English Poetry (1 445). 'A vague idea prevails that, as the balled is before all things popular in its character, it was evolved in some mysterious way out of the genius and traditions of the people themselves. But this was by no means the case. What the people contributed to the making of the balleds was no more than the taste and sentiment which characterise them.' And that is conceding a great deal. Mr. Henderson says. In many ways the ballads bring us into immediate contact with the antique, pagan, savage, superstitious, elemental characteristics of our race' If these characteristics are not 'popular,' not 'primitive,' what can be called primitive and But Mr Henderson seems to regard these characteristics as merely carried on from 'old forgotten romances,' which (though certainly composed by men of letters in full mediæval Christianity) somehow 'embalm the sentiments, passions, beliefs, forms of thought, and imaginative wonder and dread of our pagan ancestors' What romances do all this? To do this is the function of the Folk, not of mediæval romancers Mr Courthope goes on 'They preserved them, it is true, in their memories, after they had been composed, but the matter not less than the form of the poem was, as a rule, furnished exclusively by the minstrel, who adapted the ancient traditions of the art, originally intended to please the tribal chieftain, or the feudal lord, to the temper of a popular audience.

The English ballads that have come down to us fall naturally into three classes those which reflect the characteristics of the ancient chanson de geste, those which combine the features of the chanson de geste and the literary romance, and those which have a purely literary origin in the romance, lay, or fablian' Mr Courthope chooses 'The Battle of Otterburn' as an example of his first class, the Robin Hood ballads of the second, and in the third set he places 'Sir Aldingar,' 'Sir Cauline,' 'Earl Brand,' 'Child Waters,' and the In all these classes are 'plain traces of decline from a more ancient and nobler model' 'As an almost invariable rule, the ballad, when composed in the first place for the purposes of amusement, reproduces, in a mould peculiar to itself, the subject-matter of the older gests, romances, or lays The tales on which it is founded are rarely, if ever, the legacy of long oral tradition ' Again 'The ballad was usually a pricis ' Mr Gregory Smith also 'must of a romance. consider the ballad as part of the literary débris of the Middle Ages' (The Transition Period, p. 186)

We have already remarked on a few samples of that class of ballads which may be regarded as précis of literary romances or chansons de geste But the matter even of these is 'the legacy of oral tradition,' as Professor Child shows, contrary to the opinion of Mr Courthope, whose chapter on ballads does not display any special acquaintance with the comparative study of the world's ancient, traditional, and popular narratives in verse and prose. The fictitious literature, in prose or verse, of the Middle Ages is, we maintain, like the epics of Homer, really based throughout on popular tales, much older, and much more widely diffused, than written manuscripts Often the professional and literary poet borrows, like Homer and the authors of the chansons de geste and the romances, from popular tales peculiar to no race of mankind. Occasionally the authors of ballads for the people have 'taken back their own' (as Molière said) from the hands of the professional literary class.

In perhaps more numerous cases the popular ballad does not 'reproduce, in a mould peculiar to itself, the subject-matter of the older gests, romances, or lays' The ballad-maker works on the original data of world-wide popular tradition Thus Professor Child writes (1 98) 'The idea of the love-animated plants has been thought to be derived from the romance of Tristan, where it also occurs, agreeably to a general principle, somewhat hastily assumed, that when romances and popular ballads have anything in common, priority belongs to the romances? Courthope's principle, but too often it contains the reverse of the truth The popular Marchen on which the Odyssey is based are found all over the world, and cannot have been derived by savages and peasants from the Odyssey, which Homer wove, as Fenelon remarks, out of old wives' Thus, while old literature has borrowed from popular fancy, popular fancy now reclaims its own from literature, now works on original data There is not, as that literature has neglected Mr Courthope holds, anything 'mysterious' in this theory, beyond the unsolved mystery of the remote origin and evolution of popular tales, and their wide Given the regular stock of the incidents of Marchen, and given the primitive ideas and customs on which they rest, any member of the people, illiterate but poetical, could turn these data into rhyme. No professed literary man was needed. Once composed and chanted, the ballad became the property of the people, and was altered to taste by reciters, and broken into a crowd of variants. Nothing, of course, prevented a professed minstrel, or the author of the legend of a saint, from making prize either of the original data or of the ballad, and if the minstrel did so, his poem, in turn, might be corrupted and altered by popular reciters

There has, in fact, been a come and go of popular data, of literary handling, and of degradation, especially notable in Cruikshank's 'Loving Ballad of Lord Bateman,' a cockney variant of a ballad really ancient, and of a still older legend (see Child's variants under 'Young Beichan') The two schools of opinion-the popular, as represented here, and the literary, as represented by Mr Courthope - have both right on their The process favoured by Mr Courthope —namely, the popularisation of literary romances and chansons de geste-did exist But these literary works were themselves elaborations of popular traditions, and in many cases the popular ballad author seems to have worked on popular materials, unhelped by any literary handling of them. good example of the process is afforded by the familiar contes or popular tales of Charles Perrault, 'Cinderella,' and the rest. They were gathered by Perrault, under Louis XIV, from oral tradition, and were recast by him into literary shape. But his literary handling has hardly affected the surviving oral and popular forms of the same tales, as current either in France or other countries, European,

African, or Asiatic On the other hand, French popular tales have been adapted to their own habits and minners by Rcd Indians, just as some ballad-makers adapted literary romances to popular taste

One or two examples of ballads apparently quite popular in origin may be given. Thus we have Professor Child's first ballad, 'Riddles Wisely Expounded.' A girl lies with a knight, and then asks him to marry her He will do so if she can answer certain riddles, and she succeeds idea is as old, and as popular, as the story of Samson or of Œdipus, and the riddles (devinettes) are of the kind familiar to Basutos and Fijians They can be made the pivot of any sort of Marchen, and the Marchen may, anywhere, be turned into verse—as it is among Celts, Russians, Germans, No literary intervention is required and Scots A similar donnée (in 'The Elfin Knight') occurs in the Irish saga of 'Graidhne and Diarmaid,' but not thence did it find its way into the Gesta Romanorum, a literary work which, again, can hardly be the source of the Turkish variant, the Magyar, the Sanskrit, or the Tibetan The Gesta may, conceivably, be the source of our ballad, but the data of the Gesla were contributed by popular 'Lady Isabel,' again, is of wonderfully wide distribution, and exists in mingled prose and verse. As a woman saves her own life by ingeniously slaying her would-be murderer, who has already slain several women, there is an element of the 'Bluebeard' Marchen But Professor Bugge derives the main idea from the tale of 'Judith and Holofernes' in the Apocrypha. That tale may conceivably have contributed, but is itself probably only a literary adaptation of a Marchen Holofernes is human, the villain of the ballads is an elf most there is the usual come and go of literary and popular handling and data. 'Willie's Lady' turns on a piece of popular magic as old in literature as Theocritus in Idyll ii, or as Ovid (Metam If the idea is found in a romance (and we do not know that, it is) the ballad maker need not have borrowed from the romance a notion still familiar in everyday folklore magic donnée of the 'Fairy Queen' and 'Famlane' does occur in romance, but it is also an article of worldwide popular belief The retrieval of a lover lost in Fairyland appears in the literary romance of 'Orfeo,' where the lady, not the knight as in ' \Gamlane,' is won back But the notion still persisting in Ireland, as it recently did in Scotland, there is no reason for holding that the romance of 'Orfco' suggested the ballad of 'Tamlane' On the other side, the analogous adventure of Thomas the Rhymer, in the ballad of that name, is clearly based, in part, on the literary romance of 'Ogier le Danois,' which itself, again, has a popular foundation We might illustrate, at any length, this va et-yient of the literary and popular elements In 'Tamlanc' some local poet or ın ballads reciter has added local touches The scene is Carterhaugh, where Ettrick and Yarrow meet, and in one version the Earls of Moray (Randolph) and of March are parents of the lovers. But such localisations (which are common) are not usually original parts of the story. Nor do they fix a date Randolph and the Cospatricks were well-known historical figures, and, at almost any time, might be accommodated to any romantic legend.

By a similar early accommodation does William of Malmesbury (ob 1143) tell a story of Gunhild, daughter of King Cnut, which recurs in the ballad of 'Sir Aldingar' William's version is adapted in a French metrical life of Edward the Confessor But we are not to infer that the source of the ballad is necessarily literary, for, as Professor Child remarks, 'we cannot well doubt that William of Malmesbury is citing a ballad. A ballad is known to have been made on a similar and equally fabulous adventure which is alleged in chronicle to have occurred to Gunhild's mother' Mr Courthope (vol 1 p 450) is apparently following Professor Child's historical account of the ballad of 'Sir Aldingar,' but in place of saying with Professor Child that William is 'citing a ballad,' he writes, 'William of Malmesbury perhaps derived his account from a Latin poem on the subject' He gives no reason for preferring the hypothesis of 'a Latin poem' to Professor Child's theory of a ballad as William's source Professor Child next gives analogous Marchen about illustrious ladies, running back as far as the middle of the seventh century, and suggests that this very ancient popular tale, intruded into history, 'is the root of the Scandinavian-English story' Thus 'Sir Aldingar' does not, as Mr Courthope thinks, support his theory of the literary origin of ballads and of the absence of popular data. It does precisely the reverse, it is an example of the process by which a popular fable is attached to a series of historical characters, and is finally adopted by so respectable an historian as William of Malmesbury Meanwhile the authority of Professor Child confirms our theory that, far from the literary history being the source of our ballad, a ballad is the source of the literary history in William of Malmesbury. The author of our 'Sir Aldingar' may have known and used the French 'Life of St Edward,' but the whole fable is popular and ancient. 'There is little or nothing in all these tales that can be historically authenticated, and much that is in plain contradiction with history Putting history out of the question, there is no footing firmer than air for him who would essay to trace the order of the development' Given the institution of trial by battle-a woman being represented by her champion-and given the worldwide delight in the success of weakness over strength (David and Goliath), then the data of 'Sir Aldingar' exist, and the legend is applied to many historical queens long before Gunhild Whether our 'Sir Aldingar' has borrowed literary elements or not is unimportant

There remain the historical ballads. Of these, such things as 'Kinmont Willie,' 'The Fire o'

Frendraught,' 'Edom o' Gordon,' 'The Queen's Marie,' 'The Bonny Earl o' Moray,' 'Jamie Telfer,' 'Johnnie Armstrong,' and many others cannot be earlier than the events which they celebrate, between the reign of James V and George II, when we have a ballad on Robin Oig Macgregor, a son of Rob Roy They rest on recent history, handled with fair accuracy in 'Kinmont Willie,' with romantic distortion in 'The Queen's Marie,' 'The Bonny Earl o' Moray,' 'Edom o' Gordon,' and the lost ballad on the death of the Black Knight of Liddesdale (under David II), cited by Hume of Godscroft. As to 'Johnnie Armstrong,' with its tale of royal treachery, it is probably the source of the account offered by Pitscottie and other Scottish The tendency of the ballad maker is to historians give apocryphal but romantic motives—jealousy and treachery, or revenge, as of Claverhouse for his kinsman at Drumclog-for real actions, and to exaggerate the rank of the characters the Queen's Maries is substituted for an historical waiting-maid, Darnley takes the part actually played by a French apothecary Tags and formulæ are introduced from older ballads In the famous case of 'Sir Patrick Spens,' it is impossible to say certainly what historical event, of what date, is the basis of the poem, or whether Spens or Vans is the name of the hero, if hero there was (see Mr Henderson's Vernacular Scottis Poetry, pp 'The actual name of the hero of a ballad affords hardly a presumption as to who was originally the hero' (Child), and therefore is of little or no value, in itself, as to date only another proof of the popular and mythopæic nature of the ballads as they have reached us, commonly in shapes later than the original, and altered, adapted, and interpolated by reciters Whoever made them, the populace, by scores of touches, remade them, and made them its own, as the number of variations attests

As to the literary merits of the best ballads, praise is superfluous they charm all ranks in all The vast superiority of the Scottish over the English ballads in vigour, poetic touch, and the moving of supernatural awe is the more remarkable as in literary poetry England proved no less superior to Scotland There is but one England has no rival of Burns, who represents the peasant element in song-to be sure, with the advantage of education and of familiarity with educated society But, curiously, Burns had little appreciation of the ballads as distinct from the old lyrics of his countrymen It was left for Scott, a man of gentle birth, to feel as his fathers had felt during the long centuries of war, and to recover the magnificent poetry of the men who kept the marches in old times

It is unnecessary to indicate more than one authority on the subject of ballads Professor Child, of Harvard, in his English and Scottish Popular Ballads (Houghton, Mifflin, & Co, Boston, 1883-98), has collected all known ballads, with all accessible variants, and has illustrated them with an extraordinary wealth of knowledge of many literatures It might be suggested that he had rather less than his usual knowledge in the matter of savage poetry and Marchen, and that, in criticising the historical ballads, he made insufficient use of the MS sources, and printed State papers of Scotland and England matters, and in minute local topography, he welcomed such crumbs of knowledge as fell from poor men's tables, and industriously added notes and rectifications Alas! he did not live to compose an essay on the general problems of ballad From casual remarks, of which and Marchen many have been cited, we gather that he was a moderate and judicious friend of the popular rather than of the literary theory of the origins of the ballad, while fully recognising the many cases in which the ballad, as it stands, is a popularisation of literary chansons de geste and literary romances. Professor Child accumulated at Harvard a rich library of popular literature He has erected his own enduring memorial, but to this one of his learned countrymen might add a volume on the problems of the ballad These could not be solved, nor even perceived in their proper light, till the popular literature of all ages and of all mankind, civilised, barbaric, and savage, had been collected and compared by the industry of European, Oriental, and American men of learning Literary origins can only be studied, like all other origins, in the light of a wide knowledge of the popular literature of the world, peasant, barbaric, and savage The fallacy of supposing that a rite, or myth, or custom, or belief, or romantic incident is necessarily derived from its civilised or literary counterpart, and that popular examples of the same ideas are necessarily later, borrowed, and degenerate, has long been abandoned by anthropologists, and ought not to be accepted by literary students

Several ballads which follow are taken from Scott's Border Ministrelsy. They are confessedly composed out of many variants, and patched, but they are the versions most familiarly known, and, again, all versions are patched and composite. We have no traditional ballad in its original shape Meanwhile Scott's versions are arranged by a poet, as the rest are arranged by reciters. The first is one of the longer of fifteen (more or less complete) variants given by Professor Child

Young Beichan

In London was young Beichan born,
He longed strange countries for to see,
But he was taen by a savage Moor,
Who handled him right cruellie,

For he viewed the fashions of that land, Their way of worship viewed he, But to Mahound, or Termagant, Would Beichan never bend a knee.

maid

So in every shoulder they've putten a bore, fastening
In every bore they've putten a tree, wooden shackle
And they have made him trail the wine
And spices on his fair bodie.

They've easten him in a dungeon deep, Where he could neither hear nor se., For seven years they kept him there, Till he for hunger's like to die

This Moor he had but at daughter, Her name was called Susie Pye, And every day as she took the air, Near Beichan's prison she passed by

O so it fell, upon a day
She heard voung Beichan sadly sing,
'My hounds they all go masterless,
My hawks they flee from tree to tree,
My younger brother will heir my land,
Fair England again I'll never see!'

All night long no rest she got,
Young Beichan's song for thinking on,
She's stown the keys from her father's head,
And to the prison strong is gone

And she has open'd the prison doors,
I wot she open'd two or three,
Lee she could come young Beichan at,
He was locked up so curiouslic

But when she came young Beichan before, Sore wonder'd he that may to see, He took her for some fair captive,— 'Fair Lady, I pray, of what countrie?'

'O have ye any lands,' she said,
'Or castles in your own countrie,
That ye could give to a lady fair,
From prison strong to set you free?'

'Near London town I have a hall, With other eastles two or three, I'll give them all to the lady fair That out of prison will set me free'

'Give me the truth of your right hand,
I'he truth of it give unto me,
That for seven years ye'll no lady wed,
Unless it be along with me'

'I'll give thee the truth of my right hand,
The truth of it I'll freely gie,
That for seven years I'll stay unwed,
For the kindness thou dost show to me.

And she has brib'd the proud warder
Wi' mickle gold and white monie,
She's gotten the keys of the prison strong,
And she has set young Beichan free

She's gr'en him to ent the good spice cake, She's gr'en him to drink the blood red wine, She's bidden him sometimes think on her, I hat sae kindly freed him out of pine

She's broken a ring from her finger, And to Beichan half of it gave she Keep it, to mind you of that love The lady bore that set you free. 'And set your foot on good ship board, And haste ye back to your own countrie, And before that seven years have an end, Come back again, love, and marry me'

But long erc seven years had an end,
She long'd full sore her love to see,
For ever a voice within her breast
Said, 'Beichan has broke his vow to thee'
So she's set her foot on good ship board,
And turn'd her back on her own countrie

She sailed east, she sailed west, fill to fur England's shore she came,

Where a bonny shepherd she espied,
Feeding his sheep upon the plain.

'What news, what news, thou bonny shepherd?
What news hast thou to tell to me?'
'Such news I hear, ladie,' he says,
'The like was never in this countric

'There is a wedding in yonder hall,
II as lasted these thirty days and three,
Young Beichan will not bed with his bride,
For love of one that's youd the sea'

She's put her hand in her pocket, Gi'en him the gold and white monic, 'He, take ye that, my bonny boy, For the good news thou tell'st to me.'

When she came to young Berchan's gate, She tirled softly at the pin, So ready was the proud porter To open and let this lady in.

'Is this young Beichan's hall,' she said,
'Or is that noble lord within?'
'Yea, he's in the hall among them all,
And this is the day o' his weddin'

'And has he wed another love?

And has he clean forgotten me?'

And, sighin', said that gay ladie,

'I wish I were in my own countrie.'

And she has taen her gay gold ring,
That with her love she brake so free,
Says, 'Gie him that, ye proud porter,
And bid the bridegroom speak to me.'

When the porter came his lord before, He kneeled down low on his knee— 'What aileth thee, my proud porter, I hou art so full of courteste?'

'I've been porter at your gate,
It's thirty long years now and three,
But there stands a lady at them now,
The like o' her did I never see,

'For on every finger she has a ring, And on her mid finger she has three, And as mickle gold aboon her brow As would buy an earldom to me'

Its out then spak the bride's mother,
Ase and an angry woman was shee,
'Ye might have excepted our bonny bride,
And twa or three of our companie'

'O hold your tongue, thou bride's mother, Of all your folly let me be, She's ten times fairer nor the bride, And all that's in your companie

'She begs one sheave of your white bread, shave, shee But and a cup of your red wine, And to remember the lady's love, That last reliev'd you out of pine'

'O well a day' said Beichan then,
'That I so soon have married thee!
For it can be none but Susie Pye,
That sailed the sea for love of me.'

And quickly hied he down the stair, Of fifteen steps he made but three, He's ta'en his bonny love in his arms, And kist, and kist her tenderlie

'O hae ye ta'en anither bride?

And hae ye quite forgotten me?

And hae ye quite forgotten her,

That gave you life and libertie?'

She looked o'er her left shoulder,

To hide the tears stood in her e'e
'Now fare thee well, young Beichan,' she says,
'I'll try to think no more on thee'

'O never, never, Susie Pye,
For surely this can never be,
Nor ever shall I wed but her
That's done and dree'd so much for me.

borne

Then out and spak the forenoon bride,—
'My lord, your love it changeth soon,
This morning I was made your bride,
And another chose ere it be noon' chosen

'O hold thy tongue, thou forenoon bride Ye're ne'er a whit the worse for me, And when ye return to your own countrie, A double dower I'll send with thee

He's ta'en Susie Pye by the white hand, And gently led her up and down, And ay as he kist her red rosy lips, 'Ye're welcome, jewel, to your own.'

He's taen her by the milk white hand,
And led her to yon fountain stane,
He's changed her name from Susie Pye,
And he's called her his bonny love, Lady Jane

This ballad is not selected for its poetical merit, but for its curious and instructive history. A little controversy has long existed as to the authorship of a cockney ditty, 'The Loving Ballad of Lord Bateman,' published for and illustrated by George Cruikshank. The ballad or parts of it have been claimed for Dickens or Thackeray, while the same doubt exists as to the authorship of the prose notes. Happily Thackeray left, in manuscript, a version of 'Lord Bateman' which is almost verbally the same as a version lent by Lady Rosalind Northcote, taken from the recitation of a blind old woman in Devonshite. Again, the verses regarded as peculiarly Thackerayan exist in a Scots version, preserved by Child (vol 1 p 476). Thus the 'Loving Ballad' is purely popular, with cockney pronunciation indicated, and with one or two slight changes.

'The ballad story has beautiful repetitions in the ballads of other nations,' Norse, Spanish, and All turn on the forgetfulness of a lover who has loved in a far country, and the return of his lady just as he is about wedding a new love at home Now, this is the donnée of the world-wide Marchen which, in Scotland, is 'The Black Bull o' Norroway,' and the idea may even be detected in the story of Jason and Mcdea (see 'A Far travelled Tale' in the author's Custom and Myth) The donnee, then, is of unknown age and is purely popular Now, this donnée intruded itself (c 1300) into a late poetical legend of St Thomas of Canterbury, and was applied to his father, Gilbert Becket Professor Child concludes that our ballad has probably been 'affected' by the Becket form of the legend, 'but the ballad, for all that, is not derived from The legend lacks some of the main points of the stories, and the ballad, in one version or other, has them! Thus 'Young Beichan' illustrates the come and go of popular motive and literary handling, while the many variants show how generations of the people made the ballad their own The literary school of critics would, if consistent, derive the ballad forms of 'Young Beichan' from the late and literary legend of Gilbert Becket.

Jamie Telfer of the Fair Dodhead.

It fell about the Martinmas tyde,
When our Border steeds get corn and hay,
The Captain of Beweastle hath bound him to ryde.
And he's ower to Tividale to drive a prey

The first ae guide that they met wi',

It was high up in Hardhaughswire!

The second guide that they met wi',

It was high down in Borthwick Water

'What tidings, what tidings, my trusty guide?'—
'Nae tidings, nae tidings, I hae to thee,
But gin ye'll gae to the fair Dodhead,
Mony a cow's cauf I'll let thee see'

And when they cam to the fair Dodherd,
Right hastily they claim the peel,
They loosed the kye out, ane and a',
And runshackled the house right weel climbed into the tower

Now Jamie Telfer's heart was sair,
The tear 13c rowing in his be
He pled wi' the Captain to hae his gear,
Or else revenged he wad be.

The Captain turned him round and leugh, Said—'Man, there's nacthing in thy house, But ac auld sword without a sheath, Fhat hardly now would fell a mouse'—

The sun wasne up, but the moon was down,

It was the gryming of a new-fa'n snaw, sprinkling
Jamie Telfer has run ten myles a foot,

Between the Dodhead and the Stobs's Ha'

And when he cam to the fur tower sate,

He shouted loud, and cried weel hie,

Till out bespak auld Gibby Elliot—

'Whae's this that brings the fray to me?'—

'It's I, Jamie Telfer, o' the fair Dodhead, And a harried man I think I be ' There's naething left at the fair Dodhead, But a waefu' wife and bairnies three'

'Gae seek your succour at Branksome Ha',
For succour ye'se get nane frac me'
Gae seek your succour where ye paid black mail,
For, man, ye ne'er paid money to me'—

Jamie has turned him round about,
I wat the tear blinded his ec—
'I'll ne'er pay mail to Elliot again,
And the fair Dodhead I'll never see!

'My hounds may a' rin masterless, My hawks may fly frac tree to tree, My lord may grip my vassal lands, For there again maun I never be!'—

IIe has turn'd him to the Tiviot side,
E'en as fast as he could drie,
Till he cam to the Coultart Cleugh,
And there he shouted bath loud and hie.

Then up bespak him auld Jock Grieve—
'Whae's this that brings the fray to me!'
'It's I, Jamie Telfer o' the fair Dodhead,
A harried man I trow I be

'There's nacthing left in the fair Dodhead,
But a greeting wife and bairnies three,
And sax poor ca's stand in the sta', calves—stall
A' routing loud for their minnie.'— lowing—mother

'Alack a wae!' quo' auld Jock Grieve,
'Alack! my heart is sair for thee!
For I was married on the elder sister,
And you on the youngest of a' the three'

Then he has ta'en out a bonny black,
Was right weel fed with corn and hay,
And he's set Jamie Felfer on his back,
To the Catslockhill to tak the fray

And when he cam to the Catslockhill,
He shouted loud, and cried weel hie,
Till out and spak him William's Wat—
'O whae's this brings the fray to me?'—

'It's I, Jamie Telfer of the fair Dodhead, A harried man I think I be! The captain of Beweastle has driven my gear, For God's sake rise, and succour me! 'Alas for wae!' quoth William's Wat,
'Alack, for thee my heart is sair!
I never cam by the fair Dodhead,
That ever I fand thy basket bare'—

He's set his twa sons on coal black steeds, Himsell upon a freekled gray, And they are on wi' Jamie Telfer, To Branksome He' to tak the fray

And when they can to Branksome Ha',
They shouted a' batth loud and hie,
Till up and spak him auld Buccleuch,
Said—' Whae's this brings the fray to me?'—

'It's I, Jamie Telfer of the fair Dodhead, And a harried man I think I be! There's naught left in the fair Dodhead, But a greeting wife and bairnies three'—

'Alack for whe!' quoth the gude auld lord,
'And ever my heart is was for thee!

But fye gar cry on Willie, my son,
And see that he come to me speedilie!

'Gar warn the water, braid and wide,
Gar warn it sune and hastilie!
They that winna ride for Telfer's kye,
Let them never look in the face o' me!

'Warn Wat o' Harden and his sons, Wi them will Borthwick Water ride, Warn Gaudilands, and Allanhaugh, And Gilmanscleugh, and Commonside.

'Ride by the gate of Priesthaughswire, And warn the Currors o' the Lea, As ye cum down the Hermitage Slack, Warn doughty Willic o' Gorrinberry'—

The Scotts they rade, the Scotts they ran, Sae starkly and sae steadilie! And aye the ower word o' the thrang Was—'Rise for Branksome readilie!'

The gear was driven the Frostylee up, Frae the Frostylee unto the plain, Whan Willie has look'd his men before, And saw the kyc right fast drivand.

'Whae drives thir kye?' 'gan Willie say,
'To make an outspeckle o' me?' laughing stock
'It's I, the captain o' Beweastle, Willie,
I wanna layne my name for thee'— deny, hide

'O will ye let Telfer's kye gae back?
Or will ye do aught for regard o' me?
Or by the faith of my body,' quo' Willie Scott, spend my 'I'se ware my dame's cauf skin on thee!' wife a shorter

'I winn let the kye gae back, Neither for thy love, nor yet thy fear, But I will drive Jamie Telfer's kye, In spite of every Scott that's here'—

'Set on them, lads!' quo' Wilhe than,
'Fye, lads, set on them cruellie!
For ere they win to the Ritterford,
Mony a toom saddle there sall be!'—

[Then til't they gaed, wi' heart and hand,
The blows fell fast as bickering hail,
And mony a horse ran masterless,
And mony a comely cheek was pale]

But Willie was stricken ower the head,
And thro' the knapscap the sword has gane, head piece
And Harden grat for very rage,
Whan Willie on the grund lay slane

And thrice he's waved it in the air—
The Dinlay snaw was ne'er mair white
Nor the lyart locks of Harden's hair]

We'll ne'er see Teviotside aguin,
Or Willie's death revenged sall be.'

O mony a horse ran masterless,

The splinter'd lance flew on hie,
But or they wan to the Kershope ford,
The Scotts had gotten the victory

John o' Brigham there was slane, And John o' Barlow, as I heard say, And thirty mae o' the Captain's men Lay bleeding on the grund that day

The Captain was run through the thick of the thigh, And broken was his right leg bane, If he had lived this hundred years, He had never been loved by woman again.

'Hae back the kye!' the Captain said,
'Dear kye, I trow, to some they be!
For gin I suld live a hundred years,
There will ne'er fair lady smile on me.'—

Then word is gone to the Captain's bride, Even in the bower where that she lay, That her lord was prisoner in enemy's land, Since into Tividale he had led the way

'I wad lourd have had a winding sheet, rather And helped to put it ower his head, Ere he had been disgraced by the Border Scott Whan he ower Liddel his men did lead!'—

There was a wild gallant amang us a',
His name was Watty wi' the Wudspurs, Mad spurs
Cried—'On for his house in Stanegirthside,
If ony man will ride with us''

When they cam to the Stanegirthside,

They dang wi' trees, and burst the door,
They loosed out a' the Captain's kye,

And set them forth our lads before

There was an auld wife ayont the fire,

A wee bit o' the Captain's kin—

'Whae dare loose out the Captain's kye,

Or answer to him and his men?'—

'It's I Watty Wudspurs, loose the kye,
I winna layne my name frac thee'
And I will loose out the Captain's kye,
In scorn of a' his men and he.'—

Whan they cam to the fair Dodhead,

They were a wellcum sight to see!

For instead of his ain ten milk kye,

Jamie Telfer has gotten thirty and three.

And he has paid the rescue shot,
Baith wi' gowd and white monie,
And at the burial o' Wilhe Scott,
I wat was mony a weeping ec

Scott is responsible for this fine riding ballad, but probably did no more than add touches This is probable, because he here and there represents the Dodhead as being near Singlee Now, Telfer could not have covered in Ettrick in time the great distance from Singlee to Bransholme, and he would probably have applied for aid to Scott of Tushielaw and Scott of Thirlestane, his neighbours, not to Elliot of Stobs, who was very remote. In fact there is a Dodburn (and therefore a Dodhead) on the southern side of Teviot, within touch of Stobs, but Scott was obviously unaware of the fact which makes the events in the ballad possible It may therefore be inferred that he really received the ballad from tradition, had he invented it he would have made the topography plausible. No English reivers would ride on a hasty foray from the Marches to Dodhead in Ettrick Telfer would still find the kin of Jock Grieve on the old farms in Teviotdale

The Young Tamlane

'O I forbid ye, maidens a',
That we'r gowd on your hair,
To come or gae by Carterhaugh,
For young Famlane is there

'There's nane that gres by Carterhaugh,
But maun leave him a wad,
Either gowd rings or green mantles,
Or else their maidenheid.

'Now gowd rings ye may buy, maidens, Green mantles ye may spin, But gin ye lose your maidenheid, Ye'll ne'er get that agen'—

But up then spake her, fair Janet,
The fairest o' a' her kin,
'I'll cum and gang to Carterhaugh,
And ask nae leave o' him.'

Janet has kilted her green kirtle, A little abune her knee, And she has braided her yellow hair, A little abune her bree

And when she came to Carterhaugh, She gaed beside the well, And there she fand his steed standing. But awa was himsell.

She hadna pu'd a red red rose, A rose but barely three, Till up and starts a wee wee man, At lady Janet's knee Says—'Why pu' ye the rose, Janet? What gars ye break the tree? Or why come ye to Carterhaugh, Withouten leave o' me?'—

Says—' Carterhaugh it is mine ain, My daddie gave it me I'll come and gang to Carterhaugh, And ask nae leave o' thee'

He's taen her by the milk-white hand, Among the leaves sae green And what they did, I cannot tell— The green leaves were between

He's ta'en her by the milk white hand, Among the roses rcd, And what they did I cannot say— She ne'er return'd a maid

When she cam to her father's ha',

She looked pale and wan,

They thought she'd dreed some sair sickness, borne

Or been with some leman

She didna comb her yellow hair, Nor make meikle o' her head, And ilka thing that ladye took Was like to be her deid.

It's four and twenty ladies fair
Were playing at the ba',
Janet, the weightiest of them anes,
Was faintest o' them a'

Four and twenty ladies fair
Were playing at the chess,
And out there came the fair Janet,
As green as any grass

Out and spake an auld grey headed knight, Lay o'er the castle wa'—
'And ever, alas' for thee, Janet, But we'll be blamed a'!'—

'Now haud your tongue, ye auld grey knight,
And an ill deid may ye dec,
Father my bairn on whom I will,
I'll father nane on thee.'—

Out then spak her father dear,
And he spak meik and mild—
'And ever, alas! my sweet Janet,
I fear ye gae with child'—

'And if I be with child, father, Mysell maun bear the blaine, There's ne'er a knight about your ha' Shall hae the bairnie's name

'And if I be with child, father,
'Twill prove a wondrous birth,
For weel I swear I'm not wi' bairn
To any man on earth

'If my love were an earthly knight, As he's an elfin grey, I wadna gie my ain true love For nae lord that ye hae'— She prink'd hersell and prinn'd hersell, By the ac light of the moon, And she's away to Carterhaugh, To speak wi' young Tamlane

And when she cam to Carterhaugh, She gaed beside the well, And there she saw the steed standing, But away was himsell.

She hadna pu'd a double rose, A rose but only twae, When up and started young Tamlane, Says—'Lady, thou pu's nae mae!

'Why pu' ye the rose, Janet, Within this garden grene, And a' to kill the bonny babe That we got us between?'

Gloomy, gloomy, was the night,
And eiry was the way,
As fair Janet in her green mantle,
To Miles Cross she did gae

The heavens were black, the night was dark,
And dreary was the place,
But Janet stood, with eager wish,
Her lover to embrace

Betwirt the hours of twelve and one,
A north wind tore the bent,
And strught she heard strange elritch sounds,
Upon that wind which went

About the dead hour o' the night, She heard the bridles ring, And Janet was as glad o' that As any earthly thing

[Their oaten pipes blew wondrous shrill,
The hemlock small blew clear,
And louder notes from hemlock large,
And bog reed, struck the ear,
But solemn sounds, or sober thoughts,
The fairies cannot bear

They sing, inspired with love and joy, Like skylarks in the air, Of solid sense, or thought that's grave, You'll find no traces there.

Fair Janet stood, with mind unmoved, The dreary heath upon, And louder, louder wax'd the sound, As they came riding on

Will 'o Wisp before them went, Sent forth a twinkling light, And soon she saw the fairy bands All riding in her sight]

And first gaed by the black, black steed, And then gaed by the brown, But fast she gript the milk white steed, And pu'd the rider down.

She pu'd him frae the milk white steed,
And loot the bridle fa',
And up there ruse an erlish cry—
'He's won among us a'!'—

They shaped him in fair Janet's arms, An esk but and an adder, She held him fast in every shape— To be her bairn's father

This version is Scott's, a compound, as usual, of various oral or manuscript variants with some weak modern stanzas. The ideas, the winning of a mortal from Fairyland and the process of holding him, or her, through a series of metamorphoses, are extremely incient (Apollodorus, Bibliothicia, iii 13, 5, 6, the case of Peleus and Thetis). An instance of the fury adventure is remembered in Glencoe, the events being of the nineteenth century. A tale, in prose or verse, on Tamlane was known to the author of The Complayat of Scotlande (1549).

Robin Hood and the Curtal Frier

In summer time, when leaves grow green,
And flowers are fresh and gay,
Robin Hood and his merry men
Were disposed to play

Then some would leap, and some would run,
And some would use artillery,
'Which of you can a good bow draw,
A good archer for to be?

'Which of you can kill a buck, Or who can kill a doc? Or who can kill a hart of greece I ise hundred foot him fro?'

a fat hart

Will Scadlocke he killd a buck, And Midge he killd a doc, And Little John killd a hart of greece, Five hundred foot him fro.

'Gods blessing on thy heart,' said Rohin Hood,
'That hath such a shot for me,
I would ride my horse a hundred miles,
Fo find one could match with thee.'

I his caused Will Scadlocke to laugh,
He laught full heartily
There lives a curtal frier in Fountains Abby frocker
Will beat both him and thee

'The curtal frier in Fountains Abby Well can a strong bow draw, He will beat you and your yeomen, Set them all on a row'

Robin Hood he took a solemn oath, It was by Mary free, That he would neither eat nor drink Fill the frier he did see

Robin Hood put on his harness good, On his head a cap of steel, Broad sword and buckler by his side, And they became him weel.

He took his bow into his hand, It was made of a trusty tree, With a sheaf of arrows at his belt, And to Fountains Dale went he

And comming unto Fountains Dale, No farther would he ride, There he was aware of a curtal frier, Walking by the water side.

The frier had on a harness good,
On his head a cap of steel,
Broad sword and buckler by his side,
And they became him weel

Robin Hood lighted off his horse, And tyed him to a thorn 'Carry me over the water, thou curtal frier, Or else thy life's forlorn'

The frier took Robin Hood on his back, Deep water he did bestride, And spake neither good word nor bad, Till he came at the other side

Lightly leapt Robin off the friers back,
The frier said to him again,
'Carry me over this water, fine fellow,
Or it shall breed thy pain'

Robin Hood took the frier on's back, Deep water he did bestride, And spake neither good word nor bad, Till he came at the other side

Lightly leapt the frier off Robin Hoods back, Robin Hood said to him again, 'Carry me over this water, thou curtal frier, Or it shall breed thy pain'

The frier took Robin on's back again, And stept up to the knee, Till he came at the middle stream Neither good nor had spake he

And coming to the middle stream,
There he threw Robin in,
'And chuse thee, chuse thee, fine fellow,
Whether thou wilt sink or swim'

Robin Hood swam to a bush of broom,
The frier to a wicker wand,
Bold Robin Hood is gone to shore,
And took his bow in his hand

One of his best arrows under his belt
To the frier he let fly
The curtal frier with his steel buckler
Did put that arrow by

'Shoot on, shoot on, thou fine fellow, Shoot as thou hast begun, If thou shoot here a summers day, Thy mark I will not shun'

Robin Hood shot passing well,

Till his arrows all were gone,

They took their swords and steel bucklers,

They fought with might and main,

From ten o' th' clock that day
Till four i' th' afternoon,
Then Robin Hood came to his knees,
Of the frier to beg a boon

'A boon, a boon, thou curtal frier,
I beg it on my knee
Give me leave to set my horn to my mouth,
And to blow blasts three'

'That I will do,' said the curtal frier,
'Of thy blasts I have no doubt,
I hope thou'lt blow so passing well,
Till both thy eyes fall out.'

Robin Hood set his horn to his mouth,
He blew but blasts three,
Half a hundred yeomen, with bows bent,
Came raking over the lee

'Whose men are these,' said the frier,
'That come so hastily?'
'These men are mine,' said Robin Hood,
'Frier, what is that to thee?'

'A boon, a boon,' said the curtal frier,
'The like I gave to thee,
Give me leave to set my fist to my mouth,
And to whute whutes three.'

'That will I do,' said Robin Hood,
'Or else I were to blame,
Three whutes in a friers fist
Would make me glad and fain.'

The frier set his fist to his mouth, And whited whites three, Half a hundred good ban dogs Came running over the lee mastiffs, or bloodhounds

hoot

'Here's for every man of thine a dog, And I my self for thee '
'Nay, by my faith,' said Robin Hood,
'Frier, that may not be.'

Two dogs at once to Robin Hood did go, The one behind, the other before, Robin Hoods mantle of Lincoln green Off from his back they tore. And whether his men shot east or west, Or they shot north or south,

The curtal dogs, so taught they were,

They kept their arrows in their mouth cur tailed '

'Take up thy dogs,' said Little John, 'Frier, at my bidding be,'

'Whose man art thou,' said the curtal frier,
'Comes here to prate with me?'

'I am Little John, Robin Hoods man, Frier, I will not lie, If thou take not up thy dogs soon, I'le take up them and thee'

Little John had a bow in his hand, He shot with might and main, Soon half a score of the friers dogs Lay dead upon the plain

'Hold thy hand, good fellow,' said the curtal frier,
'Thy master and I will agree,
And we will have new orders taken,
With all the haste that may be'

'If thou wilt forsake fair Fountains Dale, And Fountains Abby free, Every Sunday throghout the year, A noble shall be thy fee

'And every holy day throughout the year, Changed shall thy garment be, If thou wilt go to fair Nottingham, And there remain with me.'

This curtal frier had kept Fountains Dale Seven long years or more, There was neither knight, lord, nor earl, Could make him yield before

This ballad is from a 'Garland' of 1663, the version in Percy's folio being fragmentary. The piece, says Professor Child, 'is in a genuinely popular style, and was made to sing, not to print' There are traces of an earlier ballad as the common basis of the version given here and of that in the Percy folio

Sir Patrick Spens

The king sits in Dunsermline towne,
Drinking the blude red wine,
'O whare will I get a skeely skipper,
To sail this new ship of mine?'

O up and spake an eldern knight, Sat at the king's right knee,— 'Sir Patrick Spens is the best sailor, That ever sailed the sea.'

Our king has written a braid letter, And seal'd it with his hand, And sent it to sir Patrick Spens, Was walking on the strand

'To Noroway, to Noroway,
To Noroway o'er the faem,
The king's daughter of Noroway,
'Tis thou maun bring her hame'

The first word that sir Patrick read, Sae loud loud laughed he, The neist word that sir Patrick read, The tear blinded his ee.

next

uct

'O wha is this has done this deed, And tould the king o' me, To send us out, at this time of the year, To sail upon the sea?

'Be it wind, be it weet, be it hail, be it sleet, Our ship must sail the facm, The king's daughter of Noroway, 'I is we must fetch her hame.'—

They hoysed their sails on Monenday morn, hoisted Wi' a' the speed they may,
They had landed in Noroway,
Upon a Wodensday

They hadna been a week, a week, In Noroway, but twae, When that the lords o' Noroway Began aloud to say—

'Ye Scottishmen spend a' our king's goud, And a' our queenis fee '— 'Ye he, ye he, ye hars loud! Fu' loud I hear ye he

'For I brought as much white monie,
As gane my men and me,
And I brought a half fou of gude red goud, half measure
Out o'er the sea wi' me

'Make ready, make ready, my merrymen a'!
Our gude ship sails the morn,'—
'Now, ever alake, my master dear,
I fear a deadly storm!

'I saw the new moon, late yestreen, Wi' the auld moon in her arm, And, if we gang to sea, master, I fear we'll come to harm'

They hadna sailed a lengue, a league,
A league but barely three,
When the lift grew dark, and the wind blew loud,
And gurly grew the sea.

The ankers brah, and the top masts lap,

It was sie a deadly storm,

And the waves cam o'er the broken ship,

Till a' her sides were torn

'O where will I get a gude sailor,
To take my helm in hand,
Till I get up to the tall top mast,
To see if I can spy land?'—

'O here am I, a sailor gude,
To take the helm in hand,
I'ill you go up to the tall top mast,
But I fear ye'll ne'er spy land'

He hadna gane a step, a step,
A step but barely one,
When a bout fley out of our goodly ship,
And the salt sea it cam in

'Gae, fetch a web o' the silken claith,
Another o' the twine,
And wap them into our ship's side,
And let nae the sea come in '---

They fetch'd a web o' the silken clatth,
Another o' the twine,

And they wrapp'd them round that gude ship's side, But still the sea cam in

O laith, laith were our gude Scots lords
Fo weet their cork heel'd shoon!
But lang or a' the play was play'd,
They wat their hats aboon

And mony was the feather-bed
That flatter'd on the faem, tossed
And mony was the gude lord's son
That never mair cam hame

The ladyes wrang their fingers white,
The maidens tore their hair,
A' for the sake of their true loves,
For them they'll see nac mair

O lang, lang may the ladyes sit, Wi' their fans into their hand, Before they see sir Patrick Spens Come sailing to the strand!

And lang, lang may the maidens sit,
With their goud kaims in their hair,
A' waiting for their ain dear loves!
For them they'll see nair

O forty miles off Aberdeen,
'Tis fifty fathoms deep,
And there lies gude sir Patrick Spens,
Wi' the Scots lords at his feet

This ballad was first printed by Percy (1765), and then by Herd ('Sir Andrew Wood') in 1769 Scott's version is a blend of two variants Andrew Wood has only been casually introduced, he being the most famous mariner under James III and James IV That the ballad is really traditional is proved by a fragment of a variant collected in 1829, which contains a formula found also in 'I he Bonny Earl o' Moray '-an example of the popular method of diffusing and intermingling ballads The expedition to Norway, under Sir Patrick, is not historical, and yields no date, though conccivably it may be a refraction from the wellremembered fact of the death of the Maid of Norway on her way to Scotland (1290) marringe of James III with a Danish princess (1469) involved no kind of tragedy. If one might conjecture, the death of the Maid, with its terrible consequences, floated vaguely in the popular memory, as did the Danish marriage of James III A poet unconsciously 'combined his informition,' altering the characters of the tragedy, or accepting the wreck from erroneous tradition This may have occurred in the sixteenth century, and the Danish marriage of James VI may have recalled the vague legends and prompted the poet. Like Professor Child, we 'do not feel compelled to regard the ballad is historical?

Sir Aldingar

Our king he kept a false stewarde, Sir Aldinger they him call, A falser's eward than he was one, Service not in lower nor hall. He wolde have layne by our comelye queene, Her deere worshippe to betraye Our queene she was a good woman, And evermore said him naye '

Sir Aldingar was wrothe in his mind, With her hee was never content, Till traiterous meanes he colde devyse, In a fyer to have her brent

There came a lazar to the kings gate, A lazar both blinde and lame He tooke the lazar upon his backe, Him on the queenes bed has layne

'Lye still, lazar, wheras thou lyest, Looke thou goe not hence away, Ile make thee a whole man and a sound In two howers of the day '

Then went him forth Sir Aldingar, And hyed him to our king 'If I might have grace, as I have space, Sad tydings I could bring'

- 'Say on, say on, Sir Aldingar, Saye on the soothe to mee.'
- 'Our queene hath chosen a new new love, And shee will have none of thee
- 'If shee had chosen a right good knight, The lesse had beene her shame, But she hath chose her a lazar man. A lazar both blinde and lame,'
- 'If this be true, thou Aldingar, The tyding thou tellest to me, Then will I make thee a rich rich knight, Rich both of golde and fee.
- 'But if it be false, Sir Aldingar, As God nowe grant it bee! Thy body, I sweare by the holye rood, Shall hang on the gallows tree.'

He brought our king to the queenes chamber, And opend to him the dore 'A lodlye love,' king Harry says, loathly 'For our queene dame Elinore '

'If thou were a man, as thou art none, Here on my sword thoust dye, But a payre of new gallowes shall be built, And there shalt thou hang on hye'

Forth then hyed our king, I wysse, And an angry man was hee, And soone he found queene Elinore, That bride so bright of blee hue, complexion

'Now God you save, our queene, madame, And Christ you save and see, Here you have chosen a newe newe love, And you will have none of mee

'If you had chosen a right good knight, The lesse had been your shame But you have chose you a lazar man, A lazar both blinde and lame.

- 'Therfore a fyer there shall be built, And brent all shalt thou bee '-'Now out alacke!' said our comly queene,
 - 'Sir Aldingar's false to mee
- 'Now out alacke!' sayd our comlye queene, 'My heart with griefe will brast burst I had thought swevens had never been true, dreams I have proved them true at last.
- 'I dreamt in my sweven on thursday eve, I my bed wheras I laye, I dreamt a grype and a grimlie beast Had carryed my crowne awaye,
- 'My gorgett and my kirtle of golde, And all my faire head geere And he wold worrye me with his tush And to his nest y beare

'Saving there came a little gray hawke, A merlin him they call, Which untill the grounde did strike the grype, That dead he downe did fall tusk

'Giffe I were a man, as now I am none, A battell wold I prove, To fight with that traitor Aldingar, Att him I cast my glove

'But seeing Ime able noe battell to make, My liege, grant me a knight To fight with that traitor, Sir Aldingar, To maintaine me in my right '

'Now forty dayes I will give thee To seeke thee a knight therin If thou find not a knight in forty dayes Thy bodye it must brenn'

Then shee sent east, and shee sent west, forthwith By north and south bedeene But never a champion colde she find, Wolde fight with that knight soe keene

Now twenty dayes were spent and gone, Noe helpe there might be had, Many a teare shed our comelye queene And aye her hart was sad

Then came one of the queenes damselles, And knelt upon her knee, 'Cheare up, cheare up, my gracious dame, I trust yet helpe may be.

'And here I will make mine avowe, And with the same me binde, That never will I return to thee, Till I some helpe may finde.'

Then forth she rode on a faire palfraye Oer hill and dale about But never a champion colde she finde, Wolde fighte with that knight so stout.

And nowe the daye drewe on apace, When our good queene must dye, All woe begone was that faire damselle, When she found no helpe was nye

All woc begone was that faire damselle, And the salt teares fell from her eye When lo! as she rode by a rivers side, She met with a tinye boye.

A tinye boy she mette, God wot, All clad in mantle of golde, He seemed noe more in mans likenesse, Then a childe of four yeere olde.

'Why grieve you, damselle faire,' he sayd,
'And what doth cause you moane?'
The damsell scant wolde deigne a looke,
But fast she pricked on

'Yet turne againe, thou faire damselle, And greete thy queene from mee, When bale is att hyest, boote is nyest, Nowe helpe enoughe may bee

'Bid her remember what she dreamt In her bedd wheras shee laye, How when the grype and the grimly beast Wolde have carried her crowne awaye

'Even then there came the little gray hawke, And saved her from his clawes Then bidd the queene be merry at hart, For heaven will fende her cause'

Back then rode that faire damselle, And her hart it lept for glee And when she told her gracious dame A gladd woman then was shee

But when the appointed day was come, No helpe appeared nye Then woeful, woeful was her hart, And the teares stood in her eye

And nowe a fyer was built of wood,
And a stake was made of tree,
And now queene Llinor forth was led,
A sorrowful sight to see

Three times the herault he waved his hand, And three times spake on hye 'Giff any good knight will fende this dame, Come forth, or shee must dye'

No knight stood forth, no knight there came, No helpe appeared nye And now the fyer was lighted up, Queen Elinor she must dye

And now the fyer was lighted up,
As hot as hot might bee,
When riding upon a little white steed,
The tinye boy they see

'Away with that stake, away with those brands, And loose our comelye queene I am come to fight with Sir Aldingur, And prove him a traitor keene'

Forthe then stood Sir Aldingar,
But when he saw the chylde,
He laughed, and scotted, and turned his backe,
And weened he had been beguvide

'Now turne, now turne thee, Aldingar, And eyther fighte or flee, I trust that I shall avenge the wronge, Thoughe I am so small to see'

The boye pulld forth a well good sworde, So gilt it dazzled the ce, The first stroke stricken at Aldingar Smote off his leggs by the knee.

'Stand up, stand up, thou false traitor, And fight upon thy feete, For and thou thrive, as thou begin'st, Of height wee shall be meete.'

മന, ദ ഭവവി

'A priest, a priest,' sayes Aldingar,
'While I am a man alive

A priest, a priest,' sayes Aldingar,
'Me for to houzle and shrive Give me the Sacra ment and absolution

'I wolde have laine by our comble queene, But shee wolde never consent, Then I thought to betraye her unto our kinge, In a feer to have her brent

'There came a lazar to the kings gates, A lazar both blind and lame I tooke the lazar upon my backe,

I tooke the lazar upon my backe, And on her bedd had him layne

'Then ranne I to our combye king, These tidings sore to tell But ever alacke!' sayes Aldingar, 'Falsing never doth well,

'Forgive, forgive mc, queenc, madame,
The short time I must live'

'Nowe Christ forgive thee, Aldingar, As freely I forgive'

'Here take thy queene, our king Harrye,
And love her as thy life,
For never had a king in Christentye
A truer and fairer wife'

King Henrye ran to claspe his queene, And loosed her full some Then turnd to look for the tinye boye, —The boye was vanisht and gone.

But first he had touchd the lazar man, And stroakt him with his hand The lazar under the gallowes tree All whole and sounde did stand

The lazar under the gallowes tree
Was comelye, straight and tall,
King Henrye made him his head stewarde
To wayte within his hall

Clerk Saunders

Clerk Stunders and May Margaret Walked ower you garden green, And sad and heavy was the fove That fell thir two between

'A bed, a bed, Clerk Saunders said,
'A bed for you and me!'—
'Fve na, fye na,' said May Margaret,
'Till anes we married be,

- 'For in may come my seven bauld brothers, Wi' torches burning bright, They'll say—"We hae but ae sister, And behold she's wi' a knight!"'—
- 'Then take the sword from my scabbard, And slowly lift the pin, And you may swear, and safe your aith, Ye never let Clerk Saunders in
- 'And take a napkin in your hand, And tie up baith your bonny een, And you may swear, and safe your aith, Ye saw me na since late yestreen.'
- It was about the midnight hour,
 When they asleep were laid,
 When in and came her seven brothers,
 Wi' torches burning red
- When in and came her seven brothers,
 Wi' torches burning bright,
 They said, 'We hae but ae sister,
 And behold her lying with a knight!'
- Then out and spake the first o' them,
 'I bear the sword shall gar him dee!'
 And out and spake the second o' them,
 'His father has nae mair than he!'
- And out and spake the third o' them,
 'I wot that they are lovers dear!'—
 And out and spake the fourth o' them,
 'They hae been in love this mony a year'
- Then out and spake the fifth o' them,
 'It were great sin true love to twain!'—
 And out and spake the sixth of them,
 'It were shame to slay a sleeping man!'
- Then up and gat the seventh o' them,
 And never a word spake he,
 But he has striped his bright brown brand
 Out through Clerk Saunders' fair bodye
- Clerk Saunders he started, and Margaret she turn'd Into his arms as asleep she lay, And sad and silent was the night That was atween thir twae
- And they lay still and sleeped sound,
 Until the day began to daw,
 And kindly to him she did say,
 'It is time, true love, you were awa.'
- But he lay still, and sleeped sound,
 Albeit the sun began to sheen,
 She looked atween her and the wa',
 And dull and drowsie were his een.
- Then in and came her father dear,
 Said—'Let a' your mourning be,
 I'll carry the dead corpse to the clay,
 And I'll come back and comfort thee.'—
- 'Comfort weel your seven sons,
 For comforted will I never be,
 I ween 'twas neither knave nor loon
 Was in the bower last night wi' me.'

- The clinking bell gaed through the town,

 To carry the dead corse to the clay,

 And Clerk Saunders stood at May Margaret's window,

 I wot, an hour before the day
- 'Are ye sleeping, Margaret?' he says,
 'Or are ye waking presentlie?
 Give me my faith and troth again,
 I wot, true love, I gied to thee'
- 'Your faith and troth you sall never get, Nor our true love sall never twin, Until ye come within my bower, And kiss me cheik and chin '—
- 'My mouth it is full cold, Margaret,
 It has the smell, now, of the ground,
 And if I kiss thy comely mouth,
 Thy days of life will not be lang
- 'O, cocks are crowing a merry midnight, I wot the wild fowls are boding day, Give me my faith and troth again, And let me fare me on my way'—
- 'Thy faith and troth thou sall na get,
 And our true love sall never twin,
 Until ye tell what comes of women,
 I wot, who die in strong traivelling?
- 'Their beds are made in the heavens high,
 Down at the foot of our good Lord's knee,
 Weel set about wi' gillyflowers!
 I wot sweet company for to see.
- 'O, cocks are crowing a merry midnight, I wot the wild fowl are boding day; The psalms of heaven will soon be sung, And I, ere now, will be miss'd away'
- Then she has ta'en a crystal wand,
 And she has stroken her troth thereon,
 She has given it him out at the shot-window,
 Wi' mony a sad sigh and heavy groan.
- 'I thank ye, Marg'ret, I thank ye, Marg'ret, And aye I thank ye heartilie, Gin ever the dead come or the quick, Be sure, Marg'ret, I'll come for thee.'—
- It's hosen and shoon, and gown alone,
 She climb'd the wall, and follow'd him,
 Until she came to the green forest,
 And there she lost the sight o' him
- 'Is there ony room at your head, Saunders?
 Is there ony room at your feet?
 Or ony room at your side, Saunders,
 Where fain, fain, I wad sleep?'—
- 'There's nae room at my head, Marg'ret,
 There's nae room at my feet,
 My bed it is full lowly now,
 Amang the hungry worms I sleep
- 'Cauld mould is my covering now, But and my winding sheet, The dew it falls nae sooner down, Than my resting place is weet

But plait a wand o' bonny birk, And lay it on my breast And shed a tear upon my grave, And wish my saul gude rest.

'And fair Marg'ret, and rare Marg'ret, And Marg'ret o' veritie, Gin e'er ye love another man, Ne'er love him as ye did me '—

Then up and crew the milk white cock, And up and crew the gray, Her lover vanish'd in the air, And she gaed weeping away

This ballad is cited from Scott, whose version is a patchwork, but classical The sequel is from 'Sweet William's Ghost,' but this ballad may once have had a similar sequel. The return of the dead lover (or brother) has Scandinavian, Romaic, and English analogies Compare also 'The Clerks I'wa Sons o' Owsenford' and 'The Wife o' Usher's Well'

The Wife o' Usher's Well.

There lived a wife at Usher's Well,
And a wealthy wife was she,
She had three stout and stalwart sons,
And sent them o'er the sea.

They hadna been a week from her,

A week but barely ane,

When word came back to the carline wife

I hat her three sons were gane.

They hadna been a week from her, A week but barely three, When word came to the carline wife That her sons she'd never see.

'I wish the wind may never cease, Nor fishes in the flood, Till my three sons come hame to me, In earthly flesh and blood!'—

It fell about the Martinmas,
When nights are lang and mirk,
The carline wife's three sons cam hame,
And their hats were o' the birk

It neither grew in syke nor ditch, drain
Nor yet in ony sheugh, water furrow
But at the gates o' Paradise,
That birk grew fair encuch

'Blow up the fire, my maidens!
Bring water from the well'
For a' my house shall feast this night,
Since my three sons are well'—

And she has made to them a bed, She's made it large and wide, And she's ta'en her mantle her about, Sat down at the bedside

Up then crew the red red cock, And up and crew the gray, The eldest to the youngest said, 'Is time we were away'— The cock he hadna craw'd but ance,
And clapp'd his wings at a',
When the youngest to the eldest sud,
'Brother, we must awa.—

'The cock doth craw, the day doth daw,
The channerin' worm doth chide, complaining
Gin we be mist out o' our place,
A sair pain we maun bide.

'Fare ye weel, my mother dear'
Fareweel to barn and byre!
And fare ye weel, the bonny lass,
That kindles my mother's fire'

This poem of the return of the dead, disturbed by the grief of the living, was obtained, Scott says, from the recitation of an old woman at Kirkhill in West Lothian

The Battle of Otterburn.

It fell about the Lammas tide,
When the muir men win their hay,
The doughty Douglas bound him to ride
Into England, to drive a prey

He chose the Gordons and the Gremes, With them the Lindesays, light and gry, But the Jardines wald not with him ride, And they rue it to this day

And he has burn'd the dales of Tyne,
And part of Bambrough shire,
And three good towers on Reidswire fells,
He left them all on fire

And he march'd up to Newcastle, And rode it round about, 'O wha's the lord of this castle, Or wha's the lady o't?'

But up spake proud lord Percy then,
And O but he spake hie!
'I am the lord of this castle,
My wife's the lady gay'—

'If thou'rt the lord of this castle, Sae weel it pleases me' For, ere I cross the Border fells, The tane of us shall dee'—

He took a lang spear in his hand, Shod with the metal free, And for to meet the Douglas there, He rode right furiouslie.

But O how pale his lady look'd,
Frae aff the castle wa',
When down before the Scottish spear
She saw proud Percy fa'

'Had we twa been upon the green,
And never an eye to see,
I wad hae had you, flesh and fell,
But your sword sall gre wi' me'—

'But gae ye up to Otterbourne,
And wait there days three,
And, if I come not ere three days end,
A fause knight ca' ye me'—

'The Otterbourne's a bonnie burn,
"Tis pleasant there to be,
But there is nought at Otterbourne
To feed my men and me

'The deer rins wild on hill and dale,
The birds fly wild from tree to tree,
But there is neither bread nor kale,
To fend my men and me serve for

'Yet I will stay at Otterbourne,
Where you shall welcome be,
And, if you come not at three days end,
A fause lord I'll ca' thee'—

'Thither will I come,' proud Percy said,
'By the might of Our Ladye''
'There will I bide thee,' said the Douglas,
My troth I plight to thee'—

They lighted high on Otterbourne, Upon the bent sae brown, They lighted high on Otterbourne, And threw their pallions down

And he that had a bonnie boy,
Sent out his horse to grass,
And he that had not a bonnie boy,
His ain servant he was.

But up then spake a little page,
Before the peep of dawn—
'O waken ye, waken ye, my good lord,
For Percy's hard at hand '—

'Ye lie, ye lie, ye liar loud '
Sae loud I hear ye lie
For Percy had not men yestreen
To dight my men and me.

deal with

'But I have dreamed a dreary dream, Beyond the Isle of Skye, I saw a dead man win a fight, And I think that man was I'

He belted on his guid braid sword, And to the field he ran, But he forgot the helmet good, That should have kept his brain

When Percy with the Douglas met,
I wat he was fu' fain!
They swakked their swords, till sair they swat, swagged,
And the blood ran down like rain

But Percy, with his good broad sword,
That could so sharply wound,
Has wounded Douglas on the brow,
Till he fell to the ground

Then he called on his little foot page, And said—'Run speedilie, And fetch my ain dear sister's son, Sir Hugh Montgomery'

'My nephew good,' the Douglas said,
'What recks the death of ane!
Last night I dream'd a dreary dream,
And I ken the day's thy ain.

'My wound is deep, I fain would sleep,
Take thou the vanguard of the three,
And hide me by the braken bush,
That grows on yonder hlye lee

'O bury me by the braken bush,
Beneath the blooming brier,
Let never living mortal ken
That ere a kindly Scot lies here.'

He lifted up that noble lord,
Wi' the saut tears in his ee,
He hid him in the braken bush,
That his merrie men might not see

The moon was clear, the day drew near,
The spears in flinders flew,
But mony a gallant Englishman
Ere day the Scotsmen slew

The Gordons good, in English blood They steep'd their hose and shoon, The Lindsays flew like fire about, Till all the fray was done.

The Percy and Montgomery met,

That either of other were fain,

They swapped swords, and they twa swat,

And age the blood ran down between.

'Now yield thee, yield thee, Percy,' he said,
'Or else I vow I'll lay thee low!'—
'To whom must I yield,' quoth Earl Percy,
'Now that I see it must be so?'—

'Thou shalt not yield to lord or loun,
Nor yet shalt thou yield to me,
But yield ye to the braken bush,
That grows upon you hlye lee!'—

'I will not yield to a braken bush, Nor yet will I yield to a brier, But I would yield to Earl Douglas, Or Sir Hugh the Montgomery, if he were here.'

As soon as he knew it was Montgomery,

He struck his sword's point in the gronde,
The Montgomery was a courteous knight,
And quickly took him by the honde.

This deed was done at Otterbourne
About the breaking of the day,
Earl Douglas was buried at the braken bush,
And the Percy led captive away

Scott's version, though confessedly a blend of two variants, is followed as the most classical. The battle occurred on August 19, 1388, and Froissart's account is easily accessible. A ballad on the theme is remarked on in The Complaynt of Scotlande (1549). This probably had affinities with our ballad. It seems probable that a furresounding event may often have been circulated, and of course altered, in oral tradition, before it found its ballad poet, but, as daily experience shows, oral tradition alters events of newspaper record with amazing rapidity. A notable example is Mr Alfred Austin's poem on Jameson's Ruid—eminently unhistorical though contemporary

Kinmont Willie

O have ye na heard o' the fause Sakelde?
O have ye na heard o' the keen Lord Scroope?
How they hae ta'en bauld Kinmont Willie,
On Hairibee to hang him up?

Had Wilhe had but twenty men,
But twenty men as stout as he,
Fause Sakelde had never the Kinmont ta'en,
Wi' eight score in his cumpanie

They band his legs beneath the steed,

They tied his hands behind his back,

They guarded him, fivesome on each side,

And they brought him ower the Liddel rack.

They led him thro' the Liddel rack,
And also thro' the Carlisle sands,
They brought him to Carlisle castell,
To be at my Lord Scroope's commands

'My hands are tied, but my tongue is free And whae will dare this deed avow? Or answer by the Border law? Or answer to the bauld Buccleuch?'—

'Now haud thy tongue, thou rank reiver!
There's never a Scot shall set ye free
Before ye cross my castle yate,
I trow ye shall take farewell o' me.'

'Fear na ye that, my lord,' quo' Willie
'By the faith o' my body, Lord Scroope,' he said,
'I never yet lodged in a hostelrie,
But I paid my lawing before I gaed' score

Now word is gane to the bauld Keeper, In Branksome Ha', where that he lay, That Lord Scroope has ta'en the Kinmont Willie, Between the hours of night and day

He has ta'en the table wi' his hand,
He garr'd the red wine spring on hie—
'Now Christ's curse on my head,' he said,
'But avenged of Lord Scroope I'll be'

'O is my basnet a widow's curch? helmet, cap
Or my lance a wand of the willow tree?
Or my arm a ladye's lilye hand,
That an English lord should lightly me? slight

'And have they ta'en him, Kimmont Willie, Against the truce of Border tide? And forgotten that the bauld Buccleuch Is Keeper here on the Scottish side?

'And have they e'en ta'en him, Kinmont Willie, Withouten either dread or fear? And forgotten that the bauld Buccleuch Can back a steed or shake a spear?

'O were there war between the lands,
As well I wot that there is none,
I would slight Carlisle castell high,
Tho' it were builded of marble stone

'I would set that castell in a low,
And sloken it with English blood! slake
There's nevir a man in Cumberland
Should ken where Carlisle castell stood.

'But since nae war's between the lands,
And there is peace, and peace should be,
I'll neither harin English lad or lass,
And yet the Kinmont freed shall be!'—

He has call'd him forty Marchmen bauld, I trow they were of his ain name, Except Sir Gilbert Elliot call'd, The Laird of Stobs, I mean the same

He has call'd him forty Marchmen bauld, Were kinsmen to the bauld Buccleuch, With spur on heel, and splent on spauld, And gluves of green, and feathers blue.

armour on shoulder

There were five and five before them a', Wi' hunting horns and bugles bright, And five and five came wi' Buccleuch, Like warden's men, array'd for fight

And five and five, like a mason gung,
That carried the ladders lang and hie,
And five and five, like broken men,
And so they reach'd the Woodhouselee.

And as we cross'd the Bateable Land, When to the English side we held, The first o' men that we met wi', Whae sould it be but fause Sakelde?

'Where be ye gaun, ye hunters keen?'
Quo' fause Sakelde, 'come tell to me''
'We go to hunt an English stag,
Has trespass'd on the Scots countrie'

'Where be ye gaun, ye marshal men?'
Quo' fause Sakelde, 'come tell me true!'
'We go to catch a rank reiver,
Has broken faith wi' the bauld Buccleuch'

'Where are ye gaun, ye mason lads,
Wi' a' your ladders, lang and hie?'
'We gang to herry a corbie's nest,
That wons not far frae Woodhouselee'

'Where be ye gaun, ye broken men?'
Quo' fause Sakelde, 'come tell to me!'
Now Dickie of Dryhope led that band,
And the never a word o' lear had he.

Instruction, culture

'Why tresspass ye on the English side?
Row footed outlaws, stand!' quo'he, rolling footed
The nevir a word had Dickie to say,
Sae he thrust the lance through his fause bodie

Then on we held for Carlisle toun,
And at Staneshaw bank the Eden we cross'd,
The water was great and meikle of spait,
But the nevir a horse nor man we lost

And when we reach'd the Staneshaw bank,
The wind was rising loud and hie,
And there the Laird garr'd leave our steeds,
For fear that they should stamp and nie.

And when we left the Staneshaw bank,
The wind began full loud to blaw,
But 'twas wind and weet, and fire and sleet,
When we came beneath the castle wa'

We crept on knees, and held our breath,

Till we placed the ladders against the wa',

And sae ready was Buccleuch himsell

To mount the first, before us a'

He has ta'en the watchman by the throat,
He flung him down upon the lead—
'Had there not been peace between our land,
Upon the other side thou hadst gaed!—

'Now sound out, trumpets!' quo' Buccleuch,
'Let's waken Lord Scroope, right merrihe!'
Then loud the warden's trumpet blew—
'O wha dare meddle wi' me?'

Then speedilie to work we gaed,
And raised the slogan ane and a',
And cut a hole thro' a sheet of lead,
And so we wan to the castle ha'

They thought King James and a' his men Had won the house wi' bow and spear, It was but twenty Scots and ten That put a thousand in sic a stear!

stir, panic

Wi' coulters, and wi' fore hammers,
We garr'd the bars bang merrile,
Untill we cam to the inner prison,
Where Wilhe o' Kimmont he did he.

And when we cam to the lower prison,
Where Willie o' Kinmont he did lie—
'O sleep ye, wake ye, Kinmont Willie,
Upon the morn that thou's to die?'

O I sleep saft, and I wake aft,
It's lang since sleeping was fleyed frae me! frightened away
Gie my service back to my wife and bairns,
And a' gude fellows that spier for me.'
ask

Then Red Rowan has hente him up,
The starkest man in Teviotdale—
'Abide, abide now, Red Rowan,
Till of my Lord Scroope I take farewell

'Farewell, farewell, my gude Lord Scroope!

My gude Lord Scroope, farewell!' he cried—
'I'll pay you for my lodging mail!

When first we meet on the Border side'—

Then shoulder high, with shout and cry,
We bore him down the ladder lang,
At every stride Red Rowan made,
I wot the Kinmont's airns play'd clang!

'O mony a time,' quo' Kinmont Willie,
'I have ridden horse baith wild and wood mad
But a rougher beast than Red Rowan,
I ween my legs have ne'er bestrode.

'And mony a time,' quo' Kinmont Willie,
'I've pricked a horse out ower the furs,
But since the day I backed a steed,
I never wore sic cumbrous spurs!'

We scarce had won the Staneshaw bank, When a' the Carlisle bells were rung, And a thousand men, in horse and foot, Cam wi' the keen Lord Scroope along Buccleuch has turn'd to Eden water,
Even where it flow'd frae bank to brim,
And he has plunged in wi' a' his band,
And safely swam them through the stream.

He turn'd him on the other side,
And at Lord Scroope his glove flung he—
'If ye like na my visit in merry England,
In fair Scotland come visit me!'

All sore astonish'd stood Lord Scroope,
He stood as still as rock of stane,
He scarcely dared to trew his eyes,
When through the water they had gane.

'He is either himsell a devill frae hell, Or else his mother a witch maun be, I wad na have ridden that wan water For a' the gowd in Christentie'

The date of the event is April 13, 1596 (Tytler's History of Scotland, in. 430, Lord Scroope's Dispatch) Scott of Satchells (History of the Name of Scott, 1688) either borrowed from the ballad, or, if any one distrusts Sir Walter Scott, then he borrowed from Satchells! Sir Walter confessedly combined and emended versions, and the present writer, like Professor Child, recognises his hand in stanzas 10, 11, 12, perhaps we may add 17, 31, 39, if not 46

Mary Hamilton.

Marie Humilton's to the kirk gane,
Wi' ribbons in her hair,
The King thought mair o' Marie Hamilton
Than ony that were there

Marie Hamilton's to the kirk gane,
Wi' ribbons on her breast,
The King thought mair o' Marie Hamilton
Than he listen'd to the priest

Marie Hamilton's to the kirk gane,
Wi' gloves upon her hands,
The King thought mair o' Marie Hamilton
Than the Queen and a' her lands

She hadna been about the King's court
A month, but barely one,
Till she was beloved by a' the King's court,
And the King the only man

Till frae the King's court Marie Hamilton, Marie Hamilton durst na be

The King is to the Abbey gane,
To pu' the abbey tree,
To scale the babe frae Marie's heart,
But the thing it wadna be.

O she has row'd it in her apron,
And set it on the sea—
'Gae sink ye, or swim ye, bonny babe,
Ye's get na mair o' me.'

Word is to the kitchen gane,
And word is to the ha',
And word is to the noble room,
Amang the ladyes a',

That Mane Hamilton's brought to bed, And the bonny babe's mist and awa'

Scarcely had she lain down again,
And scarcely fa'n asleep,
When up then started our gude Queen,
Just at her bed feet,
Saying—'Marie Hamilton, where's your babe?
For I am sure I heard it greet.'

'O no, O no, my noble Queen?

I hink no such thing to be,
'Twas but a stitch into my side,
And sair it troubles me.'

'Get up, gct up, Marie Hamilton Gct up, and follow me, For I am going to Edinburgh town. A rich wedding for to sec'

O slowly, slowly, raise she up, And slowly put she on, And slowly rode she out the way, Wi' mony a weary groan

The Queen was clad in scarlet,
Her merry maids all in green,
And every town that they cam to,
Hey took Marie for the Queen

'Ride hooly, hooly, gentlemen, Ride hooly now wi' me! For never, I am sure, a wearier burd Rade in your cumpanie!

But little wist Marie Hamilton,
When she rade on the brown,
That she was ga'en to Edinburgh town,
And a' to be put down

'Why weep ye so, ye burgess wives, Why look ye so on me? O, I am going to Edinburgh town, A rich wedding for to see'

When she gaed up the tolbooth stairs, toll house, jail
The corks frae her heels did fice,
And lang or e'er she cam down again,
She was condemn'd to die

When she cam to the Netherbow port, She laughed loud laughters three, But when she cam to the gallows foot, The tears blinded her e'e

'Yestreen the Queen had four Maries,
The night she'll hae but three,
There was Marie Seaton, and Marie Beaton,
And Marie Carmichael, and me

'O, often have I dress'd my Queen, And put gold upon her hair, But now I've gotten for my reward The gallows to me my share 'Often have I dress'd my Queen,
And often made her bed,
But now I 've gotten for my reward
The gallows tree to tread

'I charge ye all, ye mariners,
When ye sail ower the facm,
Let neither my father nor mother get wit,
But that I'm coming hame

'I charge ye all, ye mariners,
That sail upon the sea,
Let neither my father nor mother get wit
This dog's death I'm to die

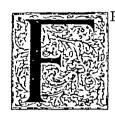

For if my father and mother got wit, And my bold brethren three, O mickle wad be the gude red blude. This day wad be spilt for me!

'O little did my mother ken,
The day she cradled me,
The lands I was to trivel in,
Or the death I was to die!'

Professor Child (vol iii 382-384) regarded this as 'one of the very latest of the Scottish ballads,' yet 'one of the very best' Like Charles Kirkpatrick Sharpe and Mr Courthope, he thought that it was based on the death of a Mary Hamilton for child-murder, at the court of Peter the Great, in March 1719 Professor Child's later published remarks on the objection of the present writer to this theory are in vol v 299 (compare Blackwood's Magazini, September 1895, p 381 et seq) The facts of the Scottish case—an apothecary and a French maid of Mary's being the culprits-are in Stite Papers (Foreign), Elizabeth, December 21, 1563, p 637 The apothecary occurs in a variant in the Abbotsford MSS This could hardly have happened if, for some unknown reason, our ballad was based, about 1720, on a report of a contemporary event in Russii, and yet accommodated to the circumstances of Mary Stuart's The apothecary is a clear trace of the historical facts of 1563 Professor Child therefore thinks the improbability of the modern date and origin of the ballad 'considerably greater' than the improbability of the chance coincidence of a child murder by a real Mary Hamilton, a Russian maid of honour There was no Hamilton among the Queen's Maries, who were Mary Seton, Mary Beaton, Mary Fleming, and Mary Livingstone, and the scandal about one of those ladics, circulated by John Knox, has been dis proved by contemporary documents. Scott's patched version is selected as classical extraordinary number of variants, with the Duke of York and the Duke of Argyll introduced as fathers of the heroine, demonstrate the wide circulation, antiquity, and manifold corruption of the ballad These things do not suit a bill id of 1720 based on a Russian scandal.

THE CIVIL WAR AND THE COMMONWEALTH.

The Pulitan Movement.

ROM Shakespeare to Milton—from Elizabeth to Cromwell
—the parallelism of the two changes at once suggests the influence exercised upon literature by the external forces which control the religious and political life of the time Whatever be the causes which lead to the production of great literature or great art at a given place or time, it may safely be averred that it demands the concurrence of a virile energy, strung to its highest pitch, with the moderating influence of ideas which impose limitations on the worker or the thinker, and preserve the sanity of those who act upon their contemporaries in the world of external achievement as well as in the world It was this combination of mental conception which, on the one hand, sent forth the members of a single Athenian tribe to fight in one year in Cyprus, in Egypt, in Phænicia, and on the soil of Greece itself, at a time when the most thorough political revolution had been carried out by constitutional methods unstained by the horrors of civil war, and, on the other hand, manifested itself alike in the counsels of Pericles, the graving-tool of Phidias, and the written word of Sophocles

The Elizabethan age in England showed an energy as intense as that of Athens, displaying itself in a far wider field With an outlook upon a new world still to be won to the use of civilised mankind, a religion—or rather, more than one religion—claiming not to be national but universal, the nobler Elizabethan found the boundary lines of thought and of moral rectitude pushed forward beyond the limits which had satisfied his ancestors It is hardly strange that these 'spacious times' gave birth to the greatest of dramatists, who worked, 'not only for an age, but for all time,' and who, whilst he gave with unerring touch vitality to all his characters, limited their action by nothing less than the forces of nature herself, whether acting by external compulsion or by the influence of ındıvıdual character

Shakespeare's largeness of view was shared by the greatest of his contemporaries. It was on nature and her material laws that Bacon strove to found the new science. It was on nature and her moral laws that Hooker strove to found ecclesiastical peace One voice, however, in the Elizabethan choir sounded a note apart. Shakespeare, Bacon, and Hooker alike deal with men and things as they are Spenser aimed at depicting men as they ought to be, and it was the Spenserian tradition which was taken up by Milton in his earlier poems With Milton, from the beginning, it is not the real individual man, acting in harmony with his own nature and controlled by the forces of the external world, but the individual man idealised looking forth on a world also idealised. So it is with the verses on the deaths of Bishops Andrewes and Felton (1626), with L'Allegro and Il Penscroso (1632?), and with Comus (1634) last-named poem is especially characteristic of Milton's frame of mind at this period of his life. In it not merely is virtue evalted and vice scorned, but the inward purity of mind is represented, as by Plato and Spenser, as holding sway over the outward appearance

So dear to Heaven is saintly chastity
That, when a soul is found sincerely so,
A thousand liveried angels lackey her,
Driving far off each thing of sin and guilt,
And in clear dream and solemn vision
Tell her of things that no gross ear can hear,
Till oft converse with heavenly habitants
Begin to cast a beam on the outward shape,
The unpolluted temple of the mind,
And turns it by degrees to the soul's essence
Till all be made immortal

The change in the poet's point of view from Perdita and Miranda to the lady of the Comus is obvious, and it is no less obvious that it is no mere deflection in the stream of literary taste with which we have to reckon. Milton was other than Shakespeare, primarily, of course, because the two men were born different, but also because the times in which they lived were different. The world was no longer in the Miltonic age a mystery and a wonder. The Western Continent was no longer the home of men whose heads grow beneath their shoulders, but the abode of very prosaic English colonists in Virginia and New England England no longer confronted the world in arms, but was called on to work out her own domestic problems at home The world had grown smaller, and the boundary of political action had been drawn closer Puritanism, which had furnished to the Elizabethan one of the phenomena of which he had to take account, threatened in the reign of Charles to absorb all others It is unnecessary to argue that Puntanism, conceived as an ecclesiastical system, with its unbending theology and its strict discipline, was hostile to literary effort No great work was ever inspired by the tone of thought which expressed itself in the Admonition to Parliament or in the West-Even the moral restricminster Confession tions of Puritanism were too sternly pressed to be congenial to the artistic nature not, taste not, handle not,' seems best answered by the flippant comment, 'Dost thou think because thou art virtuous there shall be no more cakes and ale?' Yet the essence of Puritanism did not lie in its prohibitions but in its aspirations, in its desire to avoid the excess and riot of the world around It was this, for instance, that imposed on men like Baxter the name of Baxter, as he himself tells us, 'never scrupled common prayers or ceremonies, nor spoke against Bishops, nor ever so much as prayed but by a book or form, being not even acquainted then with any that did otherwise, but only for reading Scripture when the rest were dancing on the Lord's Day, and for praying—by a form out of the end of the Common Prayer Book—in his house, and for reproving drunkards and swearers, and for talking sometimes a few words of Scripture and the life to come, he was reviled commonly by the name of Puritan, precisian, and hypocrite'

The aims of such men were of necessity individualistic. They sought to strengthen and purify the soul rather than to increase the power of their country or to spread its influence abroad. For such the imposition of the stern Puritan discipline upon the conscience was almost a necessity lest, becoming merely self-centred, they should loosen the bonds which imposed some check on the divergencies of thought and action and hindered the dissolution of the nation into a thousand hostile sects. Yet, checked as it might be, the sense of individuality was there, and bore with increasing force upon the art as well as upon the mind of Milton

Such a system of thought could not fail to be as repulsive to one order of minds as it was attractive to another Hostility, not to the moral tendencies but to the intellectual fetters of Puritanism, developed itself amongst scholars at the universities, where the students of Patristic literature were familiarised with thoughts very different from those which inspired Calvinistic theology The attack on that theology led to a somewhat uncertain progress in the direction of intellectual freedom, whilst those who carried it on sought, in their reverence for external forms of worship, for that fixed order which was accepted by their opponents as residing in the sphere of intellectual belief English world was entering on a period of unrest and controversy, and for the first time religious controversy, which had found its way into Spenser's Shepherd's Calendar, left its mark on a truly great poem in Lycidas (1637) The lines in which the Laudian system is attacked can hardly be regarded as enhancing the merits of that splendid verse, yet it must be acknowledged that in introducing them Milton had too fine an artistic sense to take notice of the more prominent subjects under discussion at the time, and contented himself with dwelling on the neglect of duty which he ascribed to a hireling clergy The highest poetry refused to touch satirically on such topics as the position of the communion table or the wearing of the surplice

Yet, on the other side, reverence rendered it possible to touch on them, if only by a tour de force The tendency to subordinate thought to words had shown itself in the quaintness of Donne and Andrewes, and it was but a step further in George Herbert when he subordinated thought to symbolism

Mark you the floor? That square and speckled stone

Which looks so firm and strong
Is Patience

And th' other black and grave, wherewith each one

Is checkered all along, Humility

The gentle rising, which on either hand Leads to the Quire above, Is Confidence

But the sweet cement, which in one sure band Ties the whole frame, is Love

And Charity

Such lines appeal to a restricted audience. Later generations find more sympathy with the tolerant spirit of such men as Chillingworth or John Hales, but their writings are too far involved in the special controversies of the day to give them a hold on the universal intelligence of mankind. Sir Thomas Browne, on the other hand, rises into a higher atmosphere, and aims at reconciling faith and thought in words which find an echo in later times.

Deleterious as was the effect of controversy on the literature of the time, the individualistic tendency of the day was favourable to the production of work that has lived The poetry of the second and third quarters of the seventeenth century is remarkable for its panegyrics on individual personages, of which Lycidas furnishes an early and perhaps the best example handling of the subject by Milton is as unlike what Shakespeare's would have been as it is possible to be The personality of Edward King, the hero of the piece, is more than idealised, as it is not in any way brought before our eyes, and the beauty of his character is left to be inferred from its effect upon the mind of the poet, as the beauty of Helen was left to be inferred from the passion it excited with Lycidas, so with the sonnets, the controversial and the panegyrical are found in close connection with one another, but fortunately Milton for the most part reserved his most transient contentions for his prose and the more permanent for his poetry. The arguments about the abominations of Episcopacy or the dements of King Charles-still more, the scurrilous assaults on his literary opponentsfall dead on the ear, whilst the proclamation of the principles of freedom which lighten up the sonnets On the new Forcers of Conscience, To the Lord General Cromwell, or To Sir Henry Vane, is of universal application, and is as fresh now as on the day when they were Not, indeed, that Milton kept his higher thoughts always in abeyance when he addressed himself to political or ecclesiastical argument, as is witnessed by many passages which might be selected out of works otherwise scurrilous and forbidding, and especially by the noble Areopagitica, in which reason appears instinct with imagination

The tendency to idealise individuals was not of any sect or party. It is to be found as strongly on the Royalist as on the Parliamentary side—with this difference, that whereas Royalists preferred to make woman the theme of their verse, more especially by reason of her physical charms, the Parliamentarians preferred to dwell on the heroism and virtue of men. We have to set Carew's

He that loves a rosy cheek
Or a corol lip admires,
Or from star-like eyes doth seek
Fuel to maintain his fires,
As old Time makes these decay,
So his flames must waste away

But a smooth and steadfast mind,
Gentle thoughts, and calm desires,
Hearts with equal love combined,
Kindle never dying fires—
Where these are not, I despise
Lovely cheeks or lips or eyes,

or even Herrick's worship of the 'tempestuous petticoat,' against Milton's

Cromwell, our chief of men, who through a cloud
Not of war only, but detractions rude,
Guided by futh and matchless fortitude,
To peace and truth thy glorious way hast ploughed,

And on the neck of crowned Fortune proud

Hast reared God's trophies, and this work pursued,

While Darwen stream, with blood of Scots imbrued,

And Dunbar field resounds thy pruses loud,
And Worcester's laureate wreath yet much remains
To conquer still, Peace both her victories
No less renowned than War new foes arise,
Threatening to bind our souls with secular chains
Help us to save free conscience from the paw
Of hireling wolves whose gospel is their maw

The echo in the concluding lines, written in 1652, of the scathing attack in the Lyculas, fifteen years before, on those who

For their bellies' sake, Creep and intrude, and climb into the fold, shows us Milton unchanging and unchangeable in his belief that it was possible to free the nobler work of men from earthly complications. So too, in 1654, a few months after the establishment of the Protectorate, he strove in his Second Defence of the English People to invest the coming Parliament in the ideal robes which he found suitable to the Protector. The character of his appeal to the voters on the eve of a general election is surely unparalleled before or since

'Unless by true and sincere piety towards God and man,' he tells them, 'not vain and wordy, but efficacious and active, you drive from your souls all superstitions sprung from ignorance of true and solid religion, you will always have those who will make you their beasts of burden and sit upon your backs and necks, they will put you up for sale as their easily gotten booty, all your victories in war notwithstanding, and make a rich income out of your ignorance and superstition Unless you expel avarice, ambition, luxury from your minds, aye, and luxurious living also from your families, then the tyrant you thought you had to seek externally in the battlefield you will find in your own home-you will find within yourselves a still harder taskmaster, nay there will sprout daily out of your own vitals a numerous brood of intolerable tyrants fallen into such an abyss of easy self-corruption, no one-not even Cromwell himself, nor a whole host of Brutuses, if they could come to life again, could deliver you if they would, or would deliver you if For why should any one then assert they could for you the right of free suffrage, or the power of clecting whom you will at the Parliament? Is it that you should be able, each of you, to elect in the cities men of your faction, or that person in the boroughs, however unworthy, who may have fcasted yourselves most sumptuously or treated the country-people and the boors to the greatest quantity of drink? Then we should have our members of Parliament made for us, not by prudence and authority, but by faction and feeding, we should have vintners and hucksters for city taverns, and graziers and cattle men for the country districts Should one entrust the Commonwealth to those to whom nobody would entrust a matter of private business? Know that as to be free is the same thing exactly as to be pious, wise, just, temperate, self-providing, abstinent from the property of other people, and, in fine, magnanimous and brave, so to be the opposite of all that is the same thing as being a slave, and by the customary judgment of God, and a thoroughly just law of retribution, it comes to pass that a nation that cannot rule and govern itself, but has surrendered itself in slavery to its own lusts, is surrendered also to other masters whom it does not like, and made a slave not only with its will, but also against its will?

One reads no such election addresses now For all that, Milton's burning words—a paraphrase of the saying in Conius, 'Love virtue, she alone is free'-are not for an age but for all time The outward vestments of Puritanism were The strict theologies of Calvin dropping away ism were growing less in repute, and those who most firmly advanced the Puritan standard were growing weary of the doctrine of Parliamentary sovereignty under which its tender years had sheltcred themselves The assurance that constitutions, and, above all, success military and civil, are of small avail to a nation corrupt in heart and self-seeking in its aims is never out of place.

It is this which gives to Milton's political verse and to the better part of his prose a dignity and value which is shared by none of his contemporaries. In 1655, the year after this appeal was penned, Waller wrote of the external glories of the Protector

The sea's our own, and now all nations greet, With bending sails, each vessel of our fleet, Your power resounds as far as winds can blow,' Or swelling sails upon the globe may go, or, better still, of Oliver's desire to succour others than those under his own government

Whether this portion of the world were rent By the rude ocean from the continent, Or thus created, it was sure designed To be the sacred refuge of mankind

Hither the oppressed shall henceforth resort, Justice to crave and succour at your court, And then your Highness, not for ours alone, But for the world's protector shall be known.

So too in Marvell's three panegyrics the first, An Horatian ode upon Cromwell's return from Ireland, written in 1650, combines a strong appreciation of Cromwell's intellectual qualities, whilst retaining the belief that he had tricked Charles to his confusion, the second, The first Anniversary of the Government under his Highness the Lord Protector, written probably in the opening weeks of 1655, is an encomium upon Cromwell's character as well as a defence of his political system, whilst the third, A poem upon the death of his late Highness the Lord Protector, written after Cromwell's death in 1658, treads in Waller's steps, giving honour to the man

Who planted England on the Flandrick shore, And stretched our frontier to the Indian ore

It is possible that disappointment at the course taken by popular feeling drove Milton back into more ideal work Paradise Lost, taken up seriously about the time of the great Protector's death, resumes the burden of Comus central thought is the temptation of a single human soul-a masculine soul drawn down to its fate by woman's weakness In Samson Agonistes and Paradise Regained we find the theme of temptation successfully resisted, which is, after all, no other than the theme of the triumphant virtue of the lady of the Comus the former poem the wiles of an evil-minded woman are defied In the latter such influences, by the nature of the case, do not enter into consideration In Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress we have once more attention called to the struggle of the individual against evil and his escape therefrom, the man painfully emerging—the woman lingering behind and only freeing herself under the conduct of Greatheart, whose character is said—and probably with truth—to have been moulded on that of Cromwell The surroundings of the personages concerned are those of the Calvinistic theology, but the book lives, in spite of this, by the life-like presentation of the allegorical personages which enter upon the stage

The Puritan manifestation in literature, like the Puritan manifestation in the State and nation, had run its triumphant course, though in literature as well as in the nation it was to continue to exercise, when mingled with other elements, a powerful influence. Its decline may be traced to many causes, but above all to the growth of a conviction that it evalted the few at the expense of the many. The highest aim of the Protectorate was the defence of the so-called 'people of God' The highest aim of Puritan literature was the exaltation of the strong at the expense of the weak-of the pre-eminently good at the expense of the more moderately virtuous. It was not Milton's personal misogyny resulting in the substitution of Eve or Dalıla for Juliet and Rosalind, it was the habit of looking for more than was to be achieved by human nature, till the search for ideal beauty and goodness led to contemptuous blindness to the beauty and goodness inherent in our mingled nature Human nature took its revenge both in politics and literature age of Cromwell and Milton passed away, to be succeeded by the rule of Charles II and the dramatists of the Restoration

SAMUEL R. GARDINER.

John Selden.

John Selden (1584-1654) was one of the most illustrious scholars of his time, a learned jurist, a powerful publicist, and a conspicuous political personage He was born 16th December 1584, of a respectable family, at Salvington, near Worthing, in Sussex. After being educated at Chichester and Oxford, he studied law in London, at Clifford's Inn and the Inner Temple Here his learning secured for him the friendship of Camden, Spelman, Sir Robert Cotton, Ben Jonson, Browne, and also of Drayton, to whose Polyolbion he furnished notes By Milton he is spoken of as 'the chief of learned men reputed in this land' As a conveyancer and chamber-counsel he acquired wealth, yet found time for studies at once profound and wide in He wrote his first treatise, Analecton Anglo Britannicon (1606), on the civil government of Britain before the Norman Conquest, when only twenty-two years of age In 1610 appeared his Jana Anglorum Facies Altera (Eng trans 1683), on the history of the laws of England to the death of Henry II, and also The Duello or Single Combat, a history of trial by battle His largest English work, A Treatise on Titles of Honour, was published in 1614, and still continues an authority In 1617 his fame was extended, both at home and abroad, by his Latin work on the gods of the Syrians and the heathen deities mentioned in the Old Testament. In his History of Tythes (1618), by demolishing the divine right of the Church to that tax he gave great offence to the He was summoned to the king's presence, reprimanded, and (no doubt) confuted He was, moreover, called before several members of the formidable High Commission Court, who extracted from him a written declaration of regret for what he had done, but without any retractation of his opinion Several replies appeared, but to these he was not allowed to publish a rejoinder, and the Privy Council suppressed the work itself. In 1621 he suffered a brief imprisonment for advising the Parliament to repudiate King James's doctrine that their privileges were originally royal grants. In 1623 he was elected member for Lancaster, in 1626 for Great Bedwin, and in 1628 for Ludgershall, both in Wilts, and henceforward till his death he took a considerable part in public affairs.

He was sincerely attached to the cause of the Parliament, and as sincerely opposed to the views of the court party and the king, but he was above all things a constitutional lawyer, and derived his ideas of the rights of the subject from the history of the nation, and not from religious fanaticism or metaphysical considerations. Still, he 'loved his ease,' as Clarendon says, and so let things be done without protest of which he did not approve. Yet he often stood up to defend the liberty of the subject In 1628 he was active in the proceedings of the Commons that issued in the Petition of Right, and the year after he was committed to the Tower with Eliot, Holles, and the rest. eight months' rigorous imprisonment he was transferred to the Marshalsea, but soon after was released In 1640 he was chosen member of the Long Parliament for the University of Oxford, and now, when the struggle between the king and the nation began to point towards the fatal rupture, he was suspected of not being zealous enough by such as were themselves perhaps over-zealous Already in 1636 he had dedicated to the king his Mare Clausum (an answer to the Mare Liberum of Grotius and the Dutch claims to fish off the British coasts), and there is evidence that Charles personally looked on him with favour Selden was one of the committee of twenty-four appointed to draw up a remonstrance, and at this point his path first diverged from that of Hyde, yet without their friendship being impaired. He vigorously opposed the policy that led to the expulsion of the bishops from the House of Lords, and finally to the abolition of Episcopacy. Yet he adhered in the main to the cause of the Parliament, driven by the arbitrariness of the king's later measures. He took no part in the impeachment of Strafford, and voted against the Attainder Bill, and, though he furnished precedents for the measures taken against Laud, had no share in his prosecution.

He was as hostile to the 'jure divinoship' of Presbytery as to the high claims of Episcopacy, and was reputed an Erastian He sat as a laymember in the Assembly of Divines at Westminster (1643), and perplexed his clerical colleagues sadly with his irony and his learning Whitelocke records that in the debates he 'spake admirably, and confuted divers of them in their own learning, and sometimes when they had cited a text of Scripture to prove their assertion he would tell them "Perhaps in your little pocket Bibles with gilt leaves (which they would often pull out and read) the translation may be thus, but the Greek or Hebrew signifies thus and thus," and so would silence them? He was reported to have said 'he trusted he was not mad enough or foolish enough to deserve the name of Puritan?

He was appointed keeper of the rolls and records in the Tower in 1644, in 1645 he was appointed one of the twelve commissioners of the Admiralty, and elected master of Trinity Hall at Cambridge, an office he declined. In 1646 he subscribed the Covenant, and the year after the sum of £5000 was voted to him by Parliament in consideration of his services and sufferings, but it seems doubtful if the money was paid He constantly employed his influence in behalf of learning and learned men, and performed great service to both universities, as one of the university visitors (from 1647), he dways used his influence to moderate the tyranny of his fantical colleagues. One of his last public acts was to join in the last effort for a reconciliation between, the king and the Parliament the execution of Charles, of which it is certain he strongly disapproved as both unlawful and inexpedient, he took little share in public matters, and when requested by Cromwell to answer the Eilon Basilike, he refused He died at Whitefriars, 30th November 1654, and was buried in the Temple Church, London

In 1689 i collection of his sayings, entitled Table talk, was published by his amanuensis, who claimed to have enjoyed for twenty years the opportunity of hearing his master's discourse, and to have committed futhfully to writing 'the excellent things that usually fell from him'. It is more by his Table talk than by the works published in his lifetime that Selden is now generally known as a writer. The eulogy by Clarendon shows how highly Selden was respected even by his opponents, and emphasises the contrast between the embarrassed style of his published works and the ease of his spoken utterances 'He was a person whom no character can flatter, or transmit any expressions' equal to his merit and virtue. He was of so stupendous a learning in all kinds and in all languages—as may appear in his excellent writings—that a man would have thought he had been entirely conversant amongst books, and had never spent an hour but in reading and writing, yet his humanity, affability, and courtesy were such, that he would have been thought to have been bred in the best courts, but that his good-nature, charity, and delight in doing good exceeded that breeding. His style in all his writings seems harsh, and sometimes obscure, which is not wholly to be imputed to the abstruse subjects of which he commonly treated, out of the paths trod by other men, but to a little undervaluing the beauty of style, and too much propensity to the language of antiquity, but in his conversation he was the most clear discourser, and had the best faculty of making hard things casy and present to the understanding, of any man that hath been known?

Many of the sententious remarks in Selden's Table-tall are exceedingly acute, others are humorous, while some embody propositions which, though affirmed in familiar conversation, he probably would not have seriously maintained Marriage he pronounces 'a desperate thing the frogs in Esop were extreme wise, they had a great mind to some water, but they would not leap into the well, because they could not get out again' There are not a few satirical observations on the clergy, and plentiful indications of that cautious spirit which distinguished him throughout his career. Johnson, speaking of French Ana, said 'A few of them are good, but we have one book of that kind better than any of them—Selden's Table-talk' Coleridge declared, not without exaggeration, 'There is more weighty bullion sense in this book than I can find in the same number of pages of any uninspired writer' The following are extracts from the Table-talk

He that speaks ill of another, commonly before he is aware, makes himself such a one as he speaks against, for if he had civility or breeding, he would forbear such kind of language

A gallant man is above ill words. An example we have in the old lord of Salisbury, who was a great wise man. Stone had called some lord about court, fool, the lord complains, and has Stone whipped, Stone cries 'I might have called my lord of Salisbury fool often enough, before he would have had me whipped'

Speak not ill of a great enemy, but rather give him good words, that he may use you the better if you chance to fall into his hands. The Spaniard did this when he was dying, his confessor told him, to work him to repentance, how the devil tormented the wicked that went to hell, the Spaniard replying, called the devil my lord. 'I hope my lord the devil is not so cruel.' His confessor reproved him. 'Excuse me,' said the Don, 'for calling him so, I know not into what hands I may fall, and if I happen into his, I hope he will use me the better for giving him good words.'

Humility is a virtue all preach, none practise, and yet everybody is content to hear. The master thinks it good doctrine for his servant, the laity for the clergy, and the clergy for the laity.

There is humilitas quadam in vitio [a faulty excess of humility]. If a man does not take notice of that excellency and perfection that is in himself, how can he be thankful to God, who is the author of all excellency and perfection? Nay, if a man hath too mean an opinion of himself, 'twill render him unserviceable both to God and man

Pride may be allowed to this or that degree, else a man cannot keep up his dignity. In gluttons there must be eating, in drunkenness there must be drinking, 'tis not the eating, nor 'tis not the drinking, that is to be blamed, but the excess. So in pride

A king is a thing men have made for their own sakes, for quietness sake. Just as in a family one man is appointed to buy the meat—if every man should buy, or if there were many buyers, they would never agree, one would buy what the other liked not, or what the other had bought before, so there would be a confusion But that charge being committed to one, he according to his discretion pleases all—If they have not what they would have one day, they shall have it the next, or something as good.

It is a vain thing to talk of an heretic, for a man for his heart can think no otherwise than he does think. In the primitive times there were many opinions, nothing scarce, but some or other held. One of these opinions being embraced by some prince, and received into his kingdom, the rest were condemned as heresies, and his religion, which i as but one of the several opinions, first is said to be orthodox, and so to have continued ever since the apostles.

No man is wiser for his learning it may administer matter to work in, or objects to work upon, but wit and wisdom are born with a man. Most men's learning is nothing but history duly taken up. If I quote Thomas Aquinas for some tenet, and believe it because the school men say so, that is but history. Few men make themselves masters of the things they write or speak.

Oracles ceased presently after Christ, as soon as nobody believed them just as we have no fortune tellers, nor wise men [wizards], when nobody cares for them. Sometimes you have a season for them, when people believe them, and neither of these, I conceive, wrought by the devil.

Dreams and prophecies do thus much good they make a man go on with boldness and courage upon a danger or a mistress. If he obtains, he attributes much to them, if he miscarries, he thinks no more of them, or is no more thought of himself

Nothing is text but what is spoken of in the Bible, and meant there for person and place, the rest is application, which a discreet man may do well, but 'tis his scripture, not the Holy Ghost's

First, in your sermons use your logic, and then your rhetoric rhetoric without logic is like a tree with leaves and blossoms, but no root.

Though some make slight of libels, yet you may see by them how the wind sits as take a straw and throw it up into the air, you shall see by that which way the wind is, which you shall not do by casting up a stone. More solid things do not shew the complexion of the times so well as ballads and libels.

A person of quality came to my chamber in the Temple, and told me he had two devils in his head (I wondered what he meant), and just at that time one of them bid him kill me With that I began to be afraid, and thought he was mad He said he knew I could cure him, and therefore entreated me to give him something, for he was resolved he would go to nobody else I, perceiving what an opinion he had of me, and that 'twas only melancholy that troubled him, took him in hand, warranted him, if he would follow my directions, to cure him in a short time. I desired him to let me be alone about an hour, and then to come again, which he was very willing to. In the meantime I got a card, and lapped it up hand some in a piece of taffeta, and put strings to the taffeta, and when he came, gave it to him to hang about his neck, withal charged him that he should not disorder himself neither with eating nor drinking, but eat very little of supper, and say his prayers duly when he went to bed, and I made no question but he would be well in three or four days. Within that time I went to dinner to his house, and asked him how he did. He said he was much better, but not perfectly well, for in truth he had not dealt clearly with me, he had four devils in his head, and he perceived two of them were gone with that which I had given him, but the other two troubled him still 'Well,' said I, 'I am glad two of them are gone, I make no doubt to get away the other two likewise' So I gave him another thing to hang about his neck. Three days after, he came to me to my chamber, and profest he was now as well as ever he was in his life, and did extremely thank me for the great care I had taken of I, fearing lest he might relapse into the like distemper, told him that there was none but myself and one physician more in the whole town that could cure the devils in the head, and that was Dr Harvey, whom I had prepared, and wished him, if ever he found himself ill in my absence, to go to him, for he could cure his disease as well as myself The gentle man lived many years, and was never troubled after

To quote a modern Dutchman where I may use a classic author, is as if I were to justify my reputation, and I neglect all persons of note and quality that know me, and bring the testimonial of the scullion in the litchen.

They talk (but blasphemously enough) that the Holy Ghost is president of their general councils, when the truth is, the odd man is still the Holy Ghost

To preach long, loud, and damnation, is the way to be cried up. We love a man that damns us, and we run after him again to save us. If a man had a sore leg, and he should go to an honest judicious chirurgeon, and he should only bid him keep it warm, and anoint with such an oil (an oil well known) that would do the cure, haply he would not much regard him, because he knows the medicine beforehand an ordinary medicine. But if he should go to a surgeon that should tell him, Your leg will gangrene within three days, and it must be cut off, and you will die, unless you do something that I could tell you, what listening there would be to this man! Oh, for the Lord's sake, tell me what this is, I will give you any content for your pains

What a gentleman is, 'tis hard with us to define. In other countries he is known by his privileges, in Westminster-Hall he is one that is reputed one, in the court of honour, he that hath arms. The king cannot make a gentleman of blood. What have you said? Nor God Almighty but he can make a gentleman by creation. If you ask which is the better of these two, civilly, the gentleman of blood, morally, the gentleman by creation may be the better, for the other may be a debauched man, this a person of worth

Gentlemen have ever been more temperate in their religion than the common people, as having more reason, the others running in a hurry

The court of England is much altered. At a solemn dancing, first you had the grave measures, then the corruntoes and the galliards, and this is kept up with ccremony, at length to Trenchmore and the cushion dance, and then all the company dance, lord and groom, lidy and kitchen maid, no distinction. So in our court, in Queen Elizabeth's time, gravity and state were kept up. In King James's time things were pretty well.

But in King Charles's time, there has been nothing but Trenchmore and the cushion-dance, omnum gatherum, tolly-polly, hoite come toite.

'Tis a fine thing for children to learn to make verse, but when they come to be men, they must speak like other men, or else they will be laughed at 'Tis ridiculous to speak, or write, or preach in verse. As 'tis good to learn to dance, a man may learn his leg, learn to go handsomely, but 'tis ridiculous for him to dance when he should go

'Tis ridiculous for a lord to print verses, 'tis well enough to make them to please himself, but to make them public is foolish. If a man in a private chamber twirls his band strings, or plays with a rush to please himself, 'tis well enough, but if he should go into Fleet street, and sit upon a stall, and twirl a band string, or play with a rush, then all the boys in the street would laugh at him

Prayer should be short, without giving God Almighty reasons why he should grant this or that, he knows best what is good for us. If your boy should ask you a suit of clothes, and give you reasons, 'otherwise he cannot wait upon you, he cannot go abroad but he will discredit you,' would you endure it? You know it better than he, let him ask a suit of clothes

If a servant that has been fed with good beef, goes into that part of England where salmon is plenty, at first he is pleased with his salmon, and despises his beef, but after he has been there a while, he grows weary of his salmon, and wishes for his good beef again. We have a while been much taken with this praying by the spirit, but in time we may grow weary of it, and wish for our Common Prayer.

The presbyter with his elders about him, is like a young tree fenced about with two, or three, or four stakes, the stakes defend it, and hold it up, but the tree only prospers and flourishes it may be some willow stake may bear a leaf or two, but it comes to nothing Lay elders are stakes, the presbyter the tree that flourishes

Religion is like the fashion one man wears his doublet slashed, another laced, another plain, but every man has a doublet. So every man has his religion. We differ about trimming

Men say they are of the same religion for quietness sake, but if the matter were well examined you would scarce find three anywhere of the same religion in all points

There's all the reason in the world divines should not be suffered to go a hair beyond their bounds, for fear of breeding confusion, since there now be so many religions on foot. The matter was not so narrowly to be looked after when there was but one religion in Christendom the rest would cry him down for an heretic, and there was nobody to side with him

The following passage on the value of doubt and free inquiry is from the preface to Selden's History of Tythes

For the old sceptiques that never would profess that they had found a truth, yet shewed the best way to search for any, when they doubted as well of what those of the dogmatical sects too credulously received for infallible principles, as they did of the newest con clusions they were indeed questionless too nice, and deceived themselves with the numbleness of their own sophisms, that permitted no kind of established truth But plainly he that avoids their disputing levity, yet, being able, takes to himself their liberty of inquiry, is in the only way that in all kinds of studies leads and lies open even to the sanctuary of truth, while others, that are servile to common opinion and vulgar suppositions, can rarely hope to be admitted nearer than into the base court of her temple, which too speciously often counterfeits her impost sanctuary

The chief of Selden's twenty seven separate publications, besides those already mentioned, are Marmora Arundelian's (1624), on the marbles brought that year from Smyrna and Greece by the Earl of Arundel's agents, and three books on Hebrew law and usages in which as in all his biblical studies, he is inevitably more learned than critical. His works were collected by Dr Wilkins, and published in 1726 in three folio volumes. See the biography prefixed to that edition, Aiken's Lives of Selden and Usher (1811) G. W. Johnson's Memoir (1835), and S. H. Reynolds's introduction to the Clarendon Press edition of the Table talk (1892).

John Hales (1584-1656), 'the Ever-memorable,' is usually classed with Chillingworth as a prominent defender of rational and tolerant principles in religion Born at Bath, he was bred at Corpus Christi, Oxford, and became a fellow of He was highly distinguished for his knowledge of Greek, on which he was appointed lecturer at Oxford in 1612 Four years afterwards he went to Holland as chaplain to Sir Dudley Carleton, ambassador at The Hague, and on this occasion he attended for four months the meetings of the famous Synod of Dort (November 1618-May 1619), the proceedings of which are recorded in his published letters to Sir Dudley Till this time he held the Calvinistic opinions in which he had been educated, but the arguments of the Arminian champion Episcopius, or his view of contentious orthodoxy and the conviction that neither side possessed a monopoly of truth, made him, in his own phrase as reported by the editor of the Golden Remains, 'bid John Calvin good-night' His letters from Dort are characterised by Lord Clarendon as 'the best memorial of the ignorance, and passion, and animosity, and injustice of that convention? Although the eminent learning and abilities of Hales would certainly have led to high preferment in the Church, he chose rather to live in studious retirement, and accordingly withdrew to Eton College, where he had a private fellowship under his friend Sir Henry Savile as provost was no recluse he delighted in the conversation of Chillingworth and Falkland, of Ben Jonson and His famous Tract concerning Schism and Schismatics (c. 1636), in which the bad effects of episcopal ambition are freely discussed, greatly displeased Laud, but Hales defended himself so well in a letter and at a conference that Laud in 1639 gave him a prebendal stall at Windsor 1649 he was deprived of his offices for refusing to take the 'engagement,' or oath of fidelity to the Commonwealth of England, as then established without a king or House of Lords His ejection reduced him to such straits that at length he was under the necessity of selling for £700 the greater part of his library, on which he had expended £2500, though from a spirit of independence he refused to accept the bounty of his The learning, abilities, and amiable disposition of John Hales are spoken of in the highest terms not only by Clarendon, but by Pearson, Heylin, Marvell, and Stillingfleet He is styled by Anthony Wood 'a walking library,' and Pearson considered him to be 'a man of as great a sharpness, quickness, and subtilty of wit as ever this or perhaps any nation bred. His industry did strive, if it were possible, to equal the largeness of his capacity, whereby he became as great a master of polite, various, and universal learning as ever yet conversed with books' His extensive knowledge he cheerfully communicated to others, and his liberal, obliging, and charitable disposition made him a determined foe to intolerance in religious matters. Clarendon says that 'nothing troubled him more than the brawls which were grown from religion, and he therefore exceedingly detested the tyranny of the Church of Rome, more for their imposing uncharitably upon the consciences of other men, than for the errors in their own opinions' Aubrey, who saw him at Eton after his sequestration, describes him as 'a pretty little man, sanguine, of a cheerful countenance, very gentle and courteous?

The following is a fragment of a sermon, preached at The Hague in 1619, on the folly and wickedness of duelling, a subject on which Hales was in advance of some eminent Continental Christians of the present day

Murther, though all be abominable, yet there are degrees in it, some is more hamous then other Gross, malicious, premeditated, and wilful murther are by our laws, so far as humane wisdom can provide, sufficiently prevented but murders done in haste, or besides the intent of him that did it, or in point of honour, and reputation, these find a little too much favour, or laws in this respect are somewhat defective, both in preventing that it be not done, and punishing it when it is done, men have thought themselves wiser then God, presuming to moderate the unnecessary severity (as they seem to think) of his laws And hence it comes to pass, that in military companies, and in all great cities and places of mart and concourse, few moneths, yea, few weeks pass without some instance and example of bloudshed, either by sudden quarrel, or by challenge to duel and single combat How many examples in a short space have we seen of young men, men of hot and fiery disposition, mutually provoking and disgracing each other, and then taking themselves bound in high terms of valour and honour, to end their quarrels by their swords? That therefore we may the better discover the unlawfulness of challenge and private combat, let us a little enquire and examine in what cases bloud may lawfully, and without offence, be shed, that so we may see where, amongst these, single combat may find its place.

To come then unto the question of duels, both by the light of reason and by the practise of men it doth appear that there is no case wherein subjects may privately seek each others lives there are extant the laws of the Jews, framed by God himself, the laws of the Roman Empire, made partly by the Ethnick, partly by Christian princes, a great part of the laws of Sparta and Athens (two warlike common wealths, especially the former) lie dis persed m our books yet amongst them all is there not a law or custom that permits this liberty to subjects the reason of it, I conceive, is very plain, the principal thing, next under Go I, by which a common wealth doth stand, is the authority of the magistrate, whose proper end is to compose and end quarrels between man and man, upon what occasion soever they grow, for were men peaceable, were men not injurious one to another, there were no use of government wherefore to permit men in private to try their own rights, or to avenge their own wrongs, and so to decline the sentence of the magistrate, is quite to cut off all use of authority deed it hath been sometimes seen that the event of a battel, by consent of both armies, hath been put upon single combat, to avoid further effusion of bloud, but combats betwixt subjects for private causes, till these latter ages of the world, was never allowed yet, I must confess, the practise of it is very ancient for Cain, the second man in the world, was the first duelist, the first that ever challenged the feild. In the fourth of Genesis the text saith, that Cun spake unto his brother, and when they were in the feild, he arose and slew him Septuagint, to make the sense more plain, do add another clause, and tell us what it was he said unto his brother, διήλθωμιν εί τὸ πιδίεν, Let us go out into the feild, and when they were in the feild, he arose and slew him Let us go out into the feild, it is the very form and proper language of a challenge. Many times indeed our gallants can formalize in other words, but evermore the substance and usually the very words are no other but these of Cain, Let us go out into the feild. Abel I perswade my self understood them not as a challenge, for had he so done, he would have made so much use of his discretion as to have refused it, yet can we not chuse but acknowledge a secret judgment of God in this, that the words of Cain should still be so religiously kept till this day, as a proem and introduction to that action, which doubtless is no other then what Cain's was. When therefore our gallants are so ready to challange the feild, and to go into the feild, let them but remember whose words they use, and so accordingly think of their action Again, notwithstanding duels are of so antient and worshipful a parentage, yet could they never gain so good acceptance as to be permitted, much less to be counted lawful in the civil part of the world, till barbarism had over ran it About five or six hundred years after Christ, at the fall of the Roman Empire, aboundance of rude and barbarous people brake in and possest the civiller part of the world, who abolishing the ancient laws of the empire, set up many strange customs in their rooms. Amongst the rest, for the determining of quarrels that might arise in case of doubtful title, or of false accusation, or the like, they put themselves upon many unusual forms of trial, as, to handle red hot iron, to walk bare foot on burning coals, to put their hands and feet in scalding water, and many other of the like nature, which are reckoned up by Hottoman, a French lawyer for they presumed so far on Gods providence, that if the party accused were innocent, he might do any of these without any smart or harm. In the same cases, when by reason of unsufficient and doubtful evidence, the judges could not proceed to sentence, as sometimes it falls out, and the parties contending would admit of no reasonable composition, their manner was to permit them to try it out by their swords, that so the conquerour might be thought to be in the right. They permitted, I say, thus to do, for at the best 'twas but a permission to prevent farther mischeif, for to this end sometimes some known abuses are tolerated so God permitted the Jews upon sleight occasions to put their wives away, because he saw that otherwise their exorbitant lusts would not be bounded within these limits which he in Paradise in the beginning had set.

There is an air of modernity in his essay on 'The Method of Reading Profane History,' from which this is a paragraph

One thing more, ere I leave this head, I will admonish you of It is a common scholical errour to fill our papers and note books with observations of great and famous events, either of great battels, or civil broiles and The expedition of Hercules his off spring contentions for the recovery of Pcloponnese, the building of Rome, the attempt of Regulus against the great serpent of Bagradas, the Punick Wars, the ruine of Carthage, the death of Cresar, and the like Mean while things of ordinary course and common life gain no room in our paper books. Petronius wittily and sharply complain'd against scholemasters in his times, in which he wiselyreproves the errour of those, who truining up of youth in the practise of rhetorick never suffered them to practise their wits in things of use, but in certain strange supralunary arguments, which never fell within the sphere This complaint is good against of common action. divers of those who travel in history For one of the greatest reasons that so many of them thrive so little, and grow no wiscr men, is because they sleight things of ordinary course, and observe onely great matters of more How doth it benefit a man who note, but less use. lives in peace to observe the art how Casar managed wars? or by what cunning he aspired to the monarchy? or what advantages they were that gave Scipio the day against Hannibal? These things may be known, not because the knowledge of these things is useful, but because it is an imputation to be ignorant of them, their greatest use for you being onely to furnish out your dis-Let me therefore advise you in reading to have a care of those discourses which express domestick and private actions, especially if they be such wherein your self purposes to venture your fortunes. I or if you rectific a little your conceit, you shall see that it is the same wisdome which manages private business and State affairs, and that the one is acted with as much folly and ease as the other. If you will not believe men, then look into our colledges, where you shall see that I say not the plotting for an Headship (for that is now become a court business), but the contriving of a bursership of twenty nobles a year is many times done with as great a portion of suing, siding, supplanting, and of other courtlike arts, as the gaining of the secretary's place, onely the difference of the persons it is which makes the one comical, the other tragical To think that there is more visdom placed in these specious matters then in private carriages, is the same errour as if you should think there were more art required to paint a king then a country gentleman whereas our Dutch pieces may serve to con fute you, wherein you shall see a cup of Rhenish-wine, a dish of radishes, a brass pan, an Holland cheese, the fisher men selling fish at Scheveling, or the kitchen maid spitting a loin of mutton, done with as great delicacy and choiceness of art as can be expressed in the delincation of the greatest monarch in the world

This is his account of a breeze (threatening to issue in a duel) in the Synod of Dort

Upon Tuesday the 13 of this present in the evening, for the debating of certain particular points of controversy belonging to the first Article, the Synod came together in private It hath been lately questioned how Christ is said to be fundamentum electionis doctrine generally received by the Contra Remonstrant in this point is that God first of all resolved upon the salvation of some singular persons and in the second place upon Christ as a mean to bring this decree to pass. So that with them God the Father alone is the author of our election, and Christ only the executioner Others on the contrary teach that Christ is so to be held funda mentum elections as that he is not only the executioner of election, but the author and the procurer of it for proof of which they bring the words of the Apostle to the Ephesians the first chapter, elegit nos in Christo ante jacia mundi fundamenta. The exposition of this text was the especial thing discust at this tening and some taught that Christ was fundamentum electionis because he was primus electorum, or because he is fundamentum electorum, but not electionis, or because he is fundamentum beneficiorum, which descend upon us, others brookt none of those restraints. D Gomarus stands for the former sentence, and in defence of it had said many things on Friday This night Martinius of Breme being required to speak his mind, signified to the Synod, that he made some scruple concerning the doctrine pas sant about the manner of Christs being fundamentum electionis, and that he thought Christ not only the effector of our election, but also the author and procurer Gomarus, who owes the Synod a shrewd turn, and then I fear me began to come out of debt, presently, as soon as Martinius had spoken, starts up and tells the Synod, ego hanc rem in me recipio, and therewithall casts his glove, and challenges Martinius with this proverb, Ecce Rhodum, ecce saltum, and requires the Synod to grant them a duel, adding that he knew Martinius could say nothing in refutation of that doctrine Martinius, who goes in æquipace with Gomarus in learning and a little before him for his discretion, easily digested this affront, and after some few words of course, by the wisdom of the præses matters seemed to be a little pacified, and so according to the custom the Synod with prayer con-Zeal and devotion had not so well allayed Gomarus his choler, but immediately after prayers he renewed his challenge and required combat with Martinius again, but they parted for that night without blowes Martinius, as it seemes, is somewhat favourable to some tenents of the Remonstrants concerning repro bation, the latitude of Christs merit, the salvation of infants, &c., and to bring him to some conformity was there a private meeting of the forreign divines upon Wednesday morning in my Lord Bishops lodging, in which thus much was obtained, that though he would not leave his conclusions, yet he promised moderation and temper in such manner, that there should be no dissention in the Synod by reason of any opinion of his

His principal work, the Golden Remans, mainly sermons and miscellanies, was edited with a Life by Bishop Pearson (1657), reprinted and extended in 1673 and 1683. In 1765 an edition of his works was published by Lord Hailes, who modernised the language, greatly to the disgust of Dr Johnson. 'An author's language, sir,' said he, 'is a characteristical part of his composition, and is also characteristical of the age in which he writes. Be sides, sir, when the language is changed, we are not sure that the sense is the same. No, sir, I am sorry Lord Hailes has done thus.' See Tulloch's Rational Theology in England, vol. 1. (1872).

Robert Sanderson (1587-1663), the son of the squire of Gilthwaite Hall, was born more probably at Sheffield than at Rotherham, was cducated anyhow at Rotherham and at Lincoln College, Oxford (where he became fellow and reader in logic), and held the living of Boothby-Pagnell for forty years in spite of sequestration and a short imprisonment during the Civil War In 1642 he was made Regius Professor of Divinity at Oxford, was ejected by the Parhamentary visitors of 1648, but was reinstated after the Restoration, and in October 1660 became Bishop of Lincoln His Logica Artis Compendium (1615) was often reprinted, and was praised by Sir William Hamilton as 'the excellent work of an accomplished logician' The Sermons of Sanderson are also admired for vigour and clearness of thought, he is the author of the second preface to the Prayer-Book ('It bath been the wisdom'), and in virtue of his Nine Cases of Conscience Resolved (1678) Sanderson has been ranked as the greatest of English The cases selected are questions of casuists the Sabbath, the engagement (the royalist compact of 1647 between the king and the Scots against the Parliament), the liturgy, a rash vow, marrying with a recusant (i.e. a Roman Catholic), a bond taken in the king's name, unlawful love, a military life (under what conditions it is lawful), a matrimonial contract, and of usury On some of these points most reasonable Christians would agree, as on some of them High Churchmen and Puritans would inevitably differ widely. He denies that marrying a daughter to a 'professed Papist' is in itself unlawful, but points out the many 'evil consequents' which render it inexpedient to conclude such a marriage, affirming that in one respect the danger is greater to marry with a Papist than with one of a worse religion, for that the main principle of his religion as a Papist is more destructive of the comfort of a conjugal society than are the principles of most heretics, 'yea, than those of Pagans or atheists' (viz the doctrine that there is no salvability but in the Church) How far the Churchman of that date might differ from the Puritan may be seen from his answer to two of the questions raised about the Sabbath

I Concerning the name Sabbatum or Sabbath I thus conceive I That in Scripture, antiquity, and all ecclesiastical writers, it is constantly appropriated to the day of the Jews' Sabbath or Saturday, and not at all till of late years used to signify our Lord's Day or Sunday 2 That to call Sunday by the name of the Sabbath day, rebus sie stantibus, may for sundry respects be allowed in the Christian Church without any great inconveniency, and that therefore men otherwise sober and moderate ought not to be censured with too much severity, neither charged with Judaism, if sometimes they so speak. 3 That yet for sundry other respects it were perhaps much more expedient if the word Sabbath in that notion were either not at all or else more sparingly used

II Concerning the name Dominica, or the Lord's Day 1 That it was taken up in memory of our Lord Christ's resurrection, and the great work of our redemption accomplished therein 2 That it hath warrant from the Scripture, Apoc 1 10, and hath been of long continued use in the Christian Church, to signify the first day of the week or Sunday

III Concerning the name Dies Solis or Sunday I That it is taken from the courses of the planets, as the names of the other days are the reason whereof is to be learned from astronomers 2. That it hath been used generally, and of long time, in most parts of the world 3. That it is not justly chargeable with heathenism, and that it proceedeth from much weakness at the least, if not rather superstition, that some men condemn the use of it as profane, heathenish, or inclayful

IV Of the fitness of the aforesaid three names com pared one with another First, that according to the several matter or occasions of speech each of the three may be fitter in some respect, and more proper to be used than either of the other two As, viz I The name Sabbath, when we speak of a time of rest induterminate and in general, without reference to any particular day, and the other two, when we speak determinately of that day which is observed in the Christian Church Of which two again, 2 That of the Lord's Day is fitter in the theological and ecclesi astical, and, 3 That of Sunday in the civil, popular, and common use Secondly Yet so as that none of the three be_condemned as utterly unlawful, whatso ever the matter or occasion be, but that every man be left to his Christian liberty herein, so long as superior authority doth not restrain it. Provided ever, that what he doth herein, he do it without vanity or affectation in himself, or without uncharitable judging or despising his brother that doth otherwise than him self doth

To the Third Question. In this matter, touching recreations to be used on the Lord's Day, much need not be said, there being little difficulty in it, and his Majesty's last declaration in that behalf having put it past disputation. I say then,

I For the thing That no man can reasonably condemn the moderate use of lawful recreations upon the Lord's Day, as simply and de toto genere unlawful

2 For the kind Albeit there can be no certain rules given herein, as in most indifferent things it cometh to pass by reason of the infinite variety of circumstances to fit with all particular cases, but that still much must be left to private discretion yet for some directions in this matter, respect would be had in the choice of our recreations, I To the public laws of the state Such games or sports as are by law prohibited, though in themselves otherwise lawful, being unlawful to them that are under the obedience of the law 2 Fo the condition of the person. Walking and discoursing with men of liberal education is a pleasant recreation, it is no way delightsome to the ruder sort of people, who scarce account any thing a sport which is not loud and boisterous 3. To the effects of the recreations themselves. Those being the meetest to be used which give the best refreshing to the body, and leave the least impression in the mind. In which respect, shooting, leaping, pitching the bar, stool ball, &c. are rather to be chosen than dicing, carding, &c.

3 For the use. That men would be exhorted to use their recreation and pastimes upon the Lord's Day in godly and commendable sort. For which purpose, amongst others, these cautions following would be remembered I That they be used with great moderation, as at all other times, so especially and much more upon the Lord's Day 2 That they be used at seasonable times, not in time of divine service, nor at such hours as are appointed by the master of the house whereunto they belong for private devotions within his own house His Majesty's declaration limiteth men's liberty this way till after evensong be ended 3 That they be so used as that they may rather make men the fitter for God's service the rest of the day, and for the works of their vocations the rest of the week, than any way hinder or disable them there unto, by over wearying the body or immoderately affecting the mind 4. That they use them not doubtingly, for whatsoever is not of faith is sin. He there fore that is not satisfied in his own judgment that he may lawfully and without sin use bodily recreations on the Lord's Day, ought by all means to forbear the use thereof, lest he should sin against his own con 5 That they be severer towards themselves than towards other men in the use of their Christian liberty herein, not making their own opinion or practice a rule to their brethren. In this as in all indifferent things a wise and charitable man will in godly wisdom deny himself many times the use of that liberty, which in a godly charity he dare not deny to his brother

Thomas Hobbes.

Thomas Hobbes, called from his birthplace 'the Malmesbury philosopher,' was born 5th April Of him it may safely be said that no thinker or writer of the seventeenth century attracted more attention in his own time, and that few exercised a wider or more marked influence on speculation in the following age. His mother's alarm at the approach of the Spanish Armada is said to have hastened his birth and to have been the cause of a constitutional timidity which beset him through After stüdying for five years at Magdalen Hall in Oxford, where his mind was not stirred by the usual courses of Aristotelian logic and physics, he travelled in 1610 through France, Italy, and Germany as tutor to Lord William Cavendish, afterwards second Earl of Devon-On returning to England he continued to reside with him as his secretary, and he became intimate with Lord Bacon, Lord Herbert of

Cherbury, and Ben Jonson He now studied the classical historians and poets, and produced a translation of Thucydides (1628) His pupil and friend dying in 1628, two years after his father, Hobbes spent eighteen months at Paris, and perhaps also at Venice, as tutor to the son of Sir Gervase Clifton In 1631 he undertook to superintend the education of his first pupil's son, the third Earl of Devonshire, with whom he set off in 1634 on a three years' tour through France and

Italy At Florence he became intimate with Galileo, astronomer the and elsewhere held communication with notable scholars and After thinkers. his return to England in 1637 he resided in the Earl's family at Chatsworth in Derbyshire. He now devoted himself to study, interrupted, however, by the political contentions of the times. His pamphlet De Corpore Politico seemed to 'bring him into danger of his life,' and he deemed it necessary in the autumn of 1640 to retire to Paris, where he lived on terms of intimacy with Mersenne, Gassendi, and other learned men of the day

From the Picture by J. M. Wrigh in the National Portrait Gallery

Here he engaged in a controversy about the quadrature of the circle, and in 1647 he was appointed mathematical instructor to Charles, Prince of Wales, then in the French capital. Already he had commenced the publication of those works which he sent forth in succession with the view of curbing the spirit of freedom in England by showing the philosophical foundation of despotic monarchy. The first of them was originally printed in Latin at Paris, in 1642, under the title of Elementa Philosophica de Cive, and was translated into English, in 1650, as Philosophical Ruaiments concerning Government and Society The principles maintained in it were more fully discussed in his larger work, Leviatian or the Matter, Form, and Power of a Commonwealth, Ecclesiastical and Civil (1651). Man is here represented as a selfish and ferocious animal, requiring the strong hand of despotism to keep him in check, and all notions of right and wrong are made to depend upon views of self-interest alone. Of this Selfish System of moral philosophy Hobbes was indeed the great champion, both in the Leviathan and more particularly in his small Treatise on Human Nature, published in 1650 The freedom with which theological subjects were handled in the Leviathan, its rationalistic criticism of Scripture, and its reduction of religion to a department of state morality, as well as its offensive political views occasioned a great outcry against the author, particularly among the royalist clergy This led Charles to dissolve his connection with the philosopher, who, according to Lord Clarendon, 'was compelled secretly to fly out of Paris, the justice having endeavoured to apprehend him, and soon after escaped England into (1651), where he never received any disturbance.' 1653 he resumed his relations with Devonshire household, but remained always in London, and became intimate with Selden, Cowley, and Dr Harvey, the discoverer of the circulation of the blood In 1054 he published a short but admirably clear and comprehensive Letter upon Liverty and Necessity, where the doctrine of the self-determining power of the will is opposed with a subtlet and profundity unsurpassed in any subsequent writer on that much agreated question-indeed, he was one of the first to expound clearly the doctrine of philosophical necessity. On this subject a long controversy took place between him and Bishop Bramhall of Londonderry Here he fought with the skill of a master, but in a mathematical dispute with Dr Wallis, professor of geometry at Oxford, which lasted twenty years, he fairly went beyond his depth; he had not begun to study mathematics till the age of forty, and, like other late learners, greatly overestimated his knowledge. He supposed himself to have discovered the quadrature of the circle, and dogmatically upheld his claim in the face of the clearest refutation. In this controversy personal feeling, according to the custom of the time, appeared without disguise Hobbes having published a sarcastic piece entitled Six Lessons to the Professors of Mathematics in Oxford, Wallis retorted by administering, in 1656, Due Correction for Mr Hobbes, or School-discipline for not Saying Here he debates with the his Lessons Right philosopher in this unceremonious strain seems, Mr Hobbes, that you have a mind to say your lesson, and that the mathematic professors of Oxford should hear you You are too old to learn, though you have as much need as those that be younger, and yet will think much to be What moved you to say your lessons in English, when the books against which you do chiefly intend them were written in Latin? Was it chiefly for the perfecting your natural rhetoric, whenever you thought it convenient to repair to Billingsgate? You found that the oyster-women could not teach you to rail in Latin persons needed not a sight of your ears, but could tell by the voice what kind of creature brayed in your books you dared not have said this to their faces' When Charles II was restored to the throne he conferred on Hobbes an annual pension of £100, very irregularly paid, but, notwithstanding this and other marks of the royal favour, much odium continued to prevail against him and his doctrines The Leviathan and De Cive were censured in Parliament in 1666, and also drew forth many printed replies Among the authors of these the most distinguished was Lord Clarendon, whose Brief View and Survey of the Dangerous and Pernicious Errors to Church and State, in Mr Hobbes's Book, entitled Leviathan, was posthumously published in 1676 In 1672, in his eighty fifth year, Hobbes wrote his own Life in Latin verse! He next appeared as a translator of Homer, publishing a version of four books of the Odyssey, which was so well received that in 1675 he completed his translation, as well as one of the whole Iliad, Here, according to Pope, 'Hobbes has given us a correct explanation of the sense in general, but for particulars and circumstances, he continually lops them, and often omits the most beautiful' Yet three large editions were required within less than ten years His prose version of Thucydides—his first work, and awkwardly literal-was long the standard English translation This work was undertaken by him 'from an honest desire of preventing, if possible, those disturbances in which he was apprehensive that his country would be involved, by shewing, in the history of the Peloponnesian war, the fatal consequences of intestine troubles' At Hardwick and Chatsworth, where he spent the remainder of his days, Hobbes continued to write books, the principal of which, Behemoth, or a History of the Civil Wars from 1640 to 1660, issued surreptitiously from the press just before his death at Hardwick Hall, 4th December 1679, in his ninety-second year. He is buried in the chancel of Hault-Hucknall church, near Chesterfield

Hobbes is described by Lord Clarendon as one for whom he 'had always had a great esteem, as a man who, besides his eminent parts of learningand knowledge, hath been always looked upon as a man of probity and a life free from scandal' It was a saying of Charles II in reference to the opposition which the doctrines of Hobbes met from the clergy, that 'he was a bear against whom the Church played their young dogs in order to exercise them' In his later years he became morose and impatient of contradiction, growing infirmities and too much solitude increasing his natural arrogance and contempt for the opinions of other men. He at no time read extensively Homer, Virgil, Thucydides, and Euclid were his favourite authors, and he used to say that, 'if he had read as much as other men, he should have been as ignorant as they' Macaulay pronounced his style 'more precise and luminous than has ever been employed by any other metaphysical writer' In date Hobbes falls between Bacon and Locke, but in philosophic ideas and temper he is widely separated from either is by his contributions to scientific psychology, ethics, and political theory that he takes rank as a profound original thinker His ethical theory, based on pure selfishness and the arbitrary prescriptions of a sovereign power, negatively determined ethical speculation in England for a hundred years, all the great moralists wrote, directly or indirectly, as his opponents But his political absolutism is the most famous part of his specula-The state of nature, he argues, is a state of war and insecurity Moved by a desire to escape from the intolerable evils of such a condition, human beings enter into a species of contract by which they surrender then individual rights, and constitute a state under an absolute sovereignty The sovereign power need not be monarchical, but, whatever form it assumes, it is absolute and irresponsible Hobbes was regarded by his contemporaries and the writers of the next age as the prince of unbelievers, a sort of father of lies, and even, erroneously, as an atheist. Among those who ranged themselves against his philosophy were Cumberland, Cudworth, Shaftesbury, Clarke, Butler, Hutcheson, Lord Kames, Adam Smith, Dugald Stewart, and Stewart's successor, Thomas Brown

From the Introduction to 'Leviathan.'

Nature, the art whereby God hath made and governs the world, is by the 'art' of man, as in many other things, so in this also imitated, that it can make an artificial animal. For seeing life is but a motion of limbs, the beginning whereof is in some principal part within, why may we not say that all 'automata' (engines that move themselves by springs and wheels as doth a watch) have an artificial life? For what is the heart but a 'spring,' and the nerves but so many 'strings,' and the joints but so many 'whicels,' giving motion to the whole body, such as was intended by the artificer? 'Art' goes yet further, imitating that rational and most excellent work of nature, 'man' For by art is created that great 'Leviathan' called a 'Commonwealth,' or 'State,' in Latin Civitas, which is but an artificial man, though of greater stature and strength than the natural, for whose protection and defence it was intended, and in which the sovereignty is an artificial 'soul,' as giving life and motion to the whole body, the magistrates, and other officers of judicature and execution, artificial 'joints,' reward and punish ment, by which fastened to the sent of the sovereignty every joint and member is moved to perform his duty, are the 'nerves,' that do the same in the body natural, the wealth and riches of all the particular members are the 'strength,' salus populi, the people's safety, its business,' counsellors, by whom all things needful for it to know are suggested unto it, are the 'memory,' equity, and laws, an artificial 'reason' and 'will,' con cord, 'health,' sedition, 'sickness,' and civil war, 'denth' Lastly, the pacts and covenants, by which the parts of this body politic were at first made, set together, and united, resemble that 'fiat,' or the 'let us make man,' pronounced by God in the creation. To describe the nature of this artificial man, I will consider-First, the matter thereof, and the artificer, both which is 'min' Secondly, how and by what covenants it is made, what are the rights and just power or authority of a 'sovereign,' and what it is that 'preserveth' or 'dissolveth' it Thirdly, what is a 'Christian common wealth', Lastly, what is the 'kingdom of darkness'

On the State of War Universal.

So that in the nature of man, we find three principal causes of quarrel First, competition, secondly, dishdence, thirdly, glory The first maketh men invade for gain, the second for safety, and the third for reputation The first use violence, to make themselves masters of other men's persons, wives, children, and cattle, the second, to defend them, the third, for trifles, as a word, a smile, a different opinion, and any other sign of undervalue, either direct in their persons, or by reflection in their kindred, their friends, their nation, their profession, or their name

Hereby it is manifest that during the time men live without a common power to keep them all in awe, they are in that condition which is called war, and such a war as is of every man, against every man For 'war' consisteth not in battle only, or the act of fighting, but in a tract of time wherein the will to contend by battle is sufficiently known and therefore the notion of 'time' is to be considered in the nature of war, as it is in the nature of weather. For as the nature of foul weather lieth not in a shower or two of rain, but in an inclination thereto of many days together, so the nature of war consisteth not in actual fighting, but in the known disposition thereto during all the time there is no assurance to the contrary. All other time is 'peace.'

Whatsoever therefore is consequent to a time of war, where every man is enemy to every man, the same is consequent to the time wherein men live without other security than what their own strength and their own invention shall furnish them withal. In such con dition there is no place for industry, because the fruit thereof is uncertain, and consequently no culture of the earth, no navigation, nor use of the commodities that may be imported by sea, no commodious building, no instruments of moving and removing such things as require much force, no knowledge of the face of the earth, no account of time, no arts, no letters, no society, and, which is worst of all, continual fear and danger of yiolent death, and the life of man, solitary, poor, nasty, brutish, and short

It may seem strange to some man that has not well weighed these things, that Nature should thus dissociate and render men apt to invade and destroy one another, and he may therefore, not trusting to this inference, made from the passions, desire perhaps to have the same confirmed by experience Let him therefore con sider with himself, when taking a journey, he arms himself, and seeks to go well accompanied, when going to sleep, he locks his doors, when even in his house, he locks his chests, and this when he knows there be laws, and public, officers, armed, to revenge all injuries shall be done him, what opinion he has of his fellow subjects, when he rides armed, of his fellow citizens, when he locks his doors, and of his children and ser vants, when he locks his chests Does he not there as much accuse mankind by his actions as I do by my words? But neither of us accuse man's nature in it. The desires and other passions of man are in themselves no No more are the actions that proceed from those passions, till they know a law that forbids them, which till laws be made they cannot know, nor can any law be made till they have agreed upon the person that shall make it

It may peradventure be thought there was never such a time nor condition of war as this, and I believe it was never generally so over all the world, but there are many places where they live so now. For the savage people in many places of America, except the govern ment of small families, the concord whereof dependeth on natural lust, have no government at all, and live at this day in that brutish manner, as I said before Howsoever, it may be perceived what manner of life there would be where there were no common power to fear, by the manner of life which men that have formerly lived under a peaceful government, use to degenerate into in a civil war.

But though there had never been any time wherein particular men were in a condition of war one against another, yet in all times kings and persons of sovereign authority, because of their independency, are in continual jealousies and in the state and posture of gladiators, having their weapons pointing, and their eyes fixed on one another, that is, their forts, garrisons, and guns upon the frontiers of their kingdoms, and continual spies upon their neighbours, which is a posture of war But because they uphold thereby the industry of their subjects, there does not follow from it that misery which accompanies the liberty of particular men.

To this war of every man, against every man, this also is consequent—that nothing can be unjust. The notions of right and wrong, justice and injustice, have there no place. Where there is no common power, there is no law where no law, no injustice. Force and fraud are in war the two cardinal virtues. Justice and injustice are none of the faculties neither of the body nor mind. If they were, they might be in a man that were alone in the world, as well as his senses and passions. They are qualities that relate to men in society, not in solitude. It is consequent also to the same condition, that there be no propriety, no dominion, no 'mine' and 'thine' distinct, but only that to be every man's that he can get, and for so long as he can keep it. And thus much for the ill condition which man by mere nature is actually placed in, though with a possibility to come out of it, consisting partly in the passions, partly in his reason.

The passions that incline men to peace are fear of death, desire of such things as are necessary to commodious living, and a hope by their industry to obtain them. And reason suggesteth convenient articles of peace, upon which men may be drawn to agreement. These articles are they which otherwise are called the Laws of Nature whereof I shall speak more particularly in the two following chapters (From Leviathan)

On Antiquity

In that part which treateth of a Christian commonwealth there are some new doctrines which, it may be, in a state where the contrary were already fully determined, were a fault for a subject without leave to divulge, as being an usurpation of the place of a teacher. But in this time, that men call not only for peace, but also for truth, to offer such doctrines as I think true, and that manifestly tend to peace and loyalty, to the consideration of those that are yet in deliberation, is no more but to offer new wine to be put into new casks, that both may be preserved together. And I suppose that then, when novelty can breed no trouble nor disorder in a state, men are not generally so much inclined to the reverence of antiquity as to prefer ancient errors before new and well proved truth

There is nothing I distrust more than my elocution [1 e power of literary expression, style], which never theless I am confident, excepting the mischances of the press, is not obscure That I have neglected the ornament of quoting ancient poets, orators, and philosophers, contrary to the custom of late time, whether I have done well or ill in it, proceedeth from my judgment, grounded on many reasons. For first, all truth of doctrine dependeth either upon reason or upon Scripture, both which give credit to many, but never receive it from any writer Secondly, the matters in question are not of fact, but of right, wherein there is no place for witnesses. There is scarce any of those old writers that contradicteth not sometimes both himself and others, which makes their testimonies insufficient Fourthly, such opinions as are taken only upon credit of antiquity are not intrinsically the judgment of those that cite them, but words that pass, like gaping, from mouth to mouth Tifthly, it ismany times with a fraudulent design that men stick their corrupt doctrine with the cloves of other men's Sixthly, I find not that the ancients they cite took it for an ornament to do the like with those that wrote before them Seventhly, it is an argument of indigestion, when Greek and Latin sentences unchewed come up again, as they use to do, unchanged Lastly, though I reverence those men of ancient time that either have written truth perspicuously, or set us in a better way to find it out ourselves yet to the antiquity itself I think nothing due. For if we will reverence the age, the present is the oldest. If the antiquity of the writer, I am not sure that generally they to whom such honour is given were more ancient when they wrote than I am that am writing. But if it be well considered, the praise of ancient authors proceeds not from the reverence of the dead, but from the competition and mutual envy of the living

To conclude, there is nothing in this whole discourse, nor in that I writ before of the same subject in Latin, as far as I can perceive, contrary either to the Word of God or to good manners, or to the disturbance of the public tranquillity Therefore I think it may be profitably printed, and more profitably taught in the universities, in case they also think so to whom the judgment of the same belongeth. For seeing the universities are the fountains of civil and moral doctrine, from whence the preachers and the gentry, drawing such water as they find, use to sprinkle the same (both from the pulpit and in their conversation) upon the people, there ought certainly to be great care taken to have it pure, both from the venom of heathen politicians and from the incantation of deceiving spirits. And by that means the most men, knowing their duties, will be the less subject to serve the ambition of a few discontented persons in their purposes against the state, and be the less grieved with the contributions necessary for their peace and defence, and the governors them selves have the less cause to maintain at the common charge any greater army than is necessary to make good the public liberty against the invasions and encroach ments of foreign enemies

And thus I have brought to an end my Discourse of Civil and Ecclesiastical Government, occasioned by the disorders of the present time, without partiality, without application, and without other design than to set before men's eyes the mutual relation between protection and obedience, of which the condition of human nature and the laws divine, both natural and positive, require an inviolable observation. And though in the revolution of states there can be no very good constellation for truths of this nature to be born under (as having an angry aspect from the dissolvers of an old government, and seeing but the backs of them that erect a new), yet I cannot think it will be condemned at this time either by the public judge of doctrine or by any that desires the continuance of public peace. And in this hope I return to my interrupted speculation of bodies natural, wherein, if God give me health to finish it, I hope the novelty will as much please as in the doctrine of this artificial body it useth to offend For such truth as opposeth no man's profit nor pleasure is to all men welcome (From the conclusion of Leviathan.)

Pity and Indignation

Pity is imagination or fiction of future calamity to ourselves, proceeding from the sense of another man's calamity. But when it lighteth on such as we think have not deserved the same, the compassion is greater, because then there appeareth more probability that the same may happen to us, for the evil that happeneth to an innocent man may happen to every man. But when we see a man suffer for great crimes, which we cannot easily think will fall upon ourselves, the pity is the less And therefore men are apt to pity those, whom they love, for whom they love they think worthy of good, and therefore not worthy of calamity. Thence it is also that men pity the vices of some persons at the first sight only, out of love to their aspect. The contrary of pity is hardness of heart, proceeding either from slowness of imagination, or some extreme great opinion of their own exemption from the like calamity, or from hatred of all or most men.

Indignation is that grief which consisteth in the, con ception of good success happening to them whom they think unworthy thereof. Seeing therefore men think all those unworthy whom they hate, they think them not only unworthy of the good fortune they have, but also of their own virtues. And of all the passions of the mind, these two, indignation and pity, are most raised and increased by eloquence, for the aggravation of the calamity, and extenuation of the fault, augmenteth pity, and the extenuation of the worth of the person, together with the magnifying of his success, which are the parts of an orator, are able to turn these two passions into fury (From Himian Nature)

Emulation and Envy

Emulation is grief arising from seeing one's self exceeded or excelled by his concurrent, together with hope to equal or exceed him in time to come, by his own ability. But carry is the same grief joined with pleasure conceived in the imagination of some ill fortune that may befall him (From Human Nature)

Laughter

There is a passion that hath no name, but the sign of it is that distortion of the countenance which we call laughter, which is always joy but what joy, what we think, and wherein we triumph when we laugh, is not hitherto declared by any That it consisteth in wit, or, as they call it, in the jest, experience confuteth, for men laugh at mischances and indecencies, wherein there lieth no wit nor jest at all And forasmuch as the same thing is no more ridiculous when it groweth stale or usual, whatsoever it be that moveth laughter, it must be new and unexpected Men laugh often-especially such as are greedy of applause from everything they do well-at their own actions performed never so little beyond their own expectations, as also at their own jests and in this case it is manifest that the passion of laughter proceedeth from a sudden conception of some ability in himself that laugheth. Also, men laugh at the infirmities of others by comparison wherewith their own abilities are set off and illustrated laugh at jests the wit whereof always consisteth in the elegant discovering and conveying to our minds some absurdity of another, and in this case also the passion of laughter proceedeth from the sudden imagination of our own odds and eminency, for what is else the re commending of ourselves to our own good opinion, by comparison with another man's infirmity or absurdity? For when a jest is broken upon ourselves, or friends, of whose dishonour we participate, we never laugh thereat I may therefore conclude that the passion of laughter is nothing else but sudden glory arising from a sudden conception of some eminency in ourselves, by comparison with the infirmity of others, or with our own formerly, for men laugh at the follies of themselves past, when they come suddenly to remembrance, except they bring with them any present dishonour. It is no wonder, therefore, that men take hemously to be laughed at or derided-that is, triumphed over Laughing without offence must be at absurdities and infirmities abstracted from persons, and when all the company may laugh to gether, for laughing to one's self putteth all the rest into jealousy and examination of themselves. Besides, it is vain glory, and an argument of little worth, to think the infirmity of another sufficient matter for his triumph

(From Human Nature)

The Necessity of the Will

The question is not, whether a man be a free agent, that is to say, whether he can write or forbear, speak or be silent, according to his will, but whether the will to write, and the will to forbear, come upon him according to his will, or according to anything else in his own power I acknowledge this liberty, that I can do if I will, but to say, I can will if I will, I take to be an absurd speech

[In answer to Bishop Bramhall's assertion, that the doctrine of free will 'is the belief of all mankind, which we have not learned from our tutors, but is imprinted in our hearts by nature ']-It is true, very few have learned from tutors, that a man is not free to will, nor do they find it much in books. That they find in books, that which the pocts chant in the theatres, and the shepherds on the mountains, that which the pastors teach in the churches, and the doctors in the universities, and that which the common people in the markets and all mankind in the whole world do assent unto, is the same that I assent unto-namely, that a man hath freedom to do if he will, but whether he hath freedom to will is a question which it seems neither the bishop nor they ever thought on. A wooden top that is lashed by the boys, and runs about sometimes to one wall, sometimes to another, sometimes spinning, sometimes hitting men on the shins, if it were sensible of its own motion, would think it proceeded from its own will, unless it felt what lashed it. And is a man any wiser when he runs to one place for a benefice, to another for a bargun, and troubles the world with writing errors and requiring answers, because he thinks he does it without other cause than his own will, and seeth not what are the lashings that cause that will?

(From Of Liberty and Necessity)

On Precision in Language

Seeing that truth consisteth in the right ordering of names in our affirmations, a man that seeketh precise truth had need to remember what every name he useth stands for, and to place it accordingly, or else he will find himself entangled in words as a bird in lime twigs—the more he struggles, the more belimed. And there fore in geometry, which is the only science that it hath pleased God hitherto to bestow on mankind, men begin at settling the significations of their words, which settling of significations they call definitions, and place them in the beginning of their reckoning

By this it appears how necessary it is for any man that aspires to true knowledge to examine the definitions of former authors, and either to correct them where they are negligently set down, or to make them him self. For the errors of definitions multiply themselves according as the reckoning proceeds, and lead men into absurdations, which at last they see, but cannot avoid without reckoning anew from the beginning, in which lies the foundation of their errors. From whence it happens that they which trust to books do as they that east up many little sums into a greater, without considering whether those little sums were rightly east up or not, and at last, finding the error visible, and not mistrusting their first grounds, know not which way to clear themselves, but spend time in fluttering over their books, as birds that, entering by the chimney, flutter at the false light of a glass window, for want of wit to consider which way they came in. So that in the right definition of names hes the first use of speech, which is the acquisition of science, and in wrong or no definitions lies the first abuse, from which proceed all false and senseless tenets, which make those men that take their instruction from the authority of books, and not from their own meditation, to be as much below the condition of ignorant men as men endued with true For between true science and science are above it erroncous doctrines, ignorance is in the middle. Natural sense and imagination are not subject to absurdity Nature itself cannot err, and as men abound in copious ness of language, so they become more wise or more mad than ordinary Nor is it possible without letters for any man to become either excellently wise, or, unless his memory be hurt by disease or ill constitution of organs, excellently foolish For words are wise men's counters-they do but reckon by them-but they are the money of fools, that value them by the authority of an Aristotle, a Cicero, or a Thomas, or any other doctor whatsoever, if but a man (From Leviathan)

Cognate is the famous saying, 'Words are wise men's counters, they do but reckon by them, but they are the money of fools' A very short specimen of Hobbes's poetry may suffice. His translation of the Iltud begins thus "

O Goddess, sing what woe the discontent
Of Thetis' son brought to the Greeks, what souls
Of heroes down to Erebus it sent,
Leaving their bodies unto dogs and fowls,
Whilst the two princes of the army strove,
King Agamemnon and Achilles stout
That so it should be was the will of Jove,
But who was he that made them first fall out?
Apollo, who, incensed by the wrong
To his priest Chryses by Atrides done,
Sent a great pestilence the Greeks among,
Apace they died and remedy was none

The standard edition of Hobbes is that by Sir W Molesworth (16 vols., 1839-46), Professor II Morley published editions of Leviathan in 1881, and again in 1885. See the monograph by Professor Croom Robertson (1886), and three papers in Sir J Fitzjames Stephens 5 Horæ Sabbaticæ (1891-93).

Sir Robert Filmer (1590?-1653) is for all time the classical representative-in England, if not for all the world-of the extreme theory of the divine right of kings. One finds him referred to in this capacity where one least expects itin Gustave Flaubert's Bouvard et Pécuchet, for example. He was the son of a Kentish knight. and was born at East Sutton, and studied at Cambridge He published a series of political treatises in favour of extreme or unlimited monarchical power The first of these seems to have appeared in 1646, and the latest and most celebrated, the Patriarcha, in 1679 The germ of his theory is the proposition that the father of a family is the divinely ordained type of a ruler, and that his power is Accordingly, Filmer taught, a king's acts should be subject to no check or control whatsocver, his will is the only right source of law Hence he is not in any sense answerable to his subjects for his doings, for them either to depose him or even to criticise his conduct is criminal and iminoral His argument was answered by Algernon Sidney and by John Locke, who says that so much 'glib nonsense was never put together in wellsounding English' It cannot certainly be said that the ability of Filmer's statement covers the monstrousness of his thesis But Dr Gairdner holds that his view of English constitutional history is more correct than that of his chief opponents, and that his fundamental doctrine is not more absurd than Rousseau's of a social compact it should be remembered to his credit that, unlike many of his contemporaries who held similar views of government, he protested against the abomina-The following is part of tions of the witch mania the argument of the Patriaicha

If any desire the direction of the New Testament, he may find our Saviour limiting and distinguishing royal power, by giving to Cresar those things that were Cæsar's, and to God those things that were God's Obediendum est in quibus mandatum Dei non impeditur We must obey where the commandment of God is not hindered, there is no other law but God's law to hinder our obedience.

When the Jews asked our blessed Saviour whether they should pay tribute, he did not first demand what the law of the land was, or whether there was any statute against it, nor enquired whether the tribute were given by consent of the people, nor advised them to stay their payment till they should grant it, he did no more but look upon the superscription, and concluded, This image you say is Cresar's, therefore give it to Cresar. Nor must it here be said that Christ taught this lesson only to the conquered Jews, for in this he gave direction for all nations, who are bound as much in obedience to their lawful kings as to any conquerour or usurper whatsoever

Whereas being subject to the higher powers, some have strained these words to signific the laws of the land, or else to mean the highest power, as well aristocratical and democratical as regal it seems St Paul looked for such interpretation, and therefore thought fit to be his own expositor, and to let it be known that by power he understood a monarch that carried a sword Wilt thou not be afraid of the power? that is, the ruler that carrieth the sword, for he is the minister of God to thee for he beareth not the sword in vain. It is not the law that is the minister of God, or that carries the sword, but the ruler or magistrate, so they that say the law governs the kingdom, may as well say that the carpenters rule builds an house, and not the carpenter, for the law is but the rule or instrument of the ruler And St Paul concludes, for this cause pay you tribute also, for they are God's ministers attending continually upon this very thing Render therefore tribute to whom tribute is due, custom to whom custom He doth not say, give as a gift to God's minister, but dπάδοτε, render or restore tribute, as a due. Also St Peter doth most clearly ex pound this place of St Paul, where he saith, Submit yourselves to every ordinance of man, for the Lord's sake, whether it be to the king as supreme, or unto governours, as unto them that are sent by him Here the very selfsame word (supreme, or υπερεχούσαις) which St Paul coupleth with power, St Peter conjoyneth with the king, βασιλεί ως υπερέχοντι, thereby to manifest that king and power are both one

Robert Herrick.

One of the most exquisite of our lyrical poets 15 Robert Herrick, born in Cheapside, London, in August 1591, fifteen months later his father, a goldsmith, died of a fall from a window, not without suspicion of suicide He was put to school probably at Westminster, and in 1607 was apprenticed to an uncle, also a goldsmith, but during 1613-20 he was at Cambridge, migrating in 1616 from St John's to Trinity Hall Classical influences, especially of Martial, are to be traced in much of his work. He associated in London with the jovial spirits of the age He 'quaffed the mighty bowl' with Ben Jonson, but could not, he tells us, 'thrive in frenzy' like rare Ben, who seems to have excelled all his 'fellow-compotators' at the Mermaid in deep drinking as in high thinking The recollection of these 'brave translunary scenes' inspired Herrick to this effect

Ah Ben!
Say how or when Shall we, thy guests,
Meet at those lyrich feasts
Made at the Sun,
The Dog, the Triple Tunne?
Where we such clusters had
As made us nobly wild, not mad,
And yet each verse of thine
Out did the meate, out did the frolich wine

My Ben!
Or come agen,
Or send to us
Thy wit's great over plus.
But teach us yet
Wisely to husband it,
Lest we that tallent spend,
And having once brought to an end
That precious stock, the store
Of such a wit, the world sho'd have no more

Having taken holy orders, he was presented by Charles I in 1629 to the vicarage of Dean Prior, near Totnes, in Devonshire. After eighteen years' residence in this sequestered parish, he was ejected from his living by the storms of the Civil War, which, as Jeremy Taylor says, 'dashed the vessel of the Church and State all in pieces' Whatever regret the poet may have felt on being turned adrift on the world, he could have experienced little on parting with his parishioners, for he describes them much as Crabbe does the natives of Suffolk, among whom he was cast, as a 'wild amphibious race,' rude 'almost as salvages,' and 'churlish as the seas' Herrick gives us a glimpse of his own character

Borne I was to meet with age, And to walke life's pilgrimage Much I know of time is spent, Tell I can't what's resident. Howsoever, cares adue, Ile have nought to say to you, But Ile spend my comming houres Drinking wine & crown'd with flowres

This light and genial temperament would enable the poet to ride out the storm in composure. Many of his lighter pieces were written as early as 1610-12, a large proportion of them before 1629 Some of his pieces may have seen the light as carly as 1635, in a miscellaneous collection-Wit's Recreations-without assignment of authorship, published in 1640, are sixty-two pieces that he subsequently included in Hesperidis the time that he lost his vicarage Herrick appears to have published his works His Noble Numbers, or Pious Pieces, are dated 1647, his Hespirides, or, the Works, both Humane and Divine, of Robert Herrick, Esquire, 1648, and both came out in the same volume early in the latter year. The clerical prefix to his name seems now to have been abandoned, like the clerical habit, by the poet, and there are certainly many pieces in the second volume which, even in that lax age, could not be considered to become one ministering at the altar Herrick lived in Westminster, and may have been supported or subsidised by the wealthy royalists, in 1662 he was restored to Dean Prior, and there he was buried on 15th October 1674. How he was received by the 'rude salvages,' or how he felt on quitting the gaieties of the capital to resume his clerical duties and seclusion, is not recorded, but, being over seventy, he may well have grown tired of canary sack and tavern jollities He had an open eye for the pleasures of a country life, if we may judge from his works and the fondness with which he dwells on old English Yet on the whole festivals and rural customs he wearied of the country, even 'loathed' Devonshire, and pined for the town and its pleasures Though his rhymes were sometimes wild, he says his life was chaste, and he repented of his errors

For those my unbaptized rhimes,
Writ in my wild unballowed times,
For every sentence, clause, and word,
That's not inlaid with thee, (my Lord)
Forgive me, God, and blot each line
Out of my book that is not thine,
But if, 'mongst all, thou find'st here one Worthy thy benediction,
That one of all the rest shall be
The glory of my work, and me

The poet might have evinced the depth of his contrition by blotting out the unbaptised rhymes himself, or by not reprinting them, but the vanity of the author seems to have triumphed over the penitence of the Christian. The religious poems may have been written later than the least decorous verses, though we cannot be sure of it. Even in the secular section the arrangement is chaotic, and there is no chronological sequence whatever. There may be some slight significance in the fact that the 'Welcome to Sack' stands after the 'Farewell to Sack,' while the 'Welcome' seems the more hearty outcome, illustrates the more perminent Though some of the religious pieces -' The Litany,' 'Jephthah's Daughter,' and 'A Thanksgiving, for example—are masterpieces, most of the sacred poems are weak The special charm of Herrick lies in his secular poems, and his most secular poems are sheer paganism and epicureanism Depth and passion are not his forte Mr Gosse has to admit that Herrick approaches the mysteries of life and death with 'airy frivolity, easy-going callousness of soul' His careless gaiety ind sensuousness are at least genuine, are his natural clement, his pictures of English life are unforced, fresh, and natural, his love-poems are tender, seem heartfelt and natural, and reveal a real undertone of inelancholy, the conceits and similes are sometimes overstrained, and the humour forced, but in sweetness of inclody and in harmony of sound with sense Herrick has no equal amongst his Caroline contemporaries. Only his epigrams are poor and gross and thoroughly unworthy of him

The arrangement of the secular pieces is chaotic and incongruous, offering to us a medley of poems to friends, amatory poems, epigrams, fairy fancies, odes, and short poems on all manner of subjects. Some of them are so difficult to harmonise with the devotional vein of his sacred pieces, even if we conceive the author a man of very varied moods, that it has been argued the sacred poems were in time of writing separated by a quarter of a century from his less decorous ones. But they were all published together

Herrick's poems by neglected for many years, were republished at the very end of the eighteenth century, but were hardly re established in general esteem till well on in the nineteenth century, many of his shorter lyrics are now known to everybody, and some of them have been set to modern music 'Cherry Ripe' (the idea and words of which are partly Campion's—see page 401) and 'Gather ye Rose-buds while ye may' delightfully combine playful fancy and natural feeling Those 'To Blossoms,' 'To Daffodils,' and 'To Primroses' have even a touch of pathos that wins its way to the heart. Other gems are 'To Anthea,' 'The Mad Maid's Song,' 'The Night-piece to Julia' ('Her eyes the glow worm lend thee'), and 'To Electra' ('Tis evening, my sweet') speare and Jonson had scattered such delicate funcies and snatches of lyrical melody among then plays and masques, and Herrick may have been directly influenced by the songs of Marlowe, Greene, and Fletcher It has been debated whether he formed himself after any classical There is in his songs and anacreontics an unforced gatety and natural tenderness that show he wrote chiefly from the spontaneous impulses of his own thoroughly artistic, pleasure loving temperament. Herrick's choice of words, when he is in his happiest vein, is perfect, his versification is hirmony itself. His verses bound and flow like some exquisite lively melody that echoes nature by wood and dell, and presents new beauties at every turn and winding. The strain is short and sometimes fantastic, but the notes linger in the mind, and take their place for ever in the memory.

Mr Swinburne has pointed out that the first great age of lyric poetry in England was the one great age of our dramatic poetry, but that the lyric school advanced as the dramatic school declined, 'the lyrical record that begins with the author of Euphnes and Endymion grows fuller if not brighter through a whole series of constellations till it culminates in the crowning star of Herrick,' whose master was undoubtedly Marlowe last of his line, Herrick is the first of English songwriters, 'he lives simply by virtue of his songs, his more ambitious or pretentious lyrics arc merely magnified and prolonged and elaborated songs Elegy or litany, epicede or epithalamium, his work is always a song-writer's nothing more but nothing less than the work of the greatest song-writer ever born of English race' 'Ye have been fresh and green' is a sweeter and better song than 'Gather vc Rose-buds,' 'The Mad Maid's Song' can only be compared with William Blake's poems Yet Herrick has his 'brutal blemishes,' and scems to have deliberately relieved the monotony of 'spices and flowers, condiments and kisses,' by admitting rank and intolerable odours Though his 'sacred verse at its worst is as offensive as his secular verse at its worst,' 'neither Herbert nor Crashaw could have bettered'-

> We see Him come and know Him ours, Who with His sunshine and His showers Turns all the patient ground to flowers.

To Meadows

Ye'have been firsh and green,
Ye have been fill'd with flowers,
And ye the walks have been Where maids have spent their houres.

You have beheld how they With wicker arks did come, To kiss and beare away The richer couslips home.

Y' ave heard them sweetly sing, And seen them in a round, Each virgin, like a spring, With hony succles crown'd.

But now, we see none here, Whose silv'rie feet did trend, And with dishevell'd haire Adorn'd this smoother mead.

Like unthrifts, having spent Your stock, and needs grown, Y'are left here to lament Your poore estates alone.

To Blossoms

Faire pledges of a fruitfull tree,
Why do yee fall so fast?
Your date is not so past,
But you may stay yet here a while,
To blush and gently smile,
And go at last

What! were yee borne to be
An houre or half's delight,
And so to bid goodnight?

'Twas pitic nature brought yee forth
Meerly to shew your worth,
And lose you quite

ROBER F HERRICK.
From Frontispiece to the Hesperides (1648).

But you are lovely leaves, where we May read how soon things have Their end, though ne'r so brave
And after they have shewn their pride,
Like you awhile, they glide
Into the grave.

To Daffodils.

Faire daffadills, we weep to see You haste away so soone, As yet the early-rising sun Has not attained his noone Stay, stay,
Untill the hasting day

Has run
But to the even song,
And having prayd together, we Will go with you along

We have short time to stry, as you
We have as short a spring,
As quick a growth to meet decay,
As you, or anything
We die,
As your hours doe, and drie
Away
Like to the summers raine,
Or as the pearles of mornings dew,
Ne'r to be found againe.

To the Virgins, to make much of their Time

Gather ye rose buds while ye may,
Old I ime is still a flying,
And this same flower that smiles to day,
To morrow will be dying

The glorious lamp of heaven, the sun,
The higher he's a getting,
The sooner will his race be run,
And neerer he's to setting

That age is best which is the first,
When youth and blood are warmer,
But, being spent, the worse, and worst
Times, still succeed the former

Then be not coy, but use your time,
And while ye may, goe marry,
For, having lost but once your prime,
You may for ever tarry

To Anthea, who may command him any thing

Bid me to live, and I will live
Thy Protestant to be Or bid ine love, and I will give
A loving heart to thee

A heart as soft, a heart as kind,
A heart as sound and free,
As in the whole world thou caust find,
That heart Ile give to thee

Bid that heart stay, and it will stay, To honour thy decree Or bid it languish quite away, And't shall doe so for thee.

Bid me to weep, and I will weep, While I have eyes to see And having none, yet I will keep A heart to weep for thee.

Bid me despaire, and He despaire, Under that cypresse tree Or bid me die, and I will dare E'en death, to die for thee

Thou art my life, my love, my heart,
The very eyes of me
And hast command of every part
To live and die for thee

Cherry Ripe

Cherrie ripe, ripe, ripe, I cry,
Full and faire ones—come and buy
If so be you ask me where They doe grow?—I answer There,
Where my Julia's lips doe smile,
There is the land, or cherry ile,
Whose plantations fully shew
All the yeare where cherries grow

The Rock of Rubles and the Quarrie of Pearls

Some ask'd me where the rubies grew, And nothing did I say, But with my finger pointed to The lips of Julia.

Some asked how pearls did grow, and where,
Then spake I to my girle,
To part her lips, and show'd them there
The quarrelets of pearl

Upon Julia's Recovery

Droop, droop no more, or hing the head, Ye roses almost withered, New strength and newer purple get Each here declining violet, O primroses! Let this day be A resurrection unto ye, And to all flowers ally'd in blood, Or sworn to that sweet sister hood, For health on Juha's check hath shed Clarret and creame commingled, And these her hips doe now appeare As beames of coral, but more cleare

The Bag of the Bee

About the sweet bag of a bee,

I'wo Cupids felf at odds,

And whose the pretty prize shu'd be,

They vow'd to ask the gods.

Which Venus hearing, thither came, And for their boldness stript them, And taking thence from each his flame, With rods of mirtle whipt them

Which done, to still their wanton cries, When quiet grown sh'ad seen them, She kist and wip'd their dove like eyes, And gave the bag between them.

The Kiss–A Dialogue

- 1 Among thy fancies, tell inc this What is the thing we call a kisse?
- 2 I shall resolve ye, what it is,

It is a creature born and bred
Between the lips, (all cherric red,)
By love and warme desires fed,

Chor —And makes more soft the bridal bed

- 2 It is an active flame, that flics
 First to the babies of the eyes,
 And charms them there with lullables,
 Chor —And stils the bride too, when she cries
- 2 Then to the chin, the cheek, the eare
 It frisks and flyes now here, now there,
 'Tis now farre off, and then 'tis nere, Chor—And here, and there, and every where

- I Has it a speaking virtue?-2 Yes.
- I How speaks it, say?—2 Do you but this, Part your joyn'd hips, then speaks your kisse, Chor —And this loves sweetest language is.
- 1 Has it a body?—2 Ay, and wings, With thousand rure encolourings, And as it flies, it gently sings, Chor—Love home yeelds, but never stings.

Corinna's going a Maying

Get up, get up for shame, the blooming morne
Upon her wings presents the god unshorne
See how Aurora throwes her fair
Fresh quilted colours through the aire,
Get up, sweet slag a bed, and see
The dew bespangling herbe and tree
Each flower has wept, and bow'd toward the east,
Above an houre since, yet you are not drest,
Nay! not so much as out of bed?
When all the birds have mattens said,
And sung their thankfull hymnes 'tis sin,
Nay, profunction to keep in,
When as a thousand virgins on this day,
Spring sooner than the lark to fetch in May

Rise, and put on your folinge, and be seene
To come forth, like the spring time, fresh and greene,
And sweet as Flori Fake no care
Tor jewels for your gowne or haire,
Fear not, the leaves will strew
Gemms in abundance upon you,
Besides, the childhood of the day has kept,
Against you come, some orient pearls unwept
Come, and receive them while the light Hangs on the dew locks of the night
And Titan on the eastern hill
Retires himselfe, or else stands still Till you come forth Wash, dresse, be briefe in praying, Tew beads are best when once we goe a Maying

Come, my Corinna, come, and, comming, mark
How each field turns a street, each street a parke Made green, and trimm'd with trees, see how Devotion gives each house a bough,
Or branch, each porch, each doore, ere this,
An arke, a tabernacle is,
Made up of white thorn neatly enterwove,
As if here were those cooler shades of love
Can such delights be in the street
And open fields, and we not see 't?
Come, we'll abroad, and let's obay
The proclamation made for May
And sin no more, as we have done, by staying,
But, my Corinna, come, let's goe a Maying

There's not a budding boy or girle, this day,
But is got up, and gone to bring in May
A deale of youth, ere this, is come Back, and with white thorn laden home
Some have despatcht their cakes and creame
Before that we have left to dreame,
And some have wept, and woo'd, and plighted troth,
And chose their priest, ere we can cast off sloth
Many a green gown has been given,

Many a green gown has been given, Many a kisse, both odde and even, Many a glance too has been sent From out the eye, love's firmament, Many a jest told of the keyes betraying This night, and locks pickt, yet w' are not a Maying

Come, let us goe, while we are in our prime, And take the harmlesse follie of the time

We shall grow old apace, and die
Before we know our liberty
Our life is short, and our dayes run
As fast away as do's the sunne,

And as a vapour, or a drop of raine Once lost, can ne'er be found againe,

So when or you or I are made A fable, song, or fleeting shade, All love, all liking, all delight Lies drown'd with us in endlesse night

Then, while time serves, and we are but decaying, Come, my Corinna, come, let's goe a Maying

Twelfth-night, or King and Queen.

Now, now the mirth comes,
With the cake full of plums,
Where beane's the king of the sport here,
Beside we must know,
The pea also
Must revel as queene in the court here.

Begin (then to chuse,
(This night as ye use)
Who shall for the present delight here,
Be a king by the lot,
And who shall not Be Twelfe day queene for the night here

Which knowne, let us make
Joy sops with the cake,
And let not a man then be seen here,
Who unurg'd will not drinke,
To the base from the brink,
A health to the king and the queene here.

Next crown the bowle full
With gentle lamb's wooll
Add sugar, nutmeg, and ginger,
With store of ale, too,
And thus ye must doe
To make the wassaile a swinger,

Give them to the king
And queene wassailing,
And though with ale ye be wet here,
Yet part ye from hence,
As free from offence,
As when ye innocent met here.

The Bellman.

Along the dark and silent night,
With my lantern and my light,
And the tinkling of my bell,
Thus I walk, and thus I tell Death and dreadfulnesse call on
To the gen'rall session,
To whose dismall bare, we there
All accompts must come to cleere.
Scores of sins w'ave made here, many,
Wip't out few (God knowes) if any Rise, ye debters, then, and fall
To make paiment while I call

Ponder this, when I am gone, By the clock 'tis almost one

Upon a Child that Died.

Here she lies, a pretty bud, Lately made of flesh and blood, Who as soone fell fast asleep, As her little eyes did peep Give her strewings, but not stir The earth that lightly covers her

Epitaph upon a Child.

Virgins promis'd, when I dy'd, That they wo'd each primrose tide Duely morne and ev'ning come, And with flowers'dresse my tomb Having promis'd, pay your debts, Maids, and here strew violets

To finde: God.

Weigh me the fire, or canst thou find A way to measure out the wind, Distinguish all those floods that are Mixt in the watrie theater, And taste thou them as saltlesse there, As in their channell first they were Tell me the people that do keep Within the kingdomes of the deep, Or fetch me back that cloud again, Beshiver'd into seeds of rame Tell me the motes, dusts, sands, and speares Of corn, when summer shakes his ears, Shew me that world of starres, and whence They noiselesse spill their influence This if thou canst, then shew me Him That rides the glorious cherubim

To Primroses, filled with Morning Dew

Why doe ye weep, sweet babes? Can tears
Speak griefe in you,
Who were but borne
Just as the modest morne
Teem'd her refreshing dew?
Alas! you have not known that shower

That marres a flower,
Nor felt th' unkind
Breath of a blasting wind,
Nor are ye worne with yeares,
Or warpt as we,

Who think it strange to see Such pretty flowers, like to orphans young, To speak by teares before ye have a tongue

Speak, whimp'ring younglings, and make known

The reason why
Ye droop and weep,
Is it for want of sleep,
Or childish lullable?
Or that ye have not seen as yet

The violet?
Or brought a kisse
From that sweet heart to this?
No, no, this sorrow shewn
By your teares shed,

Would have this lecture read

That things of greatest, so of meanest worth, Conceiv'd with grief are, and with teares brought forth

Grace for a Child.

Here a little child I stand,
Heaving up my either hand,
Cold as paddocks though they be,
Here I lift them up to Thee,
I or a benizon to fall
On our meat, and on us all Amen

A Thanksgiving for his House.

Lord, Thou hast given me a cell Wherein to dwell, A little house, whose humble roof Is weatherproof, Under the spars of which I he Both soft and dric. Where Thou my chamber for to ward Hast set a guard Of harmlesse thoughts, to watch and keep Me while I sleep Low is my porch, as is my fite, Both void of state, And yet the threshold of my doore Is worn by th' poorc, Who lither come, and freely get Good words or ment Like as my parlour, so my hall, And kitchin's small, A little butterie, and therein A little byn, Which keeps my little loafe of bread Unchipt, unflead Some brittle stiel's of thorne or briar Make me a fire, Close by whose living coale I sit, And glow like it Lord, I confesse, too, when I dine, The pulse is Thine, And all those other bits that bee There plac'd by Thee The worts, the purslain, and the messe Of water cresse, Which of Thy kindnesse Thou hast sent And my content Makes those, and my beloved beet To be more sweet 'Tis Thou that crown'st my glittering hearth With guiltlesse mirth, And giv'st me wassail bowles to drink, Spic'd to the brink

Lord, 'tis 1 hy plenty dropping hand manures

I hat soiles my land:

And giv'st me for my bushell sowne

Thou mak'st my teeming hen to lay

Me twins each yeare

The while the conduits of my kine

Me to this end

That I should render for my part

A thankful heart,

Run creame (for wine)

All these, and better, Thou dost send

I wice ten for one

Her egg each day
Besides my healthfull cwes to beare

Which, fir'd with incense, I resigne As wholly Thine But the acceptance—that must be, My Christ, by Thee

His Litanie, to the Holy Spirit

In the houre of my distresse,
When temptations me oppresse,
And when I my sins confesse,
Sweet Spirit, coinfort me!

When I he within my bed, Sick in heart and sick in head, And with doubts discomforted, Sweet Spirit, comfort me!

When the house doth sigh and weep, And the world is drown'd in sleep, Yet mine eyes the watch do keep, Sweet Spirit, comfort me!

When the artlesse doctor sees
No one hope, but of his fees,
And his skill runs on the lees,
Sweet Spirit, comfort me!

When his potton and his pill,
Has, or none, or little skill,
Meet for nothing, but to kill,
Sweet Spirit, comfort me!

When the passing bell doth tole, And the furies in a shole.

Come to fright a parting soule,

Sweet Spirit, comfort me!

When the tapers now burne blew, And the comforters are few, And that number more then true, Sweet Spirit, comfort me!

When the priest his last hath praid, And I nod to what is said, 'Cause my speech is now decaid, Sweet Spirit, comfort me!

When (God knowes) I 'm tost about, Lither with despaire, or doubt, Yet before the glasse be out, Sweet Spirit, comfort me!

When the tempter me pursu'th
With the sins of all my youth,
And halfe dumns me with untruth,
Sweet Spirit, comfort me!

When the flames and hellish cries
I night mine eares, and fright mine eyes,
And all terrors me surprize,
Sweet Spirit, comfort me!

When the Judgment is reveal'd, And that open'd which was seal'd, When to thee I have appeal'd, Sweet Spirit, comfort me!

Herrick's Poems have been edited by Nott (1810), T Maitland (Lord Dundrennan, 1823), Dr Grosart (3 vols. 1876), Pollard (1891, with a preface by A. C. Swinburne), and Professor Saintsbury (1893). See also F T Palgrave's Chrysomela (a selection, 1877), Gosse's Seventeenth Century Studies (1883), and a German monograph by E Hale (Halle, 1892)

Francis Quarles (1592-1644) wrote more like a divine or contemplative recluse than a busy man of the world who held various public posts Born at the manor-house of Stewards, Romford, he took his B.A in 1608 from Christ's College, Cambridge, and then entered Lincoln's Inn He was cup-bearer at Heidelberg to Elizabeth of Bohemia 1613-19, secretary to Archbishop Ussher 1629-33, and chronologer from 1639 to the city of London He espoused the cause of Charles I, and was so harassed by the Roundhead party, who injured his property and plundered him of his books and rare manuscripts, that his death was attributed to the affliction and ill-health caused

FRANCIS QUARLES
From the Picture by W Dobson in the National Portrait Gallery

by these disasters Notwithstanding his loyalty, the works of Quarles have a tinge of Puritanism and ascetic piety that might have mollified the rage of his persecutors His poems include AFeast for Wormes set forth in a Poeme of the History of Jonali (1620), Hadassa History of Queene Ester (1621), Job Militant (1624), Sion's Elegies (1625), Argalus and Parthenia (1629, on the story from Sidney's Arcadia), Historie of Samson (1631), Divine Emblems (1635), and Hieroglyphikes of the Life of Man (1638), the two last quaintly illustrated The Emblems were wonderfully popular, but rather with the people than the cultured or well-born Even in his own time Anthony Wood sneered at him, though a staunch royalist, as 'an old puritanicall poet the sometime darling of our plebeian judgments.' After the Restoration, when things sacred and serious were usually neglected or made the subject of ribald jests, Quarles seems to have been entirely lost to the public Even Pope, who had |

he really studied him, could not have overlooked his vivid fancy and point, notices only his bathos and absurdity, and says, referring to the engraved emblems, that he '15 saved by beauties not his own' The more catholic taste of modern times has, not without recalcitrants, admitted the divine emblemist into the 'laurelled fraternity of poets,' where, if he does not occupy a conspicuous place, he is at least sure of his due measure of attention. Charles Lamb hesitated whether Quarles was not to be preferred to Wither, and did not hesitate to rank him as the wittier of the two Thoreau said he 'uses language sometimes as greatly as Shakespeare' Yet he is not quoted or discussed at all in such a representative work as Ward's English Poets 'Emblems,' combining the graphic and poetic arts, to inculcate lessons of morality and religion, had been tried with success by Henry Peacham (c 1576-1643), author of the Compleat Gentleman, by Wither, and by others Quarles found his model in Hermann Hugo (1588–1629), a Jesuit of Brussels, who was almoner to Spinola on the battlefield, and died of plague in the Spanish camp From Hugo's Pia Desideria Quarles directly copied a great part of his prints and mottoes, and inevitably followed the thought to some extent, in the later books mainly paraphrising Hugo, but the best in his verses is all his own His style is that of his age-studded with conceits, often extravagant, outre, and ridi-But amidst his contortions he shows culous real power, and true wit mixed with the false. His epigrammatic union of wit and devotion made him in some measure a precursor of Young and his Aught Thoughts

Flowers

As when a lady, walking Flora's bowre, Picks here a pinke, and there a gillyflowre, Now plucks a violet from her purple bed, And then a primrose, the yeere's maiden head, There mips the bryer, here the lover's pansy, Shifting her dainty pleasures with her fancy, This on her arms, and that she lists to weare Upon the borders of her curious haire, At length a rose bud, passing all the rest, She plucks, and bosoms in her hilly brest (From the History of Ester)

The Shortness of Life

And what s a Life?—a weary pilgrimage, Whose glory in one day doth fill the stage With childhood, manhood, and decrepit age.

And what 's a life?—the flourishing array Of the proud summer meadow, which to day Wears her green plush, and is to morrow hay

Reade on this diall how the shades devour My short liv'd winter's day! houre eats up houre, Alas, the totall's but from eight to foure

Behold these lilies (which thy hands have made Fair copies of my life, and open laid To view) how soon they droop, how soon they fade. Shade not that diall, night will blind too soon, My nonag'd day already points to noon, How simple is my suit! how small my boon!

Nor do I beg this slender inch, to while The time away, or falsely to beguile My thoughts with joy here's nothing worth a smile.

Mors Tua.

Can he be faire that withers at a blast?

Or he be strong that avery breath can cast? Can he be wise that knowes not how to live? Or he be rich that nothing hath to give? Can be be young that's feeble, weake, and wan? So faire, strong, wise, so rich, so young is min So faire is man, that Death (a parting blast) Blasts his fair flower, and makes him earth at last, So strong is man, that with a gasping breath He totters, and bequeathes his strength to Death, So wise is man, that if with Death he strive, His wisedom cannot teach him how to live So rich is man, that (all his debts being paid) His wealth's the winding sheet wherein he's laid So young is man, that, broke with care and sorrow, He's old enough to day to due to morrow Why brag'st thou, then, thou worm of five foot long? Th'art neither fair, nor strong, nor wise, nor rich, nor young (From A Feast for Wormes)

The Vanity of the World.

False world, thou ly'st, thou canst not lend
The least delight
Thy favours cannot gain a I riend,
They are so slight
Thy morning pleasures make an end
To please at night
Poore are the wants that thou supply'st,

Poore are the wants that thou supply'st,
And yet thou vaunt'st, and yet thou vy'st [ly'st.
With heaven, fond earth, thou boasts, false world, thou

Thy babbling tongue tels golden tales
Of endlesse treasure,
Thy bountie offers easie sales

Of lasting pleasure, k'st the conscience what she ail

Thou ask'st the conscience what she ails,
And swear'st to ease her
There's none can want where thou supply'st

There's none can give where thou deny'st Alas! fond world, thou boasts, false world, thou ly'st

What well advised eare regards

What earth can say?
Thy words are gold, but thy rewards

Are painted clay

Thy cunning can but pack the cards,

The game at weakest, still thou vy'st

Thy game at weakest, still thou vy'st,

If seen, and then revy'd, deny'st

Thou art not what thou seem'st, false world, thou ly'st.

Thy tinsil bosome seems a mint

Of new comed treasure,

A paradise, that has no stint,

No change, no measure,

A painted cask, but nothing in 't,

Nor wealth, nor pleasure

Vun earth! that falsely thus comply'st With man, vain man! that thus rely'st

On earth, vain man, thou dot'st, vain earth, thou ly'st.

What mean dull souls, in this high measure, To haberdash

In earth's base wares, whose greatest treasure
Is drosse and trash?

The height of whose inchaunting pleasure
Is but a flash?

Are these the goods that thou supply'st
Us mortalls with? Are these the high'st?
Can these bring cordiall peace? false world, thou ly'st

Delight in God only

I love—and have some cause to love—the earth
She is my Maker's creature, therefore good
She is my mother, for she gave me birth,
She is my tender nurse, she gives me food,
But what 's a creature, Lord, compared with Thee?
Or what 's my mother or my nurse to me?

I love the aire—her dainty sweets refresh
My drooping soul, and to new sweets invite me,
Her shrill mouthed quire sustains me with their flesh,
And with their polyphonian notes delight me
But what 's the airc or all the sweets that she Can blesse my soul withall compared to Thee?

I love the sea she is my fellow creature,
My carefull purveyer, she provides me store
She walls me round, she makes my diet greater,
She walts my treasure from a forrein shore
But, Lord of oceans, when compared with Thee,
What is the ocean or her wealth to me?

To heaven's high citic I direct my journey,
Whose spingled suburbs entertain mine eye,
Mine eye, by contemplation's great atturney,
Transcends the crystall pavement of the skie
But what is heaven, great God, compared to Thee?
Without thy presence, heaven's no heaven to me.

Without thy presence earth gives no refection, Without thy presence set affords no treasure, Without thy presence air's a rank infection, Without thy presence heaven it self's no pleasure:

If not possessed, if not enjoyed in Thee,
What's earth, or sea, or air, or heaven to me?

Fine highest honours that the world can boast,
Are subjects farre too low for my desire,
The hightest beams of glory are at most
But dying sparkles of thy living fire

The loudest flames that earth can kindle, be
But nightly glow worms, if compared to Thee

Without thy presence, wealth are bags of cares, Wisdome but folly, joy, disquict sadnesse, Friendship is treason, and delights are snares, Pleasures but pain, and mirth but pleasing madnesse, Without thee, Lord, things be not what they be, Nor have they being, when compared with Thee

In having all things, and not Thee, what have I?
Not having Thee, what have my labours got?
Let me enjoy but Thee, what farther crave I?
And having Thee alone, what have I not?
I wish nor sea nor land, nor would I be Possesst of heaven, heaven unpossest of Thee

Decay of Life

The day grows old, the low pitcht lamp hath made
No lesse than treble shade,
And the descending damp doth now prepare
To uncurl bright Titan's hair,
Whose western wardrobe now begins to unfold,
Her purples, fringed with gold,
To cloath his evening glory, when the alarms
Of rest shall call to rest in restlesse Thetis' arms.

Nature now calls to supper, to refresh
The spirits of all flesh,
The toyling plowman drives his thirsty teams,
To taste the shippery streams
The droyling swineheard knocks away, and feasts
His hungry whining guests
The boxbill ouzle and the dappled thrush
Like hungry rivals meet at their beloved bush

And now the cold autumnal dews are seen
To cobweb every green,
And by the low shorn rowins doth appear aftermath
The fast declining year
The saplesse brunches doff their summer suits
And wain their winter fruits, garner
And stormy blasts have forced the quaking trees
To wrap their trembling limbs in suits of mossy freez

In an elegy on a friend he has these fine lines

No azure dapples my bedarkened skies,

My passion has no April in her eyes.

See Dr A G Grosart's complete edition of Quarles's Works (3 vols., Chertsey Worthies Library, 1874).

Hemy King (1592-1669), born at Worminghall, Bucks, and educated at Westminster and Christ Church, Oxford, was the son of a Bishop of London, and himself in 1642 became Bishop of Chichester He was expelled by the Parliament in 1643, his estates were sequestrated and his library seized, but he was reinstated at the Restoration His poems are largely elegiacon his wife, Prince Henry, King Charles I and 'murdered' Royalists, Gustavus Adolphus, 'my ever desired friend Dr Donne,' 'my dead friend Ben Jonson,' and other less-known intimates and There are also translations of the contemporaries Psalms and devotional poems His Poims and Psalms, edited by Archdeacon Hannah (1843), was but a selection, a promised volume to contain the rest of the English poems was never published

The Dirge

What is th' existence of mans life But open war, or slumber'd strife? Where sickness to his sense presents The combat of the elements And never feels a perfect peace Till deaths cold hand signs his release

It is a storm, where the hot blood Out vies in rage the boyling flood, And each loud passion of the mind Is like a furious gust of wind, Which beats his bark with many a wave, Till he casts anchor in the grave It is a flower, which buds, and growes, And withers as the leaves disclose, Whose spring and fall faint seasons keep, Like fits of waking before sleep Then shrinks into that fital mold Where its first being was enroll'd

It is a dream, whose sceming truth Is moraliz'd in age and youth, Where all the comforts he can share, As wandring as his fancies are, Till in a mist of dark decay The dreamer vanish quite away

It is a diall, which points out.
The sun set as it moves about,
And shadowes out in lines of night.
The subtile stages of times flight,
Till all obscuring earth hath laid.
The body in perpetual shade.

It is a weary enterlude
Which doth short joyes, long woes include.
The world the stage, the prologue tears,
The acts vain hope and vary'd fears
The scene shuts up with loss of breath,
And leaves no epilogue but death

Some poems attributed to him were really by Quarles The following little poem, printed and long accepted as his, appears also among the poems of Francis Beaumont, but is more in King's characteristic vein

Sic Vita.

Like to the falling of a starre,

Or as the flights of eagles are,

Or like the fresh springs gawdy hew,

Or silver drops of morning dew,

Or like a wind that chafes the flood,

Or bubbles which on water stood

Even such is man, whose borrow'd lightist streight call'd in, and paid to night

The wind blowes out, the bubble dies,

The spring entomb'd in autumn lies,

The dew dries up, the starre is shot,

The flight is past, and man forgot.

Thomas Carew (c. 1594-1639) was the forerunner of a numerous class of poets-courtiers of a gay and gallant school, who to personal accomplishments, rank, and education united a taste and talent for the conventional poetry then most popular and cultivated A taint of sensuality and irreligion often lurked under the flowery surface of their poetry Carew was capable, indeed, of far higher things, in him, as in Suckling, we see glimpses of real poetic gift, and he was much more careful of the form and finish of his verses than Suckling Of Cornish ancestry, the younger son of Sir Matthew Carew, a master in Chancery, Carew was sent to Merton College, Oxford, and passed thence to the Middle Temple. He was sent to be with Sir Dudley Carleton in Florence and afterwards at The Hague; he visited the French court with Lord Herbert of Cherbury, and finally he became gentleman of the privychamber and sewer in ordinary to Charles I His after-life was that of a courtier—witty, affable, accomplished, heedless, and epicyrean Clarendon says—charitably and hopefully—that he 'died with the greatest remorse for that licence, and with the greatest manifestation of Christianity that his best friends could desire.' His poems were not collected until after his death, which probably occurred in 1630

The poems of Carew are short and occasional The only exception is a masque, written by command of the king, entitled Calum Britannicum This is partly in prose, the lyrical pieces were set to music by Dr Henry Lawes, the poetical musician of that age, and the scenery was designed by Inigo Jones Carew's short amatory lyrics were exceedingly popular, and are now the only things of his that are read. Thirty or forty years later he would have fallen into the frigid style of the court poets after the Restoration, but at the time he wrote the passionate and imaginative vein of the Elizabethan period was not vholly This main quality is a certain Rubensexhausted like intensity and glow of colour The 'genial and warm tints' of the clder muse still coloured the landscape, and these were reflected back by Carew, who forms a very interesting link between the Elizabethans and the age after himself. He came under the influence of Donne, and he abounds in extravagant conceits, even on grave elegiac subjects. In his Epitaph on the Daughter of Sir Thomas Wentworth he says

> And here the precious dust is Inid, Whose purely temper'd clay was made So fine that it the guest betray'd Else the soul grew so fast within, It broke the outward shell of sin,

So though a virgin, yet a Bride Lo every grace, she justified A cluste Polygamy, and died

And so was hatch'd a Cherubin

Archbishop French protested against Carew's being grouped with Waller but below him 'he is immensely his superior,' he thinks, 'in many of Carew's lighter pieces there is an underlying vein of carnestness which is wholly wanting in the other' Even those who deny him pathos or natural feeling admit him to have been at least a most accomplished writer of polished vers docusion. The following famous song, Edward FitzGerald said, is 'exaggerated, like all in Charles's time, but very beautiful'. It was extensively imitated, answered, and argued out in similar strains, and even burlesqued—there is a long series of songs beginning 'Ask me no more,' 'Tell me no more,' 'I tell you true,' I ask thee whence,' and the like

Song

Ask me no more where Jove bestows, When June is past, the fading rose? For in your Beauty's orient deep, These flowers, as in their causes, sleep

Ask me no more, whither do stray The golden atoms of the day? For in pure love heaven did prepare Those powders to enrich your hair

Ask me no more, whither doth haste The Nightingale, when May is past? For in your sweet dividing throat She winters, and keeps warm her note.

Ask me no more, where those stars 'light That downward fall in dead of night? For in your eyes they sit, and there Fixed become as in their sphere

Ask me no more, if east or west. The Phænix builds her spicy nest? For unto you at last she flies, And in your fragrant bosom dies.

The Compliment

I do not love thee for that fur Rich fan of thy most curious hair, Though the wires thereof be drawn I incr than the threads of lawn, And are softer than the leaves

And are softer than the leaves On which the subtle spinner weaves.

I do not love thee for those flowers Growing on thy cheeks—Love's bowers, Though such cunning bath them spread, None can part their white and red Love's golden arrows thence are shot, Yet for them I love thee not

I do not love thee for those soft
Red coral lips I've kissed so oft,
Nor teeth of pearl, the double guard
To speech, whence music still is heard,
Though from those lips a kiss being taken,
Would Tyrants melt, and Death awaken

I do not love thee, oh! my fairest,
I or that richest, for that rarest
Silver pillar, which stands under Thy round head, that globe of wonder,
I hough that neck be whiter far
Than towers of polish'd ivory are.

I love not for those eyes, nor hair, Nor checks, nor hps, nor teeth so rare,

> Nor for thy hand nor foot so small, But wouldst thou know, dear Sweet?—for All!

Song

Would you know what's soft? I dare Not bring you to the down or air, Nor to stars to shew what's bright, Nor to snow to teach you white.

Nor, if you would Music hear, Call the Orbs to take your car, Nor to please your sense bring forth Bruised Nard or what's more worth

Or on food were your thoughts placed, Bring you Nectar, for a taste Would you have all these in one? Name my Mistress, and 'tis done

Mediocrity in Love Rejected

Give me more Love, or more Disdain,
The torrid or the frozen zone
Bring equal ease unto my pain,
I he temperate affords me none
Either extreme, of love or hate,
Is sweeter than a calm estate.

Give me a storm, if it be Love,
Like Danne in that golden shower,
I swim in pleasure, if it prove Disdain, that torrent will devour

THOMAS CARFW

By permission, from the Portrait of 'Two Centlemen in the Royal

Collection at Windsor

My vulture hopes, and he's possessed Of Heaven that's but from Hell released Then crown my joys or cure my pain, Give me more Love, or more Disdain.

Disdain Returned.

He that loves a rosy cheek,
Or a coral lip admires,
Or from starlike eyes doth seek
Fuel to maintain his fires,
As old Time makes these decay,
So his flames must waste away

But a smooth and steadfast mind,
Gentle thoughts and calm desires
Hearts with equal love combined,
Kindle never dying fires.
Where these are not, I despise
Lovely cheeks, or lips, or eyes

No tears, Celia, now shall win
My resolved heart to return,
I have search'd thy soul within,
And find nought but pride and scorn;
I have learn'd thy arts, and now
Can disdain as much as thou.

Some Power, in my revenge, convey That Love to her I cast away

The Spring

Now that the Winter's gone, the Earth hath lost Her snow-white robes, and now no more the frost Candies the grass, or calls an icy cream Upon the silver lake or crystal stream, But the warm sun thaws the benumbed earth, And makes it tender, gives a sacred birth To the dead swallow, wakes in hollow tree The drowsy Cuckoo and the Humble bee Now do a choir of chirping ministrels sing, In triumph to the world, the youthful Spring The valleys, hills, and woods, in rich array, Welcome the coming of the long'd for May

Now all things smile only my Love doth lour,
Nor hath the scalding noon day Sun the power
To melt that marble ice, which still doth hold
Her heart congeal'd, and makes her pity cold
The ox, which lately did for shelter flie
Into the stall, doth now securely he
In open field, and love no more is made
By the fire side, but in the cooler shade.
Amyntas now doth by his Cloris sleep
Under a Sycamore, and all things keep I'me with the season only she doth carry
June in her eyes, in her heart January

Carews Poems (1640) have been edited by W. C. Hizlitt (1870). J. W. Ebsworth (1893) and Arthur Vincent ("Muses Library, 1895).

William Strode (1602-45), born near Plympton, Devon, from Westminster passed to Christ Church, Oxford, and became canon thereof and public orator, as well as doctor of divinity. He must have known Lyly's 'Cupid and my Campaspe' (page 315)

Answer to 'The Lover's Melancholy'

Return, my joys! and hither bring A tongue not made to speak, but sing, A jolly spleen, an inward feast, A causeless laugh without a jest, A face which gladness doth anoint, An arm for joy, flung out of joint . A sprightful gait that leaves no print, And makes a feather of a flint, A heart that 's lighter than the air, An eye still dancing in its sphere; Strong mirth which nothing shall control, A body nimbler than a soul, Free wandering thoughts not tied to muse, Which, thinking all things, nothing choose. Which, ere we see them come, are gone These life itself doth feed upon Men take no care but only to be jolly. To be more wretched than we must, is folly

Kisses.

My love and I for kisses played
She would keep stakes—I was content,
But when I won, she would be paid,
This made me ask her what she meant
'Pray, since I see,' quoth she, 'your wrangling vein.
Take your own kisses, give me mine again'

William Habington (1605-54) was born and lived at Hindlip Hall, Worcestershire, a house with more priest's holes than any other in England His life presents few incidents, though he came of a race of Catholic conspirators. His father lay for six years in the Tower over Babington's conspiracy, his uncle was hanged for his share in the The poet's mother atoned in some same plot measure for this disloyalty, for she is said to have been the writer of the famous letter to Lord Monteagle which averted the execution of the Gunpowder Plot. The poet was educated at St Omer's, but declined to become a Jesuit. About 1631 he married Lucy Herbert, youngest daughter of the first Lord Powis, whom he had celebrated under the name of Castara. His collected poems-also entitled Castara-were published in 1634-40, the volume consisting of 'The Mistress,' 'The Wife,' and 'The Holy Man' These titles include each several copies of verses, and the same design was The short life of afterwards adopted by Cowley the poct seems to have glided quietly away, cheered by the society and affection of his Castara had no stormy passions to agitate him, and no unruly imagination to control or subdue. poetry is of the same unruffled description-placid, tender, and often elegant, but studded with conceits to show his wit and fancy When he talks of meadows wearing a 'green plush,' of the fire of mutual love purifying an infected city, and of a luxurious feast so rich that heaven must have rained showers of sweetmeats, as if

Heaven were Blackfriars, and each star a confectioner—

we are astonished to find one who could ridicule the 'madness of quaint oaths' and the 'fine rhetoric of clothes' in the gallants of his day, fall into such absurd and tasteless puerilities Habington had all the vices of the 'metaphysical' school, excepting its occasional and sometimes studied licentiousness He tells us himself (in his preface) that 'if the innocency of a chaste muse shall be more acceptable, and weigh heavier in the balance of esteem, than a fame begot in adultery of study, I doubt I shall leave no hope of competition' And of a pure attachment he says that 'when Love builds upon the rock of Chastity, it may safely contemn the battery of the waves and threatenings of the wind, since Time, that makes a mockery of the firmest structures, shall itself be ruinated before that be demolished?

Description of Castara.

Like the violet which alone
Prospers in some happy shade,
My Castara lives unknown, to no looser eye betrayed,
For she's to herself untrue,
Who delights i' th' public view

Such is her beauty, as no arts Have enriched with borrowed grace, Her high birth no pride imparts, For she blushes in her place Folly boasts a glorious blood, She is noblest, being good

Cautious, she knew never yet
What a wanton courtship meant,
Nor speaks loud, to boast her wit,
In her silence eloquent
Of herself survey she takes,
But 'tween men no difference makes.

She obeys with speedy will Her grave parents' wise commands,
And so innocent, that ill
She nor acts nor understands
Women's feet run still astray,
If once to ill they know the way

She sails by that rock, the court,
Where oft Honour splits her mast,
And retiredness thinks the port,
Where her fame may anchor east
Virtue safely cannot sit,
Where vice is enthroned for wit

She holds that day's pleasure best,
Where sin waits not on delight,
Without mask, or ball, or feast,
Sweetly spends a winter's night
O'er that darkness, whence is thrust
Prayer, and sleep oft governs lust

She her throne makes reason climb, While wild passions captive he And each article of time. Her pure thoughts to heaven fly All her yows religious be, And her love she yows to me.

Epistle to a Friend.

I hate the country's dirt and manners, yet I love the silence, I embrace the wit And courtship, flowing here in a full tide, But loathe the expense, the vanity and pride. No place each way is happy Here I hold Commerce with some who to my care unfold. After a due oath ministered, the height And greatness of each star shines in the state, The brightness, the eclipse, the influence. With others I commune who tell me whence The torrent doth of foreign discord flow, Relate each skirmish, battle, overthrow, Soon as they happen, and by rote can tell Those German towns even puzzle me to spell. The cross or prosperous fate of princes they Ascribe to rashness, cunning, or delay, And on each action comment, with more skill Than upon Livy did old Machiavel O busy folly! Why do I my brain Perplex with the dull policies of Spain, Or quick designs of France? Why not repair To the pure innocence o' th' country air, And neighbour thee, dear friend? who so dost give Thy thoughts to worth and virtue, that to live Blest, is to trace thy ways There might not we Arm against passion with philosophy,

And by the aid of leisure so control Whate'er is earth in us, to grow all soul? Knowledge doth ignorance engender, when We study mysteries of other men, Do but in thy own shade-And foreign plo s Thy head upon some flowery pillow laid, Kind nature's 'housewifery-contemplate all His stratagems, who labours to enthral The world to his great master, and you'll find Ambition mocks itself, and grasps the wind Not conquest makes us great Blood is too dear A price for glory Honour doth appear To statesmen like a vision in the night, And, juggler like, works o' th' deluded sight Th' unbusied only wise for no respect Endangers them to error, they affect Truth in her naked beauty, and behold Man with an equal eye, not bright in gold Or tall in title, so much him they weigh As virtue raiseth him above his clay Thus let us value things and since we find Time bend us toward earth, let's in our mind Create new youth, and arm against the rude Assaults of age, that no dull solitude O' th' country dead our thoughts, nor busy care O' th' town make us to think, where now we are, And whither we are bound Time ne'er forgot His journey, though his steps we numbered not

Thomas Randolph (1605-35) wrote miscellaneous poems and six plays, all edited by W C Hazlitt in 1875 He was born at Newnham-cum-Badby, near Daventry, Northamptonshire, from Westminster passed in 1623 to Trinity College, Cambridge, and in 1629 was elected a fellow He was early distinguished for talents that procured him the friendship of Ben Jonson and the Ben enrolled him among other wits of the day his adopted sons, but Randolph fell into intemperate habits, and the fine promise of his genius was cut short by his death in his thirtieth year at Blatherwick, in his native county His poems are bright and sometimes humorous Aristippus and The Concerted Peddler are academic interludes, The Jealous Lover is a cleverly written but very artificial comedy, The Muse's Looking-glass is a satire, in pseudo-dramatic form, on the several vices, and the virtues find occasion to join in a dance, Amyntas is a pastoral play on materials derived from Tasso and other Italians, though the plot is Randolph's own

When age hath made me what I am not now, And every wrinkle tells me where the plough Of time hath furrowed, when an ice shall flow Through every vein, and all my head be snow, When Death displays his coldness in my cheek, And I myself in my own picture seek, Not finding what I am, but what I was, In doubt which to believe, this or my glass, Yet though I alter, this remains the same As it was drawn, retains the primitive frame And first complexion, here will still be seen Blood on the cheek, and down upon the chin

Here the smooth brow will stay, the lively eye, The ruddy lip, and hair of youthful dye. Behold what frailty we in man may see, Whose shadow is less given to change than he!

To a Lady admiring herself in a Looking-glass.

Fair lady, when you see the grace Of beauty in your looking glass, A stately forehead, smooth and high, And full of princely majesty, A sparkling eye, no gem so fair, Whose lustre dims the Cyprian star, A glorious cheek, divinely sweet, Wherein both roses kindly meet; A cherry lip that would entice Lven gods to kiss at any price, You think no beauty is so rare That with your shadow might compare That your reflection is alone The thing that men most dote upon Madam, alas ' your glass doth lie, And you are much deceived, for I A beauty know of richer grace-Sweet, be not angry-'tis your face Hence, then, O learn more mild to be, And leave to lay your blame on me If me your real substance move, When you so much your shadow love, Wise nature would not let your eye Look on her own bright majesty, Which had you once but gazed upon, You could except yourself love none What then you cannot love, let me, That face I can, you cannot see.

'Now you have what to love,' you'll say,
'What then is left for me, I pray?'
My face, sweet heart, if it please thee,
That which you can, I cannot see
So either love shall gain his due,
Yours, sweet, in me, and mine in you.

James Howell (1594?-1666), whose collection of Familiar Letters is still an English classic, was the son of the minister of Abernant, in Caermarthenshire, and having been educated at Hereford and Jesus College, Oxford, went to London in quest of employment. Appointed steward to a patent-glass manufactory, he went abroad in 1616 to procure materials and engage workmen. In the course of his four years' travels he visited Holland, Flanders, France, Spain, and Italy, brought capable workmen from Middelburg, Venice, and elsewhere, and, being of an acute and inquisitive turn, laid up a store of useful observations on men and manners, besides acquiring an extensive knowledge of modern languages His connection with the glass company soon after ceased, and he again visited France as the travelling companion of a young gentleman After this he was sent to Spain (1622) as agent for the recovery of an English vessel which had been seized in Sardinia on the charge of smuggling, but his good hopes of obtaining redress being destroyed by the breaking off of Prince Charles's proposed marriage with the Infanta, he returned to England in 1624 next office was that of secretary to Lord Scrope. Lord-President of the North, and in 1627 he was chosen by the corporation of Richmond in Yorkshire to be one of their representatives in Parlia-In 1632 he visited Copenhagen as secretary to the English ambassador, and prepared the Latin orations of condolence with the Danish king on the loss of his mother At Nottingham in 1642 he was appointed a clerk to the Privy Council, but being 'prodigally inclined,' according to Anthony Wood, 'and therefore running much into debt,' he was imprisoned eight years in the Fleet, by order of a committee of Parliament. Here he remained, supporting himself by translating and composing In 1661 he became historioga variety of works rapher-royal, the first who ever enjoyed that title, and having continued his literary vocation till his death on 3rd November 1666, he may be accounted after Markham (page 398) as one of the earliest Englishmen to make a livelihood by his pen. His fortyone publications comprise translations from Italian, French, and Spanish, controversies, pamphlets, and books on history, politics, and philological questions His Instructions for Forreine Travel (1642) was reprinted by Professor Arber in 1869, his new editions of Cotgrave's French dictionary are interesting to lexicographers, he published a description of London and a history of all the battles between England and Scotland, apologues, A Trance or News from Hell, and The Party of Beasts (an allegory) But this witty and entertaining writer is now chiefly remembered for his Epistolæ Ho-Elianæ, or Familiar Letters, Domestic and Foreign, divided into Sundry Sections, partly Historical, Political, and Philosophical (published in four instalments, in 1645, 1647, 1650, and 1655) The letters are dated from various places at home and abroad, but most of them seem to have been composed as a deliberate literary undertaking in the Fleet Prison, though many of them were no doubt based on his actual letters or notes of some kind, and not solely drawn from memory marks on the leading events and characters of the time, as well as the description of what he saw in foreign countries, and the reflections with which his letters abound, are entertaining reading, though a large proportion of his learning is second hand, many of his most interesting facts are taken straight from books, and inaccurate statements are frequent, and the interest is rather autobiographical than historical They set a fashion of fictitious letterwriting, and Defoe seems to have known them The letters are marked by lucidity, vivacity, and variety, are quite exceptional in that or any age, and have generally been voted one of the most amusing volumes extant Montaigne's essays and Howell's letters were Thackeray's 'bedside books,' constantly in use Hallam judged Howell rather harshly, declaring he 'had no wit, but abundance of conceit, flat and commonplace enough? Certainly the letters are extraordinarily unequal in interest, some being obviously mere compendiums of such books as he could lay hands on at the time

Letter from Venice

These wishes come to you from Venice, a place where there is nothing wanting that heart can wish renowned Venice, the admiredst city in the world, a city that all Europe is bound unto, for she is her greatest rampart against that huge eastern tyrant, the Turk, by sea, else I believe he had over run all Christendom by this time. Against him this city hath perform'd notable exploits, and not only against him, but divers others she hath restored emperors to their thrones, and popes to their chairs, and with her gallies often preserv'd St Peter's bark from sinking for which, by way of reward, one of his successors espous'd her to the sea, which marriage is solemnly renew'd every year in solemn procession by the Doge and all the Clarissimos, and a gold ring cast into the sea out of the great galeass, call'd the Bucen toro, wherein the first ccremony was perform'd by the pope himself, above three hundred years since, and they say it is the self same vessel still, tho' often put upon the careen and trimm'd. This made me think on that famous ship at Athens, nav, I fell upon an abstracted notion in philosophy, and a speculation touching the body of man, which being in perpetual flux, and a kind of succession of decays, and con sequently requiring, ever and anon, a restoration of what it loseth of the virtue of the former aliment, and what was converted after the third concoction into a blood and fleshy substance, which, as in all other sublunary bodies that have internal principles of heat, useth to transpire, breathe out, and waste away through in visible pores, by exercise, motion, and sleep, to make room still for a supply of new nounture I fell, I say, to consider whether our bodies may be said to be of like condition with this Bucentoro, which, tho' it be reputed still the same vessel, yet I believe there's not a foot of that timber remaining which it had upon the first dock, having been, as they tell me, so often planked and ribbed, caulked and pierced. In like manner, our bodies may be said to be daily repaired by new sus tenance, which begets new blood, and consequently new spirits, new humours, and, I may say, new flesh, the old, by continual dependition and insensible transpirations, evaporating still out of us, and giving way to fresh, so that I make a question whether, by reason of these perpetual reparations and accretions, the body of man may be said to be the same numerical body in his old age that he had in his manhood, or the same in his manhood that he had in his youth, the same in his youth that he carried about with him in his childhood, or the same in his childhood which he wore first in the womb I make a doubt whether I had the same identical individually numerical body, when I carried a calf leather sachel to school in Hereford, as when I wore a lambskin hood in Oxford, or whether I have the same mass of blood in my veins, and the same flesh now in Venice, which I carry'd about me three years since, up and down London streets, having, in lieu of beer and ale, drunk wine all this while, and fed upon different yiands. Now, the stomach is like a crucible, for it hath a chemical kind of vertue to transmute one body into another, to transubstantiate fish and fruits into flesh within and about us but the' it be question able whether I wear the same flesh which is fluxible, I am sure my hair is not the same, for you may remember

I went flaxen haired out of England, but you shall find me returned with a very dark brown, which I impute not only to the heat and air of those hot countries I have eat my bread in, but to the quality and difference of food But you will say that hair is but an excrementatious thing, and makes not to this purpose, morcover, me thinks I hear you say that this may be true only in the blood and spirits, or such fluid parts, not in the solid and heterogeneal parts. But I will press no further at this time this philosophical notion, which the sight of Bucentoro infused into me, for it hath already made me exceed the bounds of a letter, and, I fear me, to trespass too much upon your patience, I leave the further dis quisition of this point to your own contemplations, who are a far riper philosopher than I, and have waded deeper into and drank more of Aristotle's well But, to conclude, tho' it be doubtful whether I carry about me the same body or no in all points that I had in England, I am well assur'd I bear still the same mind, and therein I verify the old verse

'Calum non annuum mutant qui trans mare currunt'

'The air but not the mind they change,
Who in outlandish countries range'

For what alterations soever happen in this microcosm, in this little world, this small bulk and body of mine, you may be confident that nothing shall alter my affections, specially towards you, but that I will persevere still the same—the very same

Letter from Rome

I am now come to Rome, and Rome, they say, is every man's country, she is called Communis Patria, for every one that is within the compass of the Latin Church finds himself here, as it were, at home, and in his mother's house, in regard of interest in religion, which is the cause that for one native there be five strangers that sojourn in this city, and without any distinction or mark of strangeness, they come to preferments and offices, both in church and state, according to merit, which is more valued and sought after here than anywhere

But whereas I expected to have found Rome elevated upon seven hills, I met her rather spreading upon a flat, having humbled herself, since she was made a Christian, and descended from those hills to Campus Martius, with Trastevere, and the suburbs of Saint Peter, she hath yet in compass about fourteen miles, which is far short of that vast circuit she had in Claudius his time, for Vopiscus writes she was then of fifty miles' circumference, and she had five hundred thousand free citizens in a famous cense that was made, which, allowing but six to every family in women, children, and servants, came to three millions of souls, but she is now a wilderness in comparison of that number The pope is grown to be a great temporal prince of late years, for the State of the Church extends above 300 miles in length, and 200 miles in breadth, it contains Ferrara, Bologna, Romagnia, the Marquisate of Ancona, Umbria, Sabina, Perugia, with a part of Tuscany, the patrimony, Rome herself, and In these there are above fifty bishoprics, the pope hath also the duchy of Spoleto, and the exarchate of Ravenna, he hath the town of Benevento in the kingdom of Naples, and the country of Venisse, called Avignon, in France He hath title also good enough to Naples itself, but, rather than offend his champion, the king of Spain, he is contented with a white mule, and purse of pistoles about the neck, which he receives every year for a herriot or homage, or what you will call it, he pretends also to be lord paramount of Sicily, Urbin, Parma, and Mascran, of Norway, Ireland, and England, since King John did prostrate our crown at Pandulfo his legate's feet

The state of the apostolic see here in Italy lieth 'twist two seas, the Adriatic and the Tyrrhene, and it runs through the midst of Italy, which makes the pope power ful to do good or harm, and more capable than any other to be an umpire or an enemy. His authority being mixed 'twist temporal and spiritual, disperseth itself into so many members, that a young man may grow old here before he can well understand the form of government.

The consistory of cardinals meet but once a week, and once a week they solemnly wait all upon the pope am told there are now in Christendom but sixty eight cardinals, whereof there are six cardinal bishops, fifty one cardinal priests, and eleven cardinal deacons cardinal bishops attend and sit near the pope, when he celebrates any festival, the cardinal priests assist him at mass, and the cardinal deacons attire him A cardinal is made by a short breve or writ from the pope in these words Creamus te socium regious, superiorem ducibus, et fratrem nostrum 'We create thee a companion to kings, superior to dukes, and our brother' If a cardinal bishop should be questioned for any offence, there must be twenty four witnesses produced against him The Bishop of Ostia hath most privilege of any other, for he consecrates and instals the pope, and goes always next to All these cardinals have the repute of princes, and besides other incomes, they have the annats of benefices to support their greatness

For point of power, the pope is able to put 50,000 men in the field, in case of necessity, besides his naval strength in gallies We read how Paul III sent Charles III 12,000 foot and 500 horse Pius V sent a greater aid to Charles IX, and for riches, besides the temporal dominions he hath in all the countries before named, the datary or despatching of bulls. The triennial subsidies, annats, and other ecclesiastical rights mount to an un known sum, and it is a common saying here, that as long as the pope can finger a pen, he can want no pence. Plus V notwithstanding his expenses in buildings, left four millions in the Castle of Saint Angelo in less than five years, more, I believe, than this Gregory XV will, for he hain many nephews, and better is it to be the pope's nephew, than to be a favourite to any prince in Christendom

Touching the temporal government of Rome, and op pidan affairs, there is a pretor and some choice citizens, who sit in the Capitol Among other pieces of policy, there is a synagogue of Jews permitted here (as in other places of Italy) under the pope's nose, but they go with a mark of distinction in their hats, they are tolerated for advantage of commerce, wherein the Jews are wonder ful dexterous, though most of them be only brokers and Lombardeers, and they are held to be here, as the cynic held women to be, malum necessarium

Present Rome may be said to be but a monument of Rome past, when she was in that flourish that St Austin desired to see her in. She who tamed the world, tamed herself at last, and falling under her own weight, fell to be a prey to time, yet there is a providence seems to have a care of her still, for though her air be not so good, nor her circumjacent soil so kindly as it was, yet she hath wherewith to keep life and soul together still, by her ecclesiastical courts, which is the sole cause of her peopling now, so that it may be said, when the pope came to be her liead, she was reduced to her first prin ciples, for as a shepherd was founder, so a shepherd is still governor and preserver

Howell tells the story of the 'Pied Piper of Hamelen' much as it is given by Browning, who may have taken it hence of from Verstegan, he shows in two letters that popular opinion in England inclined to the belief that Raleigh had deliberately fibbed about the gold-mines he pretended to go in search of on that last disastrous expedition, he reports the murder of Buckingham by Felton when the news reached him, describes the languages and religions of all countries in the world, as far as he could find out about them, has many pious and theological reflections, some naughty stories, and many statements as facts which are manifest fables (as of the lady, commemorated by Corvate also, who as a punishment for discourtesy to a poor woman bore 365 children at a birth), gives a complete statistical account of the Low Countries, and a history of the Inquisition, propounds a scheme of spelling reform, and intersperses not a few poems and hymns, most highly unpoetic. His notion of tolerance may be seen from his saying, 'I pity rather than hate Turk or Infidel if I hate any, 'tis those Schismaticks that puzzle the sweet peace of our Church, so that I could be content to see an Anabaptist go to Hell on a Brownist's back.' An account of the wine countries of the world begins with Greece, Spain, and Portugal, and then goes on to France

On Wines

I rance, participating of the climes of all the countries about her, affords wines of quality accordingly, as, to wards the Alps and Italy, she hath a luseious rich wine called Frontiniac In the country of Provence, towards the Pyrenees in Languedoc, there are wines congustable with those of Spain one of the prime sort of white wines is that of Beaume, and of clarets, that of Orleans, though it be interdicted to wine the king's cellar with it, in respect of the corrosiveness it carries with it. As in France, so in all other wine-countries, the white is called the scmale, and the claret or red wine is called the male, because commonly it hath more sulphur, body, and heat in't the wines that our merchants bring over upon the river of Garonne, near Bordeaux, in Gascony, which is the greatest mart for wines in all France. The Scot, because he hath always been a useful confederate to France against England, hath (among other privileges) right of pre emption of first choice of wines in Bordeaux, he is also permitted to carry his ordnance to the very walls of the town, whereas the English are forced to leave them at Blay, a good way distant down the river is a hard green wine, that grows about Rochelle, and the islands thereabouts, which the cunning Hollander sometime used to fetch, and he hath a trick to put a bag of herbs, or some other infusions, into it—as he doth brim stone in Rhenish-to give it a whiter tincture and more sweetness, then they re embark it for England, where it passeth for good Bachrag [Bacharach], and this is called stuming of wines. In Normandy there's little or no wine at all grows, therefore the common drink of that country is cider, specially in low Normandy. There are also many beer houses in Paris and elsewhere, but though their barley and water be better than ours, or that of Germany, and though they have English and Dutch brewers among them, yet they cannot make beer in that perfection

The prime wines of Germany grow about the Rhine. specially in the Psalts [Pfalz] or Lower Palatinate about Bachrag, which hath its etymology from Bacchi ara, for in ancient times there was an altar erected there to the honour of Bacchus, in regard of the richness of the wines Here, and all France over, 'tis held a great part of incivility for maidens to drink wine until they are married. as it is in Spain for them to wear high shoes or to paint till then. The German mothers, to make their sons fall into a hatred of wine, do use, when they are little, to put some owls' eggs into a cup of Rhenish, and sometimes a little living eel, which twingling in the wine while the child is drinking, so scares him, that many come to abhor and have an antipathy to wine all their lives after From Bachrag the first stock of vines which grow now in the Grand Canary Island were brought, which, with the heat of the sun and the soil, is grown now to that height of perfection, that the wines which they afford are accounted the richest, the most firm, the best bodied, and lastingst wine, and the most defecated from all earthly grossness, of any other whatsoever, it hath little or no sulphur at all in't, and leaves less dregs behind, though one drink it to excess French wines may be said but to pickle meat in the stomachs, but this is the wine that digests, and doth not only breed good blood, but it nutrifieth also, being a glutinous substantial liquor of this wine, if of any other, may be verified that merry induction, 'that good wine makes good blood, good blood causeth good humours, good humours cause good thoughts, good thoughts bring forth good works, good works carry a man to heaven-ergo, good wine carrieth a man to heaven' If this be true, surely more English go to heaven this way than any other, for I think there's more Canary brought into England than to all the world besides I think also, there is a hundred times more drunk under the name of Canary wine than there is brought in, for Sherries and Malagas, well mingled, pass for Canaries in most taverns, more often than Canary itself, else I do not see how 'twere possible for the vintner to save by it, or to live by his calling, unless he were permitted sometimes to be a brewer Sacks and Canaries were brought in first among us, they were used to be drunk in aqua vita measures, and 'twas held fit only for those to drink who were used to carry their legs in their hands, their eyes upon their noses, and an almanae in their bones, but now they go down every one's throat, both young and old, like milk

The countries that are freest from excess of drinking are Spain and Italy If a woman can prove her husband to have been thrice drunk, by the ancient laws of Spain she may plead for a divorce from him. Nor indeed can the Spainard, being hot brained, bear much drink, yet I have heard that Gondomar was once too hard for the king of Denmark, when he was here in England. But the Spanish soldiers that have been in the wars of Flan ders will take their cups freely, and the Italians also When I hved t'other side the Alps, a gentleman told me a merry tale of a Ligurian soldier, who had got drunk in

Genoa, and Prince Doria going a horseback to walk the round one night, the soldier took his horse by the bridle, and asked what the price of him was, for he wanted a The prince, seeing in what humour he was, caused him to be taken into a house and put to sleep In the morning he sent for him, and asked him what he would give for his horse 'Sir,' said the recovered soldier, 'the merchant that would have bought him last night of your Highness went away betimes in the morn ing' The boonest companions for drinking are the Greeks and Germans, but the Greek is the merriest of the two, for he will sing, and dance, and kiss his next companions, but the other will drink as deep as he. If the Greek will drink as many glasses as there be letters in his mistress's name, the other will drink the number of his years, and though he be not apt to break out in singing, being not of so airy a constitution, yet he will drink often musically a health to every one of these six notes, ut, re, m, fa, sol, la, which, with his reason, are all comprehended in this hexameter

'Ut relivet miserum fatum solitosque labores.'

The fewest draughts he drinks are three—the first to quench the thirst past, the second to quench the present thirst, the third to prevent the future. I heard of a company of Low Dutchmen that had drunk so deep, that beginning to stagger, and their heads turning round, they thought verily they were at sea, and that the upper chamber where they were was a ship, insomuch that, it being foul windy weather, they fell to throw the stools and other things out of the window, to lighten the vessel, for fear of suffering shipwreck

On Tobacco

To usher in again old Janus, I send you a parcel of Indian perfume which the Spaniard calls the holy herb, in regard of the various virtues it hath, but we call it tobacco, I will not say it grew under the King of Spain's window, but I am told it was gather'd near his gold mines of Potosi (where they report that in some places there is more of that ore than earth), therefore it must needs be precious stuff if moderately and seasonably taken (as I find you always do), 'tis good for many things; it helps digestion taken a while after meat, it makes one void rheum, break wind, and keeps the body open a leaf or two being steeped o'er night in a little white wine is a vomit that never fails in its operation it is a good companion to one that converseth with dead men, for if one hath been poring long upon a book, or is toil'd with the pen, and stupified with study, it quickeneth him, and dispels those clouds that usually o'erset the brain The smoke of it is one of the whole somest scents that is, against all contagious airs, for it o'er masters all other smells, as K. James, they say, found true, when being once a hunting, a shower of rain drove him into a pig sty for shelter, where he caus'd a pipe full to be taken on purpose it cannot endure a spider or a flea, with such like vermin, and if your hawk be troubled with any such, being blown into his feathers, it frees him it is good to fortify and preserve the sight, the smoke being let in round about the balls of the eyes once a week, and frees them from all rheums, driving them back by way of repercussion, being taken backward 'tis excellent good against the cholique, and taken into the stomach, 'twill heat and cleanse it, for I could instance in a great lord (my Lord of Sunderland, Presi dent of York), who told me, that he taking it downward into his stomach, it made him cast up an imposthume, bag and all, which had been a long time engendering out of a bruise he had received at football, and so preserv'd his life for many years. Now to descend from the sub stance of the smoke to the ashes, 'tis well known the medicinal virtues thereof are very many, but they are so common, that I will spare the inserting of them here but if one would try a petty conclusion how much smoke there is in a pound of tobacco, the ashes will tell him for let a pound be exactly weigh'd, and the ashes kept charily and weigh'd afterwards, what wants of a pound weight in the ashes cannot be deny'd to have been smake, which evaporated into air I have been told that Sir Walter Rawleigh won a wager of Queen Elizabeth upon this nicety. The Spaniards and Irish take it most in powder or smutchin, and it mightily refreshes the brain, and I believe there's as much taken this way in Ircland as there is in pipes in England, one shall commonly see the serving maid upon the washing block, and the swain upon the plough share, when they are tir'd with labour, take out their boxes of smutchin and draw it into their nostrils with a quill, and it will beget new spirits in them with a fresh vigour to fall to their work again. Barbary and other parts of Afric, 'tis wonderful what a small pill of tobacco will do, for those who use to ride post thro' the sandy desarts, where they meet not with anything that's potable or edible, sometimes three days together, they use to carry small balls or pills of tobacco, which being put under the tongue, it affords them a per petual moisture and takes off the edge of the appetite for some days

If you desire to read with pleasure all the virtues of this modern herb, you must read Dr Thorus's Paciologia [Raphael Thorius, Hymnus Tabaci sive de Pacto, 1644], an accurate piece couch'd in a strenuous heroic verse, full of matter, and continuing its strength from first to last, insomuch, that for the bigness it may be compar'd to any piece of antiquity, and, in my opinion, is beyond βατραχομυσμαχία [The Battle of the Frogs and the Mice, erroneously attributed to Homer] or γαλεωμισμαχία [The Battle of the Cats and the Mice, a burlesque poem by the twelfth century Greek, Theodorus Prodromus]

So I conclude these rambling notions, presuming you will accept this small argument of my great respects to you if you want paper to light your pipe, this letter may serve the turn, and if it be true what the poets frequently sing, that affection is fire, you shall need no other than the clear flames of the donor's love to make ignition, which is comprehended in this distich

'Ignis amor si fit, tolaccim accendere nostrum, Nulla petenda tibi fax nisi dantis amor'

'If love be fire, to light this Indian weed, The donor's love of fire may stand instead' FLEET, 1 Jan. 1646

On Learning in England.

The subject of this letter may peradventure seem a paradox to some, but not, I know, to your lordship, when you have pleased to weigh well the reasons. Learning is a thing that hath been much cried up and coveted in all ages, especially in this last century of years, by people of all sorts, tho' never so mean and mechanical every man strains his fortunes to keep his children at school, the cobler will clout it till midnight, the porter will carry burdens till his bones crack again, the plough man will pinch both back and belly to give son learning, and I find that this ambition reigns where so much as in this island But under favour s word learning is taken in a narrower sense among its in among other nations, we seem to restrain it only the book, whereas, indeed, any artisan whatsoever he know the secret and mystery of his trade) may be led a learned man a good mason, a good shocmaker, at can manage St Crispin's lance handsomely, a skil yeoman, a good shipwright, &c., may all be called rned men, and indeed the usefullest sort of learned en, for without the two first we might go barefoot, d he abroad as beasts, having no other canopy than e wild air, and without the two last we might starve bread, have no commerce with other nations, or ever able to tread upon a continent These, with such like xtrous artisans, may be termed learned men, and the ore behaveful for the subsistence of a country, than ose Polymathists that stand poring all day in a corner on a moth eaten author, and converse only with dead The Chinese (who are the next neighbours to e rising sun on this side of the hemisphere, and con quently the acutest) have a wholesome piece of policy, at the son is always of the father's trade, and 'tis all e learning he aims at which makes them admirable tisans, for, besides the dextrousness and propensity of e child, being descended lineally from so many of the me trade, the father is more careful to instruct him, id to discover to him all the mystery thereof. This neral custom or law keeps their heads from running at ndom after book-learning, and other vocations ad a tale of Rob Grosthead [Grosseteste], Bishop of Lin oln, that being come to this greatness, he had a brother ho was a husbandman, and expected great matters from m in point of preferment, but the bishop told him that he wanted money to mend his plow or his cart, or to my tacklings for his horses, with other things belonging his husbandry, he should not want what was fitting, at wish'd him to aim no higher, for a husbandman he ound him, and a husbandman he would leave him.

The extravagant humour of our country is not to be together commended, that all men should aspire to ook learning there is not a simpler animal, and a more iperfluous member of state, than a more scholar, than any a self pleasing student, he is——Tellar is mutile popular.

From Howell's Instructions for Foreine Travel, which, like his Letters, contains many acute obserations on men and things, we extract this on the

Tales of Travellers

Others have a custom to be always relating strange nings and wonders (of the humour of Sir John Man eville), and they usually present them to the hearers irough multiplying glasses, and thereby cause the thing appear for greater than it is in itself, they make nountains of mole hills, like Charenton Bridge echo, thich doubles the sound nine times Such a traveller vas he that reported the Indian fly to be as big as a ox, China birds to be as big as some horses, and their nice to be as big as monkeys, but they have the wit o fetch this far enough off, because the hearer may ather believe it than make a voyage so far to disprove it Every one knows the tale of him who reported he had een a cabbage under whose leaves a regiment of soldiers vere sheltered from a shower of rain. Another who was no triveller, yet the wiser man, said he had passed by a place where there were 400 brasiers making of a caldron—200 within and 200 without, beating the nails in, the traveller asking for what use that huge caldron was, he told him 'Sir, it was to boil your cabbage'

Such another was the Spanish traveller, who was so habituated to hyperbolise and relate wonders, that he became ridiculous in all companies, so that he was forced at last to give order to his man, when he fell into any excess this way, and report anything improbable, he should pull him by the sleeve. The master falling into his wonted hyperboles, spoke of a church in China that was ten thousand yards long, his man, standing behind, and pulling him by the sleeve, made him stop suddenly. The company asking 'I pray, sir, how broad might that church be?' he replied 'But a yard broad, and you may thank my man for pulling me by the sleeve, else I had made it foursquare for you'

The following may serve as a specimen of his poetry, from a farewell letter to a dying friend

This Life's at longest but one Day,
He who in youth posts hence away,
Leaves us i' th' morn—He who hath run
His race till Manhood parts at Noon
And who at seventy odd forsakes this Light,
He may be said to take his leave at Night

John Earle (1601?-65), a native of York, studied at Oxford, was deprived of his living in 1643, was Chaplain and Clerk of the Closet to Charles II in exile, became successively Bishop of Worcester and of Salisbury, and was a very successful miscellaneous writer He had great learning and eloquence, was extremely agreeable and facetious in conversation, and was a man of so many excellences that, in the language of, Walton, there had lived since the death of Richard Hooker no man 'whom God had blessed with more innocent wisdom, more sanctified learning, or a more pious, peaceable, primitive temper? He dealt very tenderly with the Nonconformists, and, according to Clarendon, he was among the few excellent men who never had and never could have an enemy. He wrote some poems, but his principal work is Microcosmographie, or a Peece of the World Discovered in Essayes and Characters (1628), a marvellous storchouse of wit and humour Collections of 'characters' were long exceedingly common and popular-some two hundred such have been catalogued—and form a link between the 'humours' of the old comedy on the one hand, and the familiar essay and novel of the eighteenth century on the other Earle's is by far the most notable 'An undeniable wit, a real gift of finished if biting satire, a constant rittle of telling epigrim, make him at his best-and he often is at his bestas good reading as the heart of man can desire,' so said the Athenaum criticising a recent edition of the Microcosmographie, and pointing out at the same time Earle's skill in handling senument and his touches of poetry Among the characters drawn are those of a raw preacher, an antiquary, a reserved man, a college butler, a carrier, a player, a pot-poet, a university dun, and a plain country fellow

A Pot-Poet

Is the dreggs of wit, yet mingled with good drinke may have some relish. His inspirations are more reall then others, for they doe but faine a God, but hee has his by him. His verses run like the tap, and his invention as the barrell, ebs and flowes at the mercy of the spiggot. In thin drinke hee aspires not above a ballad, but a cup of sacke inflames him, and sets his Muse and nose a fire together The presse is his mint, and stamps him now and then a sixe pence or two in reward of the baser coyne his pamphlet. His workes would scarce sell for three halfe pence, though they arc given oft for three shillings, but for the pretty title that allures the country gentleman and for which the printer maintaines him in ale a fortnight. His verses are like his clothes, miserable cento's and patches, yet their pace is not altogether so hobling as an almanacks. The death of a great man or the burning of a house furnish him with an argument, and the nine Muses are out strut in mourning gowne, and Melpomine cryes Fire, His other poems are but briefs in rime, and like the poore Greekes collections to redeeme from captivity He is a man now much imploy'd in commendations of our navy, and a bitter inveigher against the Spaniard His frequent'st workes goe out in single sheets, and are chanted from market to market, to a vile tune, and a worse throat whilst the poore country wench melts like her butter to heare them And these are the stories of some men of Tiburne, or a strange monster out of Germany or sitting in a baudy house, hee writes Gods judgements Hee ends at last in some obscure painted cloth, to which himselfe made the verses, and his life like a canne too full spils upon the bench He leaves twenty shillings on the score, which my hostesse looses.

A Plain Country Fellow

Is one that manures his ground well, but lets himselfe he fallow and until'd Hee has reason enough to doe his businesse, and not enough to bee idle or melancholy Hee seemes to have the judgement of Nabuchadnezar for his conversation is among beasts, and his tallons none of the shortest, only he eates not grasse, because hee loves not sallets His hand guides the plough, and the plough his thoughts, and his ditch and land marke is the very mound of his meditations. He expostulates with his oven very understandingly, and speaks Gee and Ree better then English IIIs mind is not much dis tracted with objects but if a goode fat cowe come in his way, he stands dumbe and astonisht, and though his haste bee never so great, will five here halfe an houres contemplation His habitation is some poore thatcht roofe, distinguisht from his barn by the loope holes that let out smoak, which the raine had long since washt thorow, but for the double seeling of bacon on the inside, which has hung there from his grandsires time, and is yet to make rashers for posterity. His dinner is his other worke, for he sweats at it as much as at his labour, he is a terrible fastner on a piece of beefe, and you may hope to stave the guard off sooner religion is a part of his copy-hold, which hee takes from his land lord, and referres it wholly to his dis cretion. Yet if hec give him leave, he is a good

Christian to his power, that is, comes to church in his best clothes, and sits there with his neighbours, where he is capable onely of two prayers, for raines and faire Hee apprehends Gods blessings onely in a good yeere or a fat pasture, and never praises him Sunday he esteemes a day to but on good ground make merry in, and thinkes a bag pipe as essentiall to it as evening prayer, where hee walkes very solemnly after service with his hands coupled behind him, and censures the dauncing of his parish. His complement with his neighbour is a good thumpe on the backe, and his salutation commonly some blunt curse. Hee thinks nothing to bee vices but pride and ill husbandric, for which hee wil gravely disswade youth, and has some thriftie hobnayle proverbes to clout his discourse is a niggard all the weeke except onely market day, where if his corne sell well, hee thinkes hee may be drunke with a good conscience His feete never stincke so unbecomingly as when hee trots after a lawyer in Westminster hall, and even cleaves the ground with hard scraping, in beseaching his worship to take his money Hee is sensible of no calamitie but the burning of a stacke of come or the over flowing of a medow, and thinkes Noahs flood the greatest plague that ever was, not because it drowned the world, but spoyl'd the grasse. For Death hee is never troubled, and if hee get in but his Harvest before, let it come when it wil he cares not.

A Criticke

Is one that has speld over a great many of bookes, and his observation is the orthographie. Hee is the surgeon of old authors, and heales the wounds of dust and ignorance. He converses much in fragments and Desunt multa's, and if he piece it up with two lines, he is more proud of that booke then the authour runnes over all sciences to peruse their syntaxis, and thinkes all learning compris'd in writing Latine. Hee tastes styles, as some discreeter palats doe wine, and tels you which is genuine, which sophisticate and bas tard. His owne phrase is a miscellary of old words, deceas'd long before the Cesars, and entoomb'd by Varro, and the modern'st man hee followes is Plautus writes omners at length, and quicquid, and his gerund is most inconformable. Hee is a troublesome vever of the dead, which after so long sparing must rise up to the judgement of his castigations. He is one that makes all bookes sell dearer, whilst he swels them into folios with his comments

The Microcosmographie passed through three editions in 1628, was often reprinted, was edited by Dr Philip Bliss in 1811, reprinted by Arber in 1868 and 1891, by Irwin in 1897, edited by West in 1898, and for the Cambridge Press in 1904. The first edition has but fifty four characters, the sixth (1635) had seventy eight

Owen Felltham, or FELTHAM (1602-78), author of Resolves, Divine, Morall, and Politicall, was of a good Suffolk family, and lived for some years as chaplain in the Northamptonshire house of the Earl of Thomond at Great Billing, where Felltham died and was buried. The Resolves, appeared about 1620, being a hundred short essays. To the second edition (1628) a 'seconde centurie' was added. He wrote an account of the Low Countries in 1652, and some rather interesting poems. His Resolves fell almost completely into oblivion from 1709 (the date of the twelfth edition)

till 1806, when they were reprinted by Cumming Hallam and others have condemned Felltham's prose as obscure and affected, he strains after conceits, and the comparison with Bacon's Essays, often made, is not to the advantage of Felltham But he has a fine vein of observation and reflection, not without frequent felicities of expression

Of Thoughtfulness in Misery

I like of Solon's course, in comforting his constant friend, when, taking him up to the top of a turret, overlooking all the piled buildings, he brds him think how many discontents there had been in those houses since their framing, how many are and how many will be, then, if he can, to leave the world's calamities, and mourn but for his own. To mourn for none else were hardness and injustice. To mourn for all were endless The best way is to uncontract the brow, and let the world's mad spleen fret, for that we smile in woes.

Silence was a full answer in that philosopher, that being asked what he thought of human life, said nothing, turned him round, and vanished

Of Curiosity in Knowledge

Nothing wraps a man in such a mist of errors as his own curiosity in searching things beyond him happily do they live that know nothing but what is necessary! Our knowledge doth but shew us our ignorance, we see the effect but cannot guess at the Learning is like a river whose head being far in the land, is at first rising little and easily viewed. but still as you go, it gapeth with a wider bank, not without pleasure and delightful winding, while it is on both sides set with trees and the beauties of various flowers But still the further you follow it, the deeper and the broader 'tis, till at last it inwaves itself in the unfathomed ocean, there you see more water, but no shore, no end of that liquid, fluid vastness In many things we may sound Nature in the shallows of her revelations We may trace her to her second causes, but beyond them we meet with nothing but the puzzle of the soul and the dazzle of the mind's dim eyes While we speak of things that are, that we may dissect, and have power and means to find the causes, there is some pleasure, some certainty But when we come to metaphysics, to long buried antiquity, and unto unrevealed divinity, we are in a sea which is deeper than the short reach of the line of man. Much may be gained by studious inquisition, but more will ever rest, which man cannot discover

Against Readiness to take Offence

We make ourselves more injuries than are offered us, they many times pass for wrongs in our own thoughts, that were never meant so by the heart of him that speaketh. The apprehension of wrong hurts more than the sharpest part of the wrong done. So by falsely making ourselves patients of wrong, we become the true and first actors. It is not good in matters of discourtesy to dive into a man's mind beyond his own comment, nor to stir upon a doubtful indignity without it, unless we have proofs that carry weight and conviction with them. Words do sometimes fly from the tongue that the heart did neither hatch nor harbour. While we think to revenge an injury, we many times begin one, and after that repent our misconceptions. In things that may have a double sense, it is good to think the better was intended, so shall we still both keep our friends and quietness

Of Thinking

Meditation is the soul's perspective glass, whereby in her long remove she discerneth God as if he were nearer hand I persuade no man to make at his whole life's business. We have bodies as well as souls, and even this world, while we are in it, ought somewhat to be cared for As those states are likely to flourish where execution follows sound advisements, so is man when contemplation is seconded by action Contempla tion generates, action propagates. Without the first, the latter is defective, without the last, the first is but abortive and embryous St Bernard compares contemplation to Ruchel, which was the more fair, but action to Leah, which was the more fruitful I will neither always be busy and doing, nor ever shut up in nothing but thought. Yet that which some would call idleness, I will call the sweetest part of my life, and that is, my thinking

Sir Kenelm Digby [1603-65] was born at Gothurst or Gayhurst, near Newport Pagnell, the son of the Sir Everard Digby who in 1592 came into a large estate, but seven years later turned Catholic, and was hanged for his part in the Gunpowder Plot Kenelm himself was bred a Catholic, but in 1616 was sent to a Protestant tutor, the future Archbishop Laud, and in 1618, after seven months in Spain, entered Gloucester Hall, Oxford (now Worcester College) He left it in 1620 without a degree, and spent nearly three years abroad, in Florence chiefly At Madrid he fell in with Prince Charles, and following him back to England, was knighted, and entered his service In 1625, after a singular courtship, he secretly married 'that celebrated beautie and courtezane,' Venetia Stanley (1600-33), who had been his playmate in childhood With two privateers he sailed in 1628 to the Mediterranean, and on 11th June vanguished a French and Venetian squadron off Scanderoon, in August, on the island of Melos, he began and wrote most of his Memoirs On his beloved wife's death he withdrew to Gresham College, and there passed two hermit-like years, diverting himself with chemistry and the professors' good conversation Meanwhile he had professed the Protestant faith, but, 'looking back,' in 1636 he announced his reconversion to Archbishop Laud. and his tortuous conduct during the Great Rebellion was dictated, it seems, by his zeal for Catholicism He was imprisoned by the Parliament (1642-43), and had his estate confiscated. was at Rome (1645-47), where he finished by 'hectoring at his Holiness,' and thrice revisited England (1649-51-54), the third time staying two years, and entering into close relations with Cromwell. At the Restoration, however, he was well received, and retained his office of chancellor to Queen Henrietta Maria. He was one of the first members of the Royal Society (1663)

'The very Pliny of our age for lying,' said Stubbes of Digby, whom Evelyn terms 'an arrant mountebank.' Yet he was a friend of Descartes and Sir Thomas Browne, he could appreciate the discoveries of Harvey, Bacon, and Galileo Dictionary of National Biography (vol v 1888) Mr S Lee points out that 'as a philosopher—an Aristotelian-Sir Kenelm undoubtedly owed much to Thomas White,' and he questions whether his much-vaunted 'powder of sympathy' was not really invented by Sir Gilbert Talbot. This powder-Digby professed to have learned the secret from a Carmelite who had travelled in the farthest Eastwas 'powder of vitriol'—that is, a sulphate of one of the metals powdered (presumably copperas)and had this convenience, that it did not require to be applied to the wound itself. A bandage or anything that had the blood of the wound on it could be carried to the medicine-man, and by him hopefully immersed in sympathetic mixtures, at any distance from the sufferer Anyhow, Digby's Discourse thereon (1658), like his treatise Of Bodies and of Man's Soul (1644), contains much that is curious, if little of real value, whilst in his Discourse concerning the Vegetation of Plants (1660), the chief of his other fifteen works, he 'is said to have been the first to notice the importance of vital air or oxygen to plants' See his bombastic Memoirs, dealing with his courtship (ed Nicolas, 1827), his Scanderoon Voyage (Camden Society, 1868), and his Life 'by one of his descendants' (1896)

The extracts are all from the book Of Bodius save the last, which is from the appended discourse on Digby's patent medicine

One full example this age affords us in this kind, of a man whose extremity of fear wrought upon him to give us this experiment. He was born in some village of the countrey of Liege and therfore among strangers he is known by the name of John of Liege. I have been informed of this story by several (whom I dare confidently believe) that have had it from his own mouth, and have question'd him with great curiosity particularly about it.

When he was a little boy, there being wars in the countrey (as that state is seldom without molestations from abroad, when they have no distempers at home, which is an inseparable effect of a countries situation upon the frontiers of powerful neighbouring princes that are at variance), the village of whence he was had notice of some unruly scatter'd troups that were coming to pillinge them which made all the people of the village flie hastily with what they could carry with them, to hide themselves in the woods, which were spacious enough to afford them shelter, for they joyn'd upon the Forrest of Ardenne There they lay till some of their scouts brought them word that the souldiers, of whom they were in such apprehension, had fired their town and quitted it Then all of them return'd home excepting this boy who, it seems, being of a very timorous nature, had images of fear so strong in his phantasie, that first he ran further into the wood then any of the rest, and afterwards apprehended that every body he saw through the thickets, and every voice he heard, was the souldiers, and so hid himself from his parents, that were in much distress seeing him all about, and calling his name as loud as they could. When they had spent a day or two in vain, they return'd home without him, and he lived many years in the woods, feeding upon roots and wild fruits and maste.

He said that, after he had been some time in this wilde habitation, he could by the smel judge of the tast of any thing that was to be eaten and that he could at a great distance wind by his nose where wholsom fruits or roots In this state he continu'd (still shunning men with as great fear as when he first ran away, so strong the impression was, and so little could his little reason master it) till, in a very sharp winter, when many beasts of the forrest perish'd for want of food, necessity brought him to so much confidence, that, leaving the wild places_ of the forrest, remote from all peoples dwellings, he would in the evenings steal among cattel that were fothered, especially the swine, and among them glean that which serv'd to sustain wretchedly his miserable life He could not do this so cunningly but that, returning often to it, he was on a time espied and they who saw a beast of so strange a shape (for such they took him to be, he being naked and all overgrown with hair), believing him to be a satyre or some such prodigious creature as the recounters of rare accidents tells of, laid wait to apprehend him But he, that winded them as far off as any beast could do, still avoided them, till at length they laid snares for him, and took the wind so advan tagiously of him that they caught him and then soon perceiv'd he was a man, though he had quite forgotten the use of all language, but by his gestures and cries he express'd the streatest affrightedness that might be. Which afterwards he said (when he had learn'd anew to speak) was because he thought those were the souldiers he had hidden himself to avoid, when he first betook himself to the wood, and were alwayes lively in his phantasie, through his fears continually reducing them

This man, within a little while after he came to good keeping and full feeding, quite lost that acuteness of smelling which formerly govern'd him in his taste, and grew to be in that particular as other ordinary men were. But at his first living with other people, a woman (that had compassion of him, to see a man so near like a beast, and that had no language to call for what he wish'd or needed to have) took particular care of him, and was alwayes very sollicitous to see him furnish'd with what he wanted which made him so apply himself unto her in all his occurrents, that whenever he stood in need of ought, if shee were out of the way, and were gone abroad in the fields, or to any other village near by, he would scent her out presently by his scent, in such sort as with us those dogs use to do which are taught to draw dry foot. I imagine he is yet alive, to tell a better story of himself then I have done, and to confirm what I have here said of him for I have from them who saw him but few years agone, that he was an able strong man, and likely to last yet a good while longer

The Spanish Lord was born deaf, so deaf, that, if a Gun were shot off close by his ear, he could not hear it, and consequently he was dumb, for not being able to hear the sound of words, he could never imitate nor understand them. The loveliness of his face, and especially the exceeding life and spiritfulness of his eyes, and the combiness of his person & whole com posure of his body throughout were pregnant signs of a well temper'd mind within and therfore all that knew him lamented much the want of means to cultivate it, and to imbue it with the motions which it scem'd capable of, in regard of its self, had it not been so cross'd by this unhappy accident. Which to remedy, Physitians and Chyrurgians had long imploy'd their skil, but all in viin at last, there was a Priest who undertook the teaching him to understand others when they spoke, and to speak himself that others might What at the first he was laught at understand him for, made him, after some yeers, he looked on as if he had wrought a miracle. In a word, after strange patience, constancy and pains, he brought the young Lord to speak as distinctly as any man whoever, and to understand so perfectly what others said, that he would not lose a word in a whole days conversa

To this purpose the subtilities of the Fox are of most note. They say, he uses to lie as if he were dead, therby to make Hens and Ducks come boldly to him. That, in the night when his body is unseen, he will fix his eyes upon poultry, and so make them come down to him from their roost. That, to rid himself of the fleas that afflict him in the Summer, he will sink his body by little and little into the water, while the fleas creep up to his head (to save them selves from drowning), and from thence to a bough he holds in his mouth, and will then swim away, leaving them there.

'Is said, that, in Thracia, the Countrey people know whether the rivers, that are frozen in the winter, will bear them or no, by marking whether the Foxes venture boldly over them, or retire, after they have Ini'd their ears to the Ice, to listen whether they can hear the noise of the water running under it from whence (you may imagine) they collect, that, if they hear the current of the stream, the Ice must needs be thin, and consequently dangerous to trust their weight to it

And, to busic my self no longer with their subtilities, I will conclude with a famous tale of one of these crafty animals, that, having kill'd a Goose on the other side of the river, and being desirous to swim over with it, to carry it to his den, before he would attempt it (lest his prey night prove too heavy for him to swim withal, and so he might lose it) he first reigh'd the Goose with a piece of wood, and then tri'd to carry that over the river, whiles he left his Goo e behind in a safe place which when he per ciev d he was able to do with case, he then came back again, and ventured over with his heavy bird.

They say it is the nature of the Jacatray [the Jacate, an American kind of alligator] to hide it self, and imitate the voice of such beasts, as it uses to prey upon—which makes them come to him, as to one of their own fellows, and then he seizes on and devours them

The Jaccal, that has a subtile sent, hunts after beasts, and, in the chase, by his barking, guides the Lion, (whose nose is not so good,) till they overtake what they hunt, which perulventure would be too strong for the Jaccall but the Lion kills the quarry, and, having first fed himself, leaves the Jaccal his share, and so between them both, by the ones dexterity and the others strength, they get meat for nourishment of them both

He that should tell an Indian what feats Banks's Horse would do, how he would restore a glove to the due owner, after his Master had whisper'd that man's name in his ear, how he would tell the just number of pence in any piece of silver coyn, barely shew'd him by his master, and even obey presently his command, in discharging himself of his exerciments, when ever he bad him (so great a power art may have over nature) would make hun, I believe, admire more at this learned beast, than we do at their docile Llephants, upon the relations we have of them Wheris, every one of us knows, by what means his painful Tutor brought him to do all his tricks, and they are no whit more extraordinary, than a Tawkners manning of a Hawk, and training her to kill Partridges, and to flie at the retrive but do all of them (both these, and all other jugling artifices of beasts) depend upon the same or like principles, and are known to be but directions of nature, order'd by one that composes and levels her operations to another end further off (in those actions) than she of her self would aim at The particulars of which we need not trouble our selvs to meddle with

The great fertility and riches of England consists chiefly in pasturage for Cattle, wherof we have the fairest in the world, principally of Oven and Kine Ther's not the mannest Cottager, but hath a Cow to furnish his Family with milk 'tis the principal susten ance of the poorer sort of people, as 'tis also in Switzerland, which makes them very careful of the good keeping and health of their Cows. Now, if it happen that the Milk boil over, and so comes to fall into the fire, the good woman or maid presently gives over whatever she is adoing and runs to take the Vessel off the fire and, at the same time, she takes a handful of Salt, which uses to be commonly in the corner of the Chimney to keep it dry, and throws it upon the cinders where the milk was shed. Ask her, wherfore she doth so? and she will tell you, 'tis to prevent a mischief to the Cows Udder, which gave this milk

Thomas May (1595-1650), poet and historian, was the son of Sir Thomas May of Mayfield, Sussex, was educated at Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, and admitted to Gray's Inn, but devoted himself to literature. He was much favoured by Charles I and the court, but, according to Clarendon, 'fell from his duty and all his former friends' because of his not receiving a pension he expected, he became the secretary and apologist of the Parliament, and continued in the Parliamentary service till his death. He was somewhat of a freethinker, and was dissipated in his habits His poems comprise a comedy, The Heir (1622), and tragedies on Anticone, Igrippina, Cleopitra and Julius Cusar, a better play on Nero has been, on very doubtful grounds, ascribed to him. At the king's command he wrote narrative poems on the reigns of Henry II and Edward III But he is best known as the translator and continuator of Lucan (1627-30), he brought down the history of the period from the battle of Pharsalia to the death of Julius Cæsar, and then translated the 'Supplement to Lucan,' as it was called, into the language and verse of Anthony Wood and Clarendon, both the original of whom despised the man, highly commended his The translation was warmly praised by Ben Jonson, the continuation is respectable, and the Latin version of the continuation more than Dr Johnson held that May's Latin respectable poetry was superior to either Cowley's or Milton's, and the best England could till then show also translated the Georgics, some of Martial's epigrams, and part of Barclay's Argenis chiefly remembered as the historian of the Long The History of the Parliament of Parliament England, which began November 3, 1640, published by him as 'Secretary for the Parliament' in 1647, has a prefatory 'view' which comprises characters of Queen Elizabeth, King James, and Charles I, and the narrative closes in 1643, at the most interesting crisis of the struggle. He laments that the Civil War has divided 'the understandings of men as well as their affections in so high a degree that scarce could any virtue gain due applause, any reason give satisfaction, or any relation obtain credit unless amongst men of the same side,' professes impartiality, and seldom expressly passes judgment But though not merely those of his own way of thinking praised the History, though Warburton approved its penetration and candour, and the Earl of Chatham recommended it as honester and more instructive than Clarendon's, most of his own contemporaries doubted or denied his impartiality and suspected his honesty Firth says that, while in the History he is merely the official apologist of the Parliament, in the abridged form of it, published 1650, he has become the panegyrist of the army and the Independents The style of the History is smooth and well written, and full of Latin quotations and illustrations from Latin history The picture May gives us of the social state of the times seems more like what we conceive of the reign of Charles II than that of the grave and decorous First Charles Profanenesse too much abounded everywhere, and which is most strange, where there was no religion, yet there was superstition Luxury in diet and excesse both in meat and drinke was crept into the kingdome in a high degree, not only in the quantity but in the wanton And in abuse of those good creatures which curiosity God had bestowed upon this plentifull land, they mixed the vices of divers nations, catching at everything that was new and forraigne.

'Non vulgo nota placebant Gaudia, non usu plebeio trita voluptas.' (PETRONIUS)

'Old knowne delight

They scorne, and vulgar bare-worne pleasure sleight.'

As much pride and excesse was in apparell, almost among all degrees of people, in new fangled and various their forraigne patterns, and in fantastical gestures and behaviour, the petulancy of most nations in Europe The serious men groaned for a parliament, but the great statesmen plied it the harder, to compleat that work they had begun, of setting up prerogative above all lawes The Lord Wentworth (afterwards created Earle of Strafford for his service in that kinde) was then labour ing to oppresse Ireland, of which he was deputy, and to begin that worke in a conquered kingdome which was intended to be afterward wrought by degrees in Eng land and indeed he had gone very farre and prosper ously in those waies of tyranny, though very much to the endammaging and setting backe of that newly established kingdome. He was a man of great parts, of a deepe reach, subtle wit, of spirit and industry, to carry on his businesse, and such a conscience as was fit for that work He understood the right way, and he was designed to the liberty of his country, as well as any man, for which in former parliaments he stood up stiffely, and seemed an excellent patriot For those abilities he was soon taken off by the king, and raised in honour, to be imployed in a contrary way, for inslaving of his country, which his ambition easily drew him to undertake.

The court of England, during this long vacancy of parliaments, enjoyed itself in as much pleasure and splendour as ever any court did. The revels, triumphs, and princely pastimes were for those many yeares kept up at so great a height, that any stranger which travelled into England would verily believe a kingdom that looked so cheerefully in the face could not be sick

See Clarendon and Wood, the edition of May's History by Lord Maseres (1812, reprinted 1854) and Mr Firth's article in the Dictionary of National Biography (1894).

Peter Heylyn (1599–1662) was one of the clerical adherents of the king despoiled of their goods by the Parliament. Born at Burford, in Oxfordshire, he studied at Oxford, was deprived of his living under the Commonwealth, and after the Restoration was made Dean of Westminster A strong supporter of Laud, he was a vehement and acrimonious controversialist on the anti-Puritan Amongst some forty publications are a Life of Laud, a geography and cosmography, histories of the Reformation and of the Presbyterians (in England), and a history of Sabbath observance in favour of the less strict view In a narrative of a six weeks' tour to France in 1625, not published till 1656, and then without his consent, he gives an Englishman's (not too complimentary) description of

The French

The present French, then, is nothing but an old Gaule moulded into a new name as rash he is, as headstrong, and as hare brained A nation whom you shall winne with a feather and lose with a straw, upon the first sight of him, you shall have him as familiar as your sleep, or the necessity of breathing In one hour's conference you may indear him to you, in the second unbutton him, the third pumps him dry of all his secrets, and he gives them you as faithfully as if you were his ghostly father, and bound to conceale them sub sigillo confessionis ['under the seal of confession'], when you have learned this, you may lay him aside, fashioned attire, they not only imitated but excelled I for he is no longer serviceable. If you have any humor in holding him in a further acquaintance (a favour which he confesseth, and I believe him, he is unworthy of), himself will make the first separation he hath said over his lesson now unto you, and now must find out somebody else to whom to repeate it Fare him well, he is a garment whom I would be lorth to wear above two dayes together, for in that time he will be thred bare. Familiare est hominis omnia sibi remittere ['It is usual for men to overlook their own faults'], saith Velleius of all, it holdeth most properly in this people Find hearted to himself, and thinketh himself as free from wants as he is full, so much he hath in him the nature of a Chynois [Chinese], that he thinketh all men blind but himself. In this private self conceitedness he hateth the Spaniard, loveth not the English, and contemneth the German, himself is the only courtier and compleat gentleman, but it is his own glass which he seeth in " Out of this conceit of his own excellencie, and partly out of a shallowness of brain, he is very lyable to exceptions, the least distaste that can be draweth his sword, and a minutes pause sheatheth it to your hand, afterwards, if you beat him into better manners, he shall take it kindly, and cry Serviteur In this one thing they are wonderfully like the Devil, meckness or submission makes them inso lent, a little resistance putteth them to their heeles, or makes them your spaniels. In a word (for I have held him too long) he is a walking vanitic in a new

I will give you now a taste of his table, which you shall find in a measure furnished (I speak not of the parsant), but not with so full a manner as with us Their beef they cut out into such chops, that that which goeth there for a laudable dish, would be thought here a university commons, new served from the hatch A loin of mutton serves amongst them for three rostings, besides the hazard of making pottage with the rump Fowl also they have in good plenty, especially such as the king found in Scotland, to say truth, that which they have is sufficient for nature and a friend, were it not for the mistress or the kitchin wench I have heard much fame of the French cookes, but their skill lyeth not in the neat handling of beef and mutton They have (as generally have all this nation) good fancies, and are speciall fellowes for the making of puff pastes, and the ordering of banquets Their trade is not to feed the belly, but the pallat is now time you were set down, where the first thing you must do is to say your grace private graces are as ordinary there as private masses, and from thence I think they learned them That done, fall to where you like best, they observe no method in their eating, and if you look for a carver, you may rise fasting. When you are riscn, if you can digest the sluttishness of the cookery, which is most abominable at first sight, I dare trust you in a garrison Follow him to church, and there he will shew himself most irreligious and irreverent, I speak not of all, but the general At a mass in Cordchiers' church in Paris I saw two French papists, even when, the most sacred mystery of their faith was celebrating, break out into such a blasphemous and atheistical laughter, that even an Ethnick would have hated it, it was well they were Catholiques, otherwise some French hot head or other would have sent them laughing to Pluto

The French language is indeed very sweet and delect able it is cleared of all harshness by the cutting and leaving out the consonants, which maketh it fall off the tongue very volubly, yet in my opinion it is rather elegant than copious, and therefore is much troubled for want of words to find out periphrases - It expresseth very much of itself in the action, the head, body, and shoulders concur all in the pronouncing of it, and he that hopeth to speak it with a good grace must have something in him of the mimick. It is enriched with a full number of significant proverbs, which is a great help to the French humor in scoffing, and very full of courtship, which maketh all the people complimental, the poorest cobbler in the village hath his court cringes and his cau béniste de cour, his court holy water, as per fectly as the Prince of Condé

French Love of Dancing

At my being there, the sport was dancing, an exercise much used by the French, who doe naturally affect it And it seems this natural inclination is so strong and deep rooted, that neither age nor the absence of a smiling fortune can prevaile against it For on this dancing green there assembleth not only youth and gentry, but also age and beggery, old wives, which could not set foot to ground without a crutch in the streets, had here taught their feet to amble, you would have thought by the cleanly conveyance and carriage of their bodies that they had beene troubled with the sciatica, and yet so eager in the sport as if their dancing dayes should never be done. Some there was so ragged, that a swift gilliard would almost have shaked them into nakednesse, and they also most violent to have their car casses directed in a measure To have attempted the staying of them at home, or the perswading of them to work when they heard the fiddle, had been a task too unweildy for Hercules. In this mixture of age and condition, did we observe them at their pastime, the rags being so interwoven with the silks, and wrinkled brows so interchangeably mingled with fresh beauties, that you would have thought it to have been a mummery of fortunes, as for those of both sexes which were alto gether past action, they had caused themselves to be carried thither in their chairs, and trod the measures with their eyes

Goldsmith in the next century dwelt in the Traveller on the same national characteristic

Alike all ages dames of ancient days
Have led their children through the mirthful maze,
And the gay grandsire, skilled in gestic lorc,
Has frisked beneath the burden of threescore

At Orleans, Heylyn found a large number of learned Germans resident, mainly for the study of law, and having a regular corporation, with a procurator, quæstor, assessors, and librarians

If it happen that any of them dye there, they all accompuny him to his grave, in a manner mixt so orderly of griefe and state that you would think the obsequies of some great potentate were solemnizing, and to say truth of them, they are a hearty and loving nation, not to one another onely, but to strangers, and especially to us of England Onely I could wish that in their speech and complement they would not use the Latine tongue, or else speak it more congruously you shall hardly finde

a man amongst them which can make a shift to expresse himselfe in that language, nor one amongst an hundred that can doe it Latinely Galleriam, Compaginem, Gardinum and the like are as usuall in their common discourse, as to drinke at three of the clock, and as Had they bent their study familiar as their sleep that way, I perswade my self they would have been excellent good at the common lawes, their tongues so naturally falling on these words which are necessary to a declaration but amongst the rest, I took especiall notice of one Mr Gebour [?], a man of that various mixture of words, that you would have thought his tongue to have been a very Amsterdam of languages, Cras mane our bia nous irons ad magnam Galleriam, was one of his remarkable speeches when we were at Paris but here at Orleans we had them of him thick If ever he should chance to dye in a and threefold strange place, where his countrey could not be knowne but by his tongue, it could not possibly be but that more nations would strive for him than ever did for Homer I had before read of the confusion of Babel, in him I came acquainted with it

William Prynne, born in 1600 at Swanswick, near Bath, graduated from Oriel College, Oxford, Admitted a student of Lincoln's Inn, he was called to the Bar, but was early drawn into theological controversy, and during 1627-30 published The Unlovelinesse of Love-lockes, Healthes Sicknesse (against drinking of healths), and three other Puritan and anti-Arminian diatribes 1633 appeared his Histrio-Mastix the Players Scourge, a bulky and scurrilous pamphlet of 1040 small quarto pages, essaying to prove that playwriting, play-acting, and play-going are unlawful and immoral, are in defiance of Scripture and the Church-fathers, and are condemned by the wisest of the heathen The book was dedicated to the masters of Lincoln's Inn, as the one of the Inns of Court that had not permitted the acting of interludes in its halls Several passages in the work, summarised in the index as 'women-actors notorious whores,' were held to be a reflection on the virtue of Queen Henrietta Maria, who with her ladies had in the same year taken part in the performance of a play nunciation of magistrates who failed in the duty of suppressing theatres, and unpleasant allusions to Nero, were held to point at the king So Prynne, arraigned in the Star Chamber, was, after a year's imprisonment, in 1634 sentenced to have his book burnt by the hangman, pay a fine of £5000, be expelled from Oxford and Lincoln's Inn, lose both his ears in the pillory, and suffer perpetual imprisonment. Three years later, for assailing Laud and the hierarchy in two more pamphlets, a fresh fine of £5000 was imposed, he was again pilloried, and was branded on both cheeks with S L ('seditious libeller,' 'stigmata Laudis' in Prynne's own interpretation) He remained a prisoner till, in 1640, he was released by a warrant of the House of Commons He acted as Laud's bitter prosecutor (1644), and in 1647 became recorder of Bath, in 1648 member for Newport in Cornwall But opposing the Independents and Charles I's execution, he was one of those of whom the House was 'purged,' and was even imprisoned (1650-52) On Cromwell's death he returned to Parliament as a royalist, and after the Restoration Charles II 'kept him quiet' by making him keeper of the Tower records He died 24th October 1669 He wrote in all some two hundred pamphlets and books, remarkable for vehemence and violence rather than for any merit of style. He assailed with equal vehemence the tyranny of the king's government and of the Commonwealth, wrote against prelates, papists, Quakers, and Jews, and attacked with equal vigour Laud, the Puritan Goodwin, Lilburne, Milton, and the Protector After the Restoration none was more savage against the regicides or more eager for retaliatory measures Some of his polemical pamphlets were even couched in verse of a kind, one of these being elegantly named A Pleasant Purge for Roman Catholics Withal he did good service as a compiler of constitutional history, his best works the Calendar of Parliamentary Writs and his Records See Documents relating to Prynne, edited by S R Gardiner (Camden Society, 1877)

The principal part of the comprehensive titlepage of Prynne's famous book is as follows

Histrio Mastin The Players Scourge or Actors Tra gedie, Divided into Two Parts. Wherein it is largely evidenced, by divers Arguments by the concurring Authorities and Resolutions of Sundry texts of Scrip ture, of the whole Primitive Church, both under the Law and Gospell, of 55 Synodes and Councels, of 71 Fathers and Christian Writers, before the yeare of our Lord 1200, of above 150 foraigne and domestique Protestant and Popish Authors, since, of 40 Heathen Philosophers, Historians, Poets, of many Heathen, many Christian Nations, Republiques, Emperors, Princes, Magistrates, of sundry Apostolicall, Canonicall, Imperiall Constitutions, and of our owne English Statutes, Magistrates, Universities, Writers, Preachers popular Stage playes (the very Pompes of the Divell which we renounce in Baptisme, if we beleeve the Fathers) are sinfull, heathenish, lewde, ungodly Spec tacles, and most pernicious Corruptions, condemned in all ages, as intolerable Mischiefes to Churches, to Re publickes, to the manners, mindes, and soules of men And that the Profession of Play poets, of Stage players, together with the penning, acting, and frequenting of Stage playes, are unlawfull, infamous, and misbeseeming Christians All pretences to the contrary are here like wise fully answered, and the unlawfulnes of acting, of beholding Academicall Enterludes, briefly discussed, besides sundry other particulars concerning Dancing, Dicing, Health drinking, &c. of which the Table will ınforme you By William Prynne, an Vtter-Barrester of Lincolnes Inne.

Still in the title-page and before the imprint are a series of Latin citations, with full references, from Cyprian's De Spectaculis, Lactantius's De Vero Cultu, Chrysostom's Homilies on Matthew, and Augustine's De Civitate Dei

From 'Histrio-Mastix.'-Actvs I Scæna Prima

That all popular and common Stage Playes, whether omicall, Tragicall, Satyricall, Mimicall, or mixt of ther, (especially as they are now composed and isonated,) are such sinfull, hurtfull, and permicious ecreations as are altogether unseemely and unlawfull ito Christians, I shall first of all evidence and proove from their originall parents, and primary Inventors high were no other but the very Devill himselfe, or leastwise, Idolatrous and Vojuptuous Pagans, im regnated with this infernall issue from Hell it selfe, om whence I argue in the first place thus

That which had its birth and primarie conception om the very Devill himselfe, who is all and onely rill, must needes be Sinfull, Permicious, and altogether iscemely, yea, Unlawfull unto Christians

But Stage Playes had their birth and primary con eption from the very Devill himselfe, who is all and acly evill

Therefore they must needes bee Sinfull, Pernicious, ad altogether unseemely, yea, Unlawfull unto Christians The Minor, (which is onely hable to exception,) I all easily make good, First, by the direct and pune all testimony of sundry Fathers.

But now a dayes Musicke is growne to such and so reat licentiousnesse, that even at the ministration of the oly Sacrament all kinde of wanton and lewde trifling ongs, with piping of Organs, have their place and As for the Divine Service and Common prayer, is so chaunted and minsed and mangled of our costly ired, curious, and nice Musitiens (not to instruct the udience withall, nor to stirre up mens mindes unto evotion, but with a whorish harmony to tickle their ares) that it may justly seeme not to be a noyse nade of men, but rather a bleating of bruite beasts, vhiles the Coristers ney descant as it were a sort of lolts, others bellowe a tenour, as it were a company of Oxen others barke a counter point, as it were a ennell of Dogs others rore out a treble like a sort of Buls others grunt out a base as it were a number of Hogs, so that a foule cvill favoured noyse is made, out as for the wordes and sentences and the very matter t selfe, is nothing understanded at all, but the authority ind power of judgement is taken away both from the nind, and from the cares utterly Erasmus Roterodamus expresseth his minde concerning the curious manner of anging used in Churches on this wise, and saith, Why loth the Church doubt to follow so worthy an Author Paul), yea, how dare it be bold to dissent from? What other thing is heard in monasteries, in Colledges, in femples almost generally, then a confused noyse of oyces? But in the time of Paul, there was no singing out saying onely

For the Minor, that Stage playes unavoydably produce an intollerable mispence of much pretious time, Sc, it is most apparant if we will but summe up all those dayes, those houres which are vainely spent in the composing, conning, practising, acting, beholding of every publike or private Stage play. How many golden dayes and houres, I might say weekes, may moneths, and I had almost said whole yeeres, doe most Play poets spend in contriving, penning, polishing their new invented. Playes, before they ripen them for the Stage. When these their Playes are brought unto maturity, how many houres, evenings, halfe dayes, and sometimes weekes, are spent by all the Actors (especially in solemne academicall Enterludes) in copying, in conning, in practising their parts, before they are ripe for publike When this is finished, how many men are action vainely occupied for sundry dayes (yea sometimes years) together, in building Theaters, Stages, Scenes and Scaffolds, in making theatricall Pageants, Apparitions, Attires, Visars, Garments, with such like Stage appur tenances, for the more commodious pompous acting and adorning of these vaine glorious Enterludes When all things requisite for the publike personating of these Playes are thus exactly accommodated, and the day or night approcheth when these are to be acted, how many hundreds of all sorts vainely if not ridiculously spend whole dayes, whole afternoones and nights ofttimes, in attyring themselves in their richest robes, in providing seates to heare, to sec and to be seene of others, or in hearing, in beholding these vain lascivious Stage playes, (which last some three or fourc houres at the least, yea sometimes whole dayes and weekes together, as did some Roman Playes, and yet seeme too short to many, to whom a Lecture, a Sermon, a Prayer, not halfe'so long, is over tedious) who thinke themselves well imployed all the while they are thus wasting this their pretious time (which they scarce know how to spend) upon these idle Spectacles Adde we to this, that all our common Actors consume not oncly weekes and yeeres, but even their whole lives, in learning, practising, or acting Playes, which besides nights and other seasons, engrosse every afternoone almost thorow out the yeere, to their peculiar service, as wee see by daily experience here in London, where thousands spend the moitie of the day, the weeke, the yeere in Playhouses, at least wise far more houres then they imploy in holy duties, or in their lawfull callings. If we annex to this the time that divers waste in reading Play bookes, which some make their chiefest study, preferring them before the Bible or all pious Bookes, on which they seldome scriously east their eyes, together with the mispent time which the discourses of Playes, either seene or read, occasion and then summe up all this lost, this mispent time together, we shall soone discerne, we must needs acknowledge, that there are no such Helluoes, such canker wormes, such theevish Devourers of mens most sacred (yet undervalued) time, as Stage playes

Not to mention the over prodigall disbursements upon Playes and Masques of late penurious times, which have beene wel nigh as expensive as the Wars, and I dare say more chargable to many then their soules, on which the most of us bestow least cost, least time and care How many hundreds, if not thousands, are there now among us, (to their condemnation, if not their reformation be it spoken,) who spend more, daily, weekely, monethly, if not yearely at a Play house to maintaine the Devils service and his instruments, then they disburse in pious uses, in reliefe of Ministers, Schollers, poore godly Christians, or maintenance of Gods service, all their life How many assiduous Play haunters are there who contribute more liberally, more frequently to Play houses, then to Churches, to Stage playes, then to Lectures, to Players, then to Preachers, to Actors, then to Poore mens Boxes? being at far greater cost to promote their owne and others just damnation, then themselves or others are to advance their owne or others salvation How many are there, who can bee at cost to hire a Coach, a Boate, a Barge, to carry them to a Play house every day, where they must pay deare for their admission, Seates and Boxes, who will hardly be at any cost to convey themselves to a Sermon once a weeke, a moneth, a yeere, (especially on a weeke day) at a Church far nearer to them then the Play-house, where they may have Seates, have entrance, (yer spirituall Cordials, and celestial Dainties to refresh their soules,) without any money or expence. How many are there, who according to their severall qualities spend 2d 3d 4d 6d 12d 18d 2s and sometimes 4 or 5 shillings at a Play house, day by day, if Coach hire, Boate hire, Tobacco, Wine, Beere, and such like vaine expences which Playes doe usually occasion, be cast into the reckoning, and that in these penurious times, who can hardly spare, who can never honestly get by their lawfull callings, How many prodigally consume not halfe so much onely their charity, apparell, diet, bookes, and other necessaries, but even their annuall Pensions, Revenues and Estates at Picke purse Stage playes, which are more expensive to them then all their necessary dis If we summe up all the prodigall vaine expenses which Play houses and Playes occasion every way, we shall finde them almost infinite, wel nigh in credible, altogether intollerable in any Christian frugall state, which must needs abandon Stage playes as the Athenians and Romans did at last even in this regard that they impoverish and quite ruine many, as the fore quoted testimonies, with many domestique experi ments, daily testifie

Edmund Calamy (1600-66), born in London, studied at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, and became chaplain to Felton, Bishop of Ely In 1626–36 he was lecturer at Bury St Edmunds, but resigned when the order to read the Book of Sports was enforced, in 1639 he was chosen minister of St Mary Aldermanbury, London He had a principal share in Smectymmuus (1641), a reply to Bishop Hall's Divine Right of Episcopacy called from the initials of the names of the writers-Stephen Marshall, Edmund Calamy, Thomas Young, Matthew Newcomen, and William Spurstow (the 'uu' standing for the 'w' of 'William') Calamy was much in favour with the Presbyterian party, but was, on the whole, a moderate man, and disapproved of those measures which ended in the death of the king Having exerted himself to promote the restoration of Charles II, he received the offer of the bishopric of Coventry and Lichfield, but, after much deliberation, it was rejected The passing of the Act of Uniformity in 1662 made him retire from his ministerial duties, and he died heart-broken by the Great Fire of London sermons were of a plain and practical character, and five of them, published under the title of The Godly Man's Ark, or a City of Refuge in ' the Day of his Distress, acquired much popularity -His grandson, EDMUND CALAMY, D.D. (1671-1732), studied three years at Utrecht, and declining Carstares' offer of a Scotch professorship, from 1694 vas a Nonconformist minister in London.

forty-one works include an Account of the Ejected Ministers (1702) and an interesting Autobiography, first published in 1829

William Chillingworth (1602-44), a famous polemic, was born at Oxford, and was distinguished as a student there Hales and Falkland were amongst his friends An early love of disputation, in which he possessed eminent skill, developed a A Jesuit named Fisher consceptical temper verted him to the Church of Rome-his chief argument being the necessity of an infallible living guide in matters of faith. He then studied at the Jesuits' College at Douay, and having been, imprudently, requested to write down the reasonings that led to his conversion, he studied anew the whole controversy and became 'a doubting Papist' Laud, his godfather, wrote a weighty series of letters to him, and his friends induced him to return to Oxford, where, after additional study of the points of difference, he declared in favour of the Protestant faith His change of creed drew him into several controversies, in which he employed the arguments that were afterwards methodically stated in his famous work, entitled The Religion of the Protestants a safe way to Salvation, published in 1637 This treatise, which placed its author in the first rank of religious controversialists, is now, in spite of its following the line of argument of a now forgotten book attacking him, hailed as a model of perspicuous reasoning, and one of the ablest defences of the Protestant faith author maintains that the Scripture is the only rule to which appeal ought to be made in theological disputes, that no Church is infallible, and that the Apostles' Creed embraces all the necessary points of faith The Arminian opinions of Chillingworth brought upon him the charge of latitudinarianism, and his character for orthodoxy was still further shaken by his refusal to accept of preferment on condition of subscribing the Thirtynine Articles His scruples having at length been overcome, he was promoted, in 1638, to the chancellorship of Salisbury During the Civil War he zealously adhered to the royal party, and even assisted as engineer at the siege of Gloucester in He died in the bishop's palace in Chichester in the succeeding year Lord Clarendon, who was one of his intimate friends, has drawn the following character of this eminent divine 'He was a man of so great a subtilty of understanding, and so rare a temper in debate, that, as it was impossible to provoke him into any passion, so it was very difficult to keep a man's self from being a little discomposed by his sharpness and quickness of argument, and instances in which he had a rare facility, and a great advantage over all the men I ever knew' Writing to a Roman Catholic, in allusion to the changes of his own faith, Chillingworth says

I know a man, that of a moderate Profestant turned a Papist, and the day that he did so, was convicted in conscience that his yesterday's opinion was an error. The same man afterwards, upon better consideration, became a doubting Papist, and of a doubting Papist a confirmed Protestant. And yet this man thinks himself no more to blame for all these changes, than a traveller who, using all diligence to find the right way to some remote city, did yet mistake it, and after find his error and amend it. Nay, he stands upon his justification so far, as to maintain that his alterations, not only to you, but also from you, by God's mercy, were the most satis factory actions to himself that ever he did, and the greatest victories that ever he obtained over himself and his affections, in those things which in this world are most precious.

The following passages from his great work show a like spirit

The Bible the Religion of Protestants

Know then, sir, that when I say the religion of Protestants is in prudence to be preferred before yours, as, on the one side, I do not understand by your re ligion the doctrine of Bellarmine or Baroninus, or any other private man amongst you, nor the doctrine of the Sorbonne, or of the Jesuits, or of the Dominicans, or of any other particular company among you, but that wherein you all agree, or profess to agree, 'the doctrine of the Council of Trent,' so accordingly on the other side, by the 'religion of protestants,' I do not under stand the doctrine of Luther, or Calvin, or Melancthon, nor the Confession of Augusta, or Geneva, nor the Catechism of Heidelberg, nor the Articles of the Church of England, no, nor the harmony of Protestant confessions, but that wherein they all agree, and which they all subscribe with a greater harmony, as a perfect rule of their faith and actions, that is, the BIBLE BIBLE, I say, the BIBLE only, is the religion of protes-Whatsoever else they believe besides it, and the plain, irrefragable, indubitable consequences of it, well may they hold it as a matter of opinion, but as matter of faith and religion, neither can they with coherence to their own grounds believe it themselves, nor require the belief of it of others, without most high and most schismatical presumption. I for my part, after a long and (as I verily believe and hope) impurial search of 'the true way to eternal happiness,' do profess plainly that I cannot find any rest for the sole of my foot but upon this rock only I see plainly and with mine own eyes, that there are popes against popes, councils against councils, some fathers against others, the same fathers against themselves, a consent of fathers of one age against a consent of fathers of another age, the church of one age against the church of another age Tradi tive interpretations of scripture are pretended, but there are few or none to be found no tradition, but only of scripture, can derive itself from the fountain, but may be plainly proved either to have been brought in, in such an age after Christ, or that in such an age it was In a word, there is no sufficient certainty but of scripture only for any considering man to This therefore, and this only, I have build upon reason to believe this I will profess, according to this I will live, and for this, if there be occasion, I will not only willingly, but even gladly, lose my life, though I should be sorry that Christians should take it from me

Reason in Religion

But you that would not have men follow their reason, what would you have them follow? their passions? or pluck out their eyes, and go blindfold? No, you say, you would have them follow authority In God's name, let them, we also would have them follow authority, for it is upon the authority of universal tradition that we would have them believe Scripture But then, as for the authority which you would have them follow, you will let them see reason why they should follow it. And is not this to go a little about?—to leave reason for a short turn, and then to come to it again, and to do that which you condemn in others? It being indeed a plain impossibility for any man to submit his reason but to reason, for he that doth it to authority, must of necessity think himself to have greater reason to believe that authority

There is a Life by Des Maizeaux (1725) and one by Birch pre fixed to his edition of the works (1742), which includes also nine sermons. Another edition was published in 1838 in 3 vols. See Tulloch's Rational Theology in England

John Gauden (1605-1662) was born at Mayland, near Maldon, in Essex, was educated at Bury St Edmunds and St John's College, Cambridge, and on the commencement of the Civil War complied with the Presbyterian party He received several church preferments, which he continued to hold even after the Parliament proceeded against When the army resolved to impeach and try the king, in 1648, he published A Religious and Loyal Protestation against their purposes and proceedings, and other polemical tractates his grand service to the royal cause consisted in his writing Elkur Basilikn, the Pourtraicture of his Sacred Majesty in his Solitudes and Sufferings, a work which bears to be from the pen of Charles I himself, and to contain the devout meditations of his later days There appears to have been an intention to publish this Pourtraicture before the execution of the king, as an attempt to save his life by working on the feelings of the people, but it did not make its appearance till a day or two after His Majesty's death. The sensation which it produced in his favour was extraordinary 'It is not easy,' says Hume, 'to conceive the general compassion excited towards the king by the publishing, at so critical a juncture, a work so full of piety, meckness, and humanity Many have not scrupled to ascribe to that book the subsequent restoration of the royal family Milton compares its effects to those which were wrought on the tumultuous Romans by Antony's reading to them the will of Cresar' So engerly and universally was the book perused by the nation that it passed through forty-seven editions in a year Milton, in his Eikonoclustes, alludes to the doubts which prevailed as to the authorship of the work, but at this time the real history was unknown The first statements that it was by Gauden seem to have been made, by persons well qualified to know, as early as 1674, and rumours were plentifully current when in 1692 the book was expressly said to be Gauden's composition in a circumstantial narrative published by Gauden's former curate, Walker Several writers then entered the field on both sides of the question, the principal defender of the king's claim being Wagstaffe, a nonjuring clergyman, who published an elaborate Vindication of King Charles the Martyr in 1693 For ten years subsequently the literary war continued, but after this there ensued a long interval of repose When Hume wrote his History, the evidence on the two sides appeared so equally balanced that, 'with regard to the genuineness of that production, it is not easy,' says he, 'for a historian to fix any opinion which will be entirely to his own satisfaction' In 1786, however, the scale of evidence was turned by the publication, in the third volume of the Clarendon State Papers, of some of Gauden's letters, the most important of which are six addressed by him to Loid Chancellor Clarendon after the Restoration He there complains of the poverty of the see of Exeter, to which he had already been appointed, and urgently solicits a further reward for the important secret service which he had performed to the royal cause Some of these letters, containing allusions to the circumstance, had formerly been printed, though in a less authentic form, but now for the first time appeared one, dated the 13th of March 1661, in which he explicitly grounds his claim to additional remuneration, 'not on what was known to the world under my name, but what goes under the late blessed king's name, the Eikon or Portraiture of his Majesty in his Solitudes and Sufferings This book and figure,' he adds, 'was wholly and only my invention, making, and design, in order to vindicate the king's wisdom, honour, and piety' He professed to have begun it in 1647, and to have submitted a MS copy to the king in the Isle of Wight. Clarendon seems to have spoken in the last year of his life as if he did not admit Gauden's authorship, but in his History of the Rebellion, undertaken at the desire of Charles I and avowedly intended as a vindication of the royal character and cause, he maintains the most rigid silence with respect to the Eikon Basilike The troublesome solicitations of Gauden were so effectual as to lead to his promotion, in 1662, to the bishopric of Worcester, a dignity, however, which he did not long enjoy, for he died in the same year The controversy as to the authorship of the Ethon Basilike is by some still decided in favour of the king Such was the conclusion arrived at in a work published in 1824 by Dr Wordsworth, Master of Tranity College, Southey took the same_view, which was energetically maintained in Mr E J L Scott's edition of the Ethon (1880) But the arguments of Malcolm - Laing, Todd, Sir James Mackintosh, Hallam, Lingard, and most historians down to Green accept Gruden's claim (acquiesced in by many of his royalist contemporaries) to be considered the author Doble in the Academy for May and June 1883 makes out a strong case for Gauden's author-Internal evidence supports Gauden's claim, the style is much too measured and rhetorical for that of Charles, who was a careless, confused, and inexact writer. There is A Bibliography of the King's Book by Edward Almack (1896). The Eikon thus reflects on the events of the Civil War.

The various successes of this unhappy war have at least afforded me variety of good meditations. Some times God was pleased to try me with victory, by worsting my enemies, that I might know how with moderation and thanks to own and use his power, who is only the true Lord of Hosts, able when he pleases to represse the confidence of those that fought against me with so great advantages for power and number,

From small beginnings on my part, he let me see that I was not wholly forsaken by my people's love or his protection. Other times God was pleased to exercise my patience, and teach me not to trust in the arm of My sins sometimes preflesh, but in the living God vailed against the justice of my cause, and those that were with me wanted not matter and occasion for his just chastisement both of them and me. Nor were my enemies lesse punished by that prosperity, which hardened them to continue that injustice by open hostility, which was begun by most riotous and unparliamentary tumults. There is no doubt but personall and private sins may ofttimes overbalance the justice of public engagements, nor doth God account every gallant man (in the world's esteeme) a fit instrument to assert in the way of war a righteous cause. The more men are prone to arrogate to their own skill, valour, and strength, the lesse doth God ordinarily work by them for his own glory I am sure the event or successe can never state the justice of any cause, nor the peace of men's consciences, nor the eternal fate of their soules

Those with me had (I think) clearly and undoubtedly for their justification the Word of God and the laws of the land, together with their own oathes, all requiring obedience to my just commands, but to none other under heaven without me, or against me, in the point of raising Those on the other side are forced to flie to the shifts of some pretended fears, and wild fundamentals of state (as they call them) which actually overthrow the present fabrick both of church and state, being such imaginary reasons for self defence as are most impertment for those men to alledge, who, being my subjects, were manifestly the first assaulters of me and the lawes first by unsuppressed tumults, after by listed forces The same allegations they use, will fit any faction that hath but power and confidence enough to second with the sword all their demands against the present lawes and gover nours, which can never be such as some side or other will not find fault with, so as to urge what they call a reformation of them to a rebellion against them parasitick preachers have dared to call those martyrs who died fighting against me, the lawes, their oathes, and the religion established

Arthur Wilson (1595–1652), born at Yarmouth, became secretary to Robert, Earl of Essex, afterwards Parliamentary general in the Civil Wars, whom he accompanied on his Continental campaigns (1620–25), and in 1633, after two years' study at Oxford, entered the service of the second Earl of Warwick, colonial adventurer and Parliamentary admiral Wilson too was hostile to the

Stewart régime, and his Life and Reign of King fames I, published in 1653, was called by Heylyn 'a most fumous pasquil' The Inconstant Lady, his only extant drama, was printed in 1814

Sir Anthony Weldon gives an even more unfavourable picture of the same period in his Court and Character of King James. Having as Clerk of the Kitchen accompanied the king to Scotland in 1617, Weldon wrote a highly depreciatory account of Scotland, and was dismissed from office. He revenged himself by drawing up this sketch of the court and its monarch, in which a graphic but bitterly overcharged description of James's personal appearance, habits, and oddities is given. Weldon seems to have died about 1649.

Baker's Chronicle, long the standard English history, takes its name from Sir Richard Baker (1568-1645), who, born in Kent and educated at Oxford, was knighted in 1603. High Sheriff of Oxfordshire in 1620, in 1635 he was thrown for debt into the Flect Prison, where he died he wrote his famous but far from accurate Chronicle of the Kings of England unto the Death of King James (1643) Other works penned in prison were Meditations and Disquisitions on portions of Scripture, translations of Balzac's Letters and Malvezzi's Discourses on Tacitus, and two pieces in defence of the theatre. Probably no part of Baker's own Chronicle was more popular with country gentlemen than its continuation by Edward Phillips (1630-96?), Milton's nephew, who, carefully trained by the poet, became a hack writer, producing poems, dictionaries, bombastic novels, an edition of Drummond's poems, &c considerable effort was his continuation of the Chronicle to the coronation of Charles II The critical period of the civil troubles was wholly the work of Phillips, who wrote from the standpoint of a decided royalist, for the Restoration he had the help (if not the MS) of Monk's brother-in-law, Sir The fourth edition (1662) be-Thomas Clarges came the standard one, the eighth appeared in 1684. Addison makes the Chronicle the favourite reading of Sir Roger de Coverley, who kept it lying in his hall window Doubtless Sir Roger often read the story of the king's execution (much 'contracted' in the 1730 and later editions)

On lucedry the 30th of January, which was the fital day on which the king was put to death, the Bishop of London did in the morning read divine service in his presence, to which duty the xxvii chapter of St Matthew, being the history of our Saviours passion, was appointed by the Church Calendar for the second lesson—but he, supposing it to have been selected on purpose, thanked him afterwards for his seasonable choice. But the bi-hop modestly declining those undue thanks, told him that it came by course to be read on that day, which very much comforted His Majesty, who proceeded to the remaining duties of receiving from the bishop the holy sacrament, and the other preparations for his approaching passion

His devotions being ended, about ten a clock he was brought from St James's to White hall by a regiment of foot, with colours flying, and drums beating (through the Park), part marching before and part behind, with a private guard of partisans about him, the bishop on the one hand and Colonel Tomhinson (who had the charge of him) on the other bare he ided. The guards marching a slow pace, as on a solemn and sad occasion to their ill tuned drums, he bid them go faster (as his usual manner of walking was), saying, That he now went before them to strive for an heavenly crown with less sollicitude than he had often encouraged his souldiers to fight for an earthly diadem

Being come to the end of the Park, he went up the stairs leading to the Long Gallery in White Hall, where he used formerly to lodge. There finding an unexpected delay in being brought upon the scaffold, which they had begun but that morning, he past the most of that time (having received a letter from the prince in the interim by Mr Seymor) in prayer.

About twelve a clock, His Majesty (refusing to dine) cat onely a bit of bread, and drank a glass of claret, and about an hour after Colonel Hacker, with other officers and souldiers, brought him with the bishop and Colonel Tomlinson through the banquetting house to the scaffold, whereto the passage was made through a window strong guard of several regiments of horse and foot were placed on all sides, which hindred the near approach of his miserable and distracted subjects (who for manifest ing their sorrow, were most barbarously used), and the king from speaking what he had designed for their cars whereupon finding himself disappointed, he omitted much of his intended matter, but having viewed the scriffold (which had irons driven in it to force him down to the block by ropes, if that he should have resisted) and the ax (of whose edge he was very careful), having minded one present of touching it with his cloak [sic].

Being upon the scaffold, he looked very carnestly upon the block, and asked Colonel Hacker if it could be no higher and then spoke thus (directing his speech chiefly to the bishop and Colonel Tombinson)

[Then follows the king's speech in full]

Bishop Though your Majesties affections may be very well known to religion, yet it may be expected that you should say somewhat thereof for the worlds satisfaction

Aing I thank you very heartily, my lord, for that I had almost forgotten it, in troth, sirs, my conscience in religion I think is very well known to all the world, and therefore I declare before you all that I die a Christian, according to the profession of the Church of England, as I found it left me by my father, and this honest man I think will witness it. Then speaking to the executioner he said, I shall say but very short prayers, and when I thrust out my hands—let that be your sign

Then he called to the bishop for his might cap, and having put it on, he said to the executioner, Does my hair trouble you? who desired him to put it all under his cap, which the ling did accordingly by the help of the executioner and the bishop—then the king turning to the bishop said, I have a good cause and a gricious God on my side

Bisnot There is but one stage more, this stage is turbulent and troublesome, it is a short one but you may consider it will soon carry you a very great way it will carry you from earth to heaven, and there you will find a great deal of condial joy and comfert.

King I go from a corruptible to an incerniptible crown, where no disturbance can be, no disturbance in the world

Bishop You are exchanged from a temporary to an eternal crown, a good exchange

The king then said to the executioner, Is my hair well? and took off his cloak and his George, giving his George to the bishop, saying, Remember Then he put off his doublet, and being in his wastcoat, he put his cloak on again, then looking upon the block, he said to the executioner, You must set it fast

Executioner It is fast, sir

King When I put my hands out this way—stretching them out—then do your work

After that, having said two or three words (as he stood) to himself, with hands and eyes lift up, imme diately stooping down, he laid his neck upon the block and then the executioner again putting his hair under his cap, the king (thinking he had been going to strike) said, Stay for the sign

Executioner Yes, I will, and it please your Majesty And after a very little pause, the king stretching forth his hands, the executioner at one blow severed his head from his body, the head being off, the executioner held it up, and shewed it to the people, which done, it was with the body put in a coffin covered with black velvet for that purpose, and conveyed into his lodgings at White Hall, and from thence it was carried to his house at Saint James's, where his body was embalmed and put in a coffin of lead, and laid there a fortnight to be seen by the people and on Wednesday seven night after, his corps embalmed and coffin'd in lead, was delivered chiefly to the care of four of his servants, viz. Mr Herbert, Capt Anthony Mildmay, his sewers, Captain Preston, and John Joyner (formerly cook to his Majesty), who with others in mourning, accompanied the herse that night to Windsor, and placed it in that which was formerly the kings bed whence it was next day removed into the Deans Hall, and from thence by the Duke of Richmond, the Marquess of Hertford, the Marquess of Dorchester, and the Earl of Lindsey, conveyed to St George his chappel, and the corps there interred in the vault (as is supposed) of King Henry the VIII and Queen Jane, with this inscription upon the cossin,

Sir William Dugdale (1605-86), antiquary, was born at Shustoke, near Coleshill, in Warwick-He studied law and history under his father, soon after whose death he purchased the neighbouring manor of Blythe (1625) Created Rouge Croix pursuivant (1640), he during the Great Rebellion adhered to the royalist cause, and from 1642 to 1646 was at Oxford, the king's headquarters, being made M.A. and Chester He lived in obscurity during the Commonwealth, but on the Restoration received the office of Nor10y, and in 1677 was promoted to be Garter Principal King of Arms and knight His works are the Monasticon Anglicanum (1655-61-73), a Latin history of English religious foundations (Eng ed 6 vols 1817-30), Antiquities of Warwickshire (1656, 3d ed 1763-65), History of St Paul's Cathedral (1658), History of Imbanking and Drayning (1662), Origines Juridiciales (1666), and Baronage of England (3 vols 1675-76) See his Life, Diary, and Correspondence, edited by William Hamper (1827)

Elias Ashmole (1617-92), antiquary, was born at Lichfield, and became a solicitor, but, a hearty royalist, entered Brazenose College, Oxford, where he applied himself to mathematics, natural philosophy, astronomy, astrology, and alchemy 1646 he became acquainted with Lilly and other astrologers, and in 1650 he edited a work of Dr Dee's, to which he subjoined a treatise of his own. In 1652 he issued his Theatrum Chymicum, and in 1672 his magnum opus, a History of the Order of At the Restoration various honours were conferred upon him, and thenceforward he mainly devoted himself to heraldic and antiquarian In 1682 he presented to the University of Oxford a fine collection of rarities, bequeathed him by his old friend John Tradescant (1608-62), gardener to Charles I, which, originally the Museum Tradescantianum, was thereafter known as the Ashmolean Museum Among his friends were Selden and Dugdale, whose daughter became his third wife His Diary (1717) is entertaining

Sir Thomas Blowne,

the learned, desultory, eloquent writer of the Religio Medici, was born in London in 1605, and after being educated at Winchester and Oxford, travelled in Ireland, and also in France, Italy, and Holland took his doctor's degree at Leyden, and settled in 1637 as a medical practitioner at Norwich knighted by Charles II on his visit to Norwich in 1671 Browne's first and greatest work, Religio Medici ('The Religion of a Physician'), written about 1635, was published surreptitiously in 1642, and next year a perfect copy was issued by himself, this, his confession of faith, revealing a deep insight into the mysteries of the spiritual life, immediately rendered the author famous in the literary world Here he gives a minute account of his opinions, not only on religion, but on an endless variety of philosophical and abstruse questions, besides affording the reader glimpses into the eccentricities of his personal character The language of the work is bold and poetical, adorned with picturesque imagery, though frequently pedantic, rugged, and obscure His most elaborate work, Pseudodoxia Epidemica, or Enquiries into Vulgar Errors, appeared in 1646, and is a strange and discursive amalgam of humoui, acuteness, learning, and credulity The following enumeration of some of the errors which he endeavours to dispel will serve both to show the kind of subjects he was fond of investigating, and to exemplify the notions which prevailed in the seventeenth century

I hat crystal is nothing else but ice strongly con gealed, that a diamond is softened or broken by the blood of a goat, that a pot full of ashes will contain as much water as it would without them, that bays preserve from the mischief of lightning and thunder, that an elephant bith no joints, that a wolf, first seeing a man, begets a dumbness in him, that inoles are blind, that the flesh of peacocks corrupteth not, that storks will only live in republics and free states, that the chicken is made out of the yolk of the egg, that men weigh heavier dead than alive, that the for bidden fruit was an apple, that there was no rainbow before the Flood, that John the Baptist should not die

He treats also of the ring-finger, saluting upon sneezing, pigmies, the canicular or dog days, the picture of Moses with horns, the blackness of negroes, the river Nilus, Gypsies, Methuselah, the food of John the Baptist, the cessation of oracles, Friar Bacon's brazen head that spoke, the poverty of Belisarius, and the wish of Philosenus to have the neck of a crane 1658 Browne published his Hydriotaphia, Urn Burial, or a Discourse of the Sepulchral Urns lately found in Norfolk, mainly a discussion of burial-customs Here the author's learning appears in the details which he gives concerning the modes in which the bodies of the dead have been disposed of in different ages and countries, while his reflections on death, oblivion, and immortality are, for soleninity and grandeur, unsurpassed in English literature, and are set forth in language of rich and gorgeous eloquence In a field at Walsingham were dug up between forty and fifty urns, containing the remains of human bones, some small brass instruments, boxes, and other fragmentary relics Coals and burnt substances were found near the same plot of ground, and hence it was conjectured that this was the Ustrina, or place of burning, or the spot whereon the Druidical sacrifices were made Thus furnished with a theme for his philosophic musings, Sir Thomas Browne comments on that vast charnelhouse the earth The Hydriotaphia commences

In the deep discovery of the subterranean world, a shallow part would satisfy some enquirers, who if two or three yards were open above the surface, would not care to rake the bowels of Potosi and regions towards the centre Nature hath furnished one part of the earth, and man another The treasures of time lie high, in urns, coins, and monuments, scarce below the roots of some vegetables Time hath endless rarities, and shows of all varieties, which reveals old things in heaven, makes new discoveries in earth, and even earth itself a discovery That great antiquity, America, lay burned for a thousand years, and a large part of the earth is still in the urn unto us Though, if Adam were made out of an extract of the earth, all parts might challenge a restitution, yet few have returned their bones far lower than they might receive them, not affecting the graves of giants, under hilly and heavy coverings, but content with less than their own depth, have wished their bones might he soft, and the earth be light upon them, even such as hope to rise again would not be content with central interment, or so desperately to place their relies as to lie beyond discovery, and in no way to be seen again, which happy contrivance hath made communication with our fore fathers, and left unto our view some parts which they never beheld themselves.

He then successively describes and comments upon the different modes of interment and decomposition—whether by fire ('some apprehending a purifying virtue in fire, refining the grosser com mixture, and firing out [expelling by means of fire] the ethereal particles so deeply immersed in it'), by making their graves in the air like the Scythians, 'who swore by wind and sword,' or in the sea, like some of the nations about Egypt

Men have lost their reason in nothing so much as their religion, wherein stones and clouts make martyrs, and since the religion of one seems madness unto another, to afford an account or rational of old rights requires no rigid reader. That they kindled the pyre aversely, or turning their face from it, was a handsome symbol of unwilling ministration, that they washed their bones with wine and milk, that the mother wrapt them in linen and dried them in her bosom, the first fostering part, and place of their nourishment, that they opened their eyes towards heaven, before they kindled the fire, as the place of their hopes or original, were no improper ceremonies. Their last valediction, thrice uttered by the attendants, was also very solemn, and somewhat answered by Christians, who thought it too little if they threw not the earth thrice upon the interred body That in strewing their tombs the Romans affected the rose, the Greeks amar anthus and myrtle, that the funeral pyre consisted of sweet fuel, cypress, fir, larry, yew, and trees perpetually werdant, lay silent expressions of their surviving hopes, wherein Christians, who deck their coffins with bays, have found a more elegant emblem, for that tree seeming dead, will restore itself from the root, and its dry and exsuccous leaves resume their verdure again, which, if we mistake not, we have also observed in furze. Whether the planting of yew in churchyards hold not its original from ancient funeral rites, or as an emblem of resurrection, from its perpetual verdure, may also admit conjecture

Among felicitous brevities may be quoted

Nature is not at variance with art, nor art with nature, they being both the servants of His providence. Art is the perfection of nature. Were the world now as it was the sixth day, there were yet a chaos. Nature hath made one world, and art another. In belief, all things are artificial, for nature is the art of God. He who discommendeth others obliquely commendeth him self. I had rather stand in the shock of a basilisk than in the fury of a merciless pen. A good cause needs not to be patroned by passion, but can sustain itself upon a temperate dispute.

To the Hydriotaphia is appended a small treatise, the most whimsical and not the least laborious of his works-The Garden of Cyrus, or the Quincuncial Lozenge, Network Plantations of the Ancients, artificially, naturally, and mystically consulered It aims to prove that the mystical number five pervaded not only ancient horticulture, but that it recurs through plant and animal life. Coleridge says Browne 'finds quincunves in heaven above, quincunves on earth below, quincunves in the mind of man, quincunves in tones, in optic nerves, in roots of trees, in leaves, in everything' One of the most striking of these fancies has been often quoted to denote that it is late, or that he was writing at a late hour, he says that 'the quincung of heaven [the Hyades] runs low, and unwilling to spin out our awaking thoughts into the phantasms of sleep, to keep our eyes open longer were but to act our antipodes, the huntsmen are up in America, and they are already past their first sleep in Persia.' Among Browne's posthumous pieces are Miscellany Tracis (1683), A Letter to a Friend (1690), and a collection of aphorisms or jottings, entitled Christian Morals, apparently intended as a kind of continuation of the Religio Medici He left in MS also various essays on antiquarian and other Sir Thomas Browne died in 1682, at the age of seventy-seven, in 1840 his skull was stolen out of its grave in St Peter's Mancroft, and placed in the hospital museum He was of a modest, simple, and cheerful disposition, retiring in his habits, and sympathised little with the pursuits and feelings of the busy multitude. He sided with the king in the Civil War, and was knighted by Charles II Though he made it his business to combat 'vulgar errors,' his own mind was deeply tinged with the credulity of his age He clung to the discredited Ptolemaic system, believed in astrology and alchemy, in witchcraft, apparitions, and diabolical illusions, and gravely observes, 'that to those who would attempt to teach animals the art of speech, the dogs and cats that usually speak unto witches may afford some encouragement.' In 1664 at Bury St Edmunds he gave cyldence against two 'witches,' and helped towards their conviction and burning

Though Browne's works are unsystematic, desultory, unequal, his thought, like his style, is strikingly original, marked by high and occasionally transcendent intellectual power, often expressed with quaint humour or, searching pathos, and always carrying with it a strange impressiveness. His favourite theme throughout all his books is ever the mystery of death and what lies beyond the grave, and the visible signs of mortality mean as much to him as they did to Shakespeare himself as a text from which to descant on what transcends the little His style is too peculiar, sphere of human life idiomatic, and difficult ever to be generally popular, and it must be admitted that his studious brevity often lapses sadly into obscurity his own words, 'the quality of the subject will sometimes carry us into expressions beyond mere English apprehensions,' and indeed no writer has equalled him in the free coinage of Latinisms Thus, speaking in his Vulgar Errors of the nature of ice, he says 'Ice is only water congealed by the frigidity of the air, whereby it acquireth no new form, but rather a consistence or determination of its diffluency, and amitteth not its essence, but condition of fluidity Neither doth there anything properly congluciate but water, or watery humidity, for the determination of quicksilver is properly fixation, that of milk, coagulation, and that of oil and unctuous bodies, only incrassation? He employs abundantly such words as dilucidate, ampliate, resipiency, opinionatry, manuduction, indigitate, reminiscential, evocation, farraginous, advenient, ariolation, lapifidical He also uses words of Latin origin in their etymological sense, deals freely in technical terms from the sciences, and does not hesitate to coin Grecisms or use modern French and Italian words Latinisms and innovations seem rhetorically in harmony with the rolling rhythm of his marvellous prose

Dr Johnson's style shows obvious resemblances to Browne's, especially in its Latinistic vocabulary. There can be no doubt that the author of the Rambler acquired much of his fondness for grandiloquent and sonorous words and expressions from the writings of the learned knight of Norwich, the Life of Browne prefixed to an edition of the Christian Morals (1756) was by Johnson. It is needless to say that Johnson's clear and graceful use of his much less audaciously Latinist vocabulary differs from Browne's abstruse and often involved and obscure style of disquisition perhaps more than it resembles it. It is inevitable that Browne's contemplative, inquisitive, fantastic pensiveness should be compared and contrasted with the more sombre and less poetical but equally humorous temperament of his earlier contemporary, Burton, the anatomist of melancholy Cowper's Task shows many traces of the Morals Coleridge, who was so well qualified to appreciate the writings of Browne, has numbered him among his first favourites 'Rich in various knowledge, exuberant in conceptions and conceits, contemplative, imaginative, often truly great and magnificent in his style and diction, though, doubtless, too often big, stiff, and He is a quiet and sublime hyper-Latinistic enthusiast, with a strong tinge of the fantast the humorist constantly mingling with, and flashing across, the philosopher, as the darting colours in shot-silk play upon the main dye? Coleridge insists, too, on the entireness of Browne in every subject before him He never wanders from it, and he has no occasion to wander, for whatever happens to be his subject, he metamorphoses all To this should be added the nature into it complete originality of his mind He is manifestly like no other writer, and his quaint, profound, and mystical abstractions, stamped with his peculiar style, carry the imagination by an inevitable fascination back into the primeval ages of the world, or forward into the depths of eter-Browne's influence on English literature has been deep and lasting, if not very wide in extent No writer bears the impress of his influence more strongly marked, alike in style and cast of thought, than Charles Lamb, who indeed boasted that he was the first 'among the moderns' to discover his excellences Hazlitt, Carlyle, and Pater paid their tribute to him De Quincey ranked him with Jeremy Taylor as the richest and most dazzling of rhetoricians, and Lowell called him 'our most imaginative mind since Shakespeare, ' perhaps it is truer to say that his supremest merit rests in his being the highest type of the profound humorist, to whom 'all existence had been but food for contemplation?

Oblivion.

What song the syrens song, or what name Achilles assumed when he hid himself among women, though puzzling questions, are not beyond all conjecture time the persons of these ossuaries entered the famous nations of the dead, and slept with princes and coun sellors, might admit a wide solution. But who were the proprictance of these bones, or what bodies these ashes made up, were a question above antiquarism, not to be resolved by man, nor easily perhaps by spirits, except we consult the provincial guardians, or tutelary observators Had they made as good provision for their names as they have done for their relicks, they had not so grossly erred in the art of perpetuation subsist in bones, and be but pyramidally extant, is a fallacy in duration Vain ashes, which, in the oblivion of names, persons, times, and seves, have found unto themselves a fruitless continuation, and only arise unto late posterity, as emblems of mortal vanities, antidotes against pride, vainglory, and madding vices Pagan vain glories, which thought the world might last for ever, had encouragement for ambition, and finding no Atropos unto the immortality of their names, were never dampt with the necessity of oblivion. Even old ambitions had the advantage of ours, in the attempts of their vainglories, who acting early and before the probable meridian of time, have by this time found great accomplishment of their designs, whereby the ancient heroes have already out lasted their monuments and mechanical preservations. But in this latter scene of time we cannot expect such mumines unto our memories, when ambition may fear the prophecy of Elias, and Charles V can never hope to live within two Methuselahs of Hector

And therefore restless inquietude for the diuturnity of our memories unto present considerations seems a vanity almost out of date, and superannuated piece of We cannot hope to live so long in our names as some have done in their persons, one face of Janus holds no proportion unto the other 'Tis too late to be ambitious The great mutations of the world are acted, or time may be too short for our designs our memories by monuments, whose death we daily pray for, and whose duration we cannot hope, without injury to our expectations in the advent of the last day, were a contradiction to our beliefs Wc whose generations are ordained in this setting part of time, are providentially taken off from such imaginations, and being necessitated to eye the remaining particle of futurity, are naturally constituted unto thoughts of the next world, and cannot excusably decline the consideration of that duration, which maketh pyramids pillars of snow, and all that's past a moment

Circles and right lines limit and close all bodies, and the mortal right lined circle must conclude and shut up all. There is no antidote against the opium of time, which temporally considereth all things. Our fathers find their graves in our short memories, and sadly tell us how we may be buried in our survivors. Gravestones tell truth scarce forty years. Generations pass while some trees stand, and old families last not three oaks. To be read by bure inscriptions like many in Gruter, to hope for eternity by eniginatical epithets or first letters of our names, to be studied by antiquaries, who we were, and have new names given us, like many of the mummies, are cold consolations unto the students of perpetuity, even by everlasting languages.

To be content that times to come should only know there was such a man, not caring whether they knew more of him, was a frigid ambition in Cardan, dis paraging his horoscopal inclination and judgment of himself, who cares to subsist, like Hippocrates' patients, or Achilles' horses in Homer, under naked nominations, without deserts and noble acts, which are the balsam of our memories, the entelectia and soul of our subsistences. To be nameless in worthy deeds exceeds an infamious history. The Canaanitish woman lives more happily without a name than Herodias with one. And who had not rather have been the good thief than Pilate?

But the iniquity of oblivion blindly scattereth her poppy, and deals with the memory of men without distinction to merit or perpetuity. Who can but pity the founder of the Pyramids? Herostratus lives that burnt the temple of Diana, he is almost lost that built it. Time hath spared the epitaph of Adrian's horse, confounded that of himself. In vain we compute our felicities by the advantage of our good names, since bad have equal durations, and Thersites is like to live as long as Agamemnon. Who knows whether the best of men be known, or whether there be not more remarkable persons forgot, than any that stand remembered in the known account of time? Without the favour of the everlasting register, the first man had been as unknown as the last, and Methuselah's long life had been his only chronicle.

Oblivion is not to be hired The greater part must be content to be as though they had not been, to be found in the register of God, not in the record of man Twenty seven names make up the first story [before the Flood], and the recorded names ever since contain not one living century The number of the dead long exceedeth all that shall live. The night of time far surpasseth the day, and who knows when was the equinox? Every hour adds unto that current arithmetick, which scarce stands one moment. And since death must be the Lucina of life, and even pagans could doubt whether thus to live were to die, since our longest sun sets at right descensions, and makes but winter arches, and therefore it cannot be long before we he down in darkness, and have our light in ashes, since the brother of death daily haunts us with dying mementos, and time, that grows old in itself, bids us hope no long duration, diuturnity is a dream and folly of expectation.

Darkness and light divide the course of time, and oblivion shares with memory a great part even of our living beings, we slightly remember our felicities, and the smartest strokes of affliction leave but short smart. upon us Sense endureth no extremities, and sorrows destroy us or themselves To weep into stones are fables. Afflictions induce callosities, miseries are slippery, or fall like snow upon us, which notwithstanding is no unhappy stupidity To be ignorant of evils to come, and forgetful of evils past, is a merciful provision in nature, whereby we digest the mixture of our few and evil days, and, our delivered senses not relapsing into cutting remembrances, our sorrows are not kept raw by the edge of repetitions. A great part of antiquity contented their hopes of subsistency with a transmigration of their souls-a good way to continue their memories, while, having the advantage of plural successions, they could not but act something remarkable in such variety of beings, and, enjoying the fame of their passed selves, make accumulation of glory unto their last durations Others, rather than be lost in the uncomfortable night of nothing, were content to recede into the common being, and make one particle of the public soul of all things, which was no more than to return into their unknown and divine original again. Egyptian ingenuity was more unsatisfied, contriving their bodies in sweet consistencies to attend the return of their souls. But all was vanity, feeding the wind, and The Egyptian mummies, which Cambises or time hath spared, avarice now consumeth. Mummy is become merchandise, Mizraim cures wounds, and Pharaoh is sold for balsams.

In vain do individuals hope for immortality, or any patent from oblivion, in preservations below the moon, men have been deceived even in their flatteries, above the sun, and studied conceits to perpetuate their names in heaven. The various cosmography of that part hath already varied the names of contrived constellations, Nimrod is lost in Orion, and Osyris in the Dog star

While we look for incorruption in the heavens, we find they are but like the earth,—durable in their main bodies, alterable in their parts, whereof, beside cometsand new stars, perspectives begin to tell tales, and the spots that wander about the sun, with Phaeton's favour, would make clear conviction

There is nothing strictly immortal but immortality Whatever hath no beginning may be confident of noend (all others have a dependent being and within the reach of destruction), which is the peculiar of that necessary Essence that cannot destroy itself, and the highest strain of omnipotency, to be so powerfully constituted as not to suffer even from the power of itself, all others have a dependent being, and within the reach of destruction But the sufficiency of Christian immortality frustrates all earthly glory, and the quality of either state after death makes a folly of posthumous memory who can only destroy our souls, and hath assured our resurrection, either of our bodies or names hath directly promised no duration Wherein there is so much of chance, that the boldest expectants have found unhappy frustration, and to hold long subsistence seems but a scape in oblivion But man is a noble animal, splendid in ashes, and pompous in the grave, solemnising nativities and deaths with equal lustre, nor omitting ceremonies of bravery in the infamy of his nature.

Life is a pure flame, and we live by an invisible sun within us. A small fire sufficeth for life, great flames seemed too little after death, while men vainly affected precious pyres, and to burn like Sardanapalus, but the wisdom of funeral laws found the folly of prodigal blazes, and reduced undoing fires unto the rule of sober obsequies, wherein few could be so mean as not to provide wood, pitch, a mourner, and an urn

Five languages secured not the epitaph of Gordianus. The man of God lives longer without a tomb than any by one, invisibly interred by angels, and adjudged to obscurity, though not without some marks directing human discovery Enoch and Elias, without either tomb or burial, in an anomalous state of being, are the great examples of perpetuity, in their long and living memory, in strict account being still on this side death, and having a late part yet to act upon this stage of earth. If in the decretory term of the world we shall not all die but be changed, according to received translation, the last day will make but few graves, at least quick resurrections will anticipate lasting sepultures. Some graves will be opened before they be quite closed, and Lazarus be no wonder When many that feared to die, shall groan that they can die but once, the dismal state is the second and living death, when life puts despair on the damned, when men shall wish the coverings of mountains, not of monuments, and annihilations shall be courted.

While some have studied monuments, others have studiously declined them, and some have been so vainly boisterous, that they durst not acknowledge their graves; wherein Alaricus seems most subtle, who had a river turned to hide his bones at the bottom. Even Sylla, that thought himself safe in his urn, could not prevent revenging tongues, and stones thrown at his monument Happy are they whom privacy makes innocent, who deal so with men in this world, that they are not afraid to meet them in the next, who, when they die, make no commotion among the dead, and are not touched with that poetical taunt of Isaiah

Pyramids, arches, obelisks were but the irregularities of vain glory, and wild enormities of ancient magna nimity. But the most inagnanimous resolution rests in the Christian religion, which trampleth upon pride, and sits on the neck of ambition, humbly pursuing that infallible perpetuity, unto which all others must diminish their diameters and be poorly seen in angles of contingency

Pious spirits, who passed their days in raptures of futurity, made little more of this world than the world that was before it, while they lay obscure in the chaos of pre ordination and night of their fore beings. And if any have been so happy as truly to understand Christian annihilation, ecstacies, exolution, liquefaction, transformation, the kiss of the spouse, gustation of God, and ingression into the divine shadow, they have already had a handsome anticipation of heaven the glory of the world is surely over, and the earth in ashes unto them

Fo subsist in lasting monuments, to live in their productions, to exist in their names, and predicament of chimæras, was large satisfaction unto old expectations, and made one part of their Elysiums. But all this is nothing in the metaphysicks of true belief. To live indeed is to be again ourselves, which being not only an hope but an evidence in noble believers, 'tis all one to lie in St Innocents' churchyard, as in the sands of Egypt, ready to be anything in the ecstasy of being ever, and as content with six foot as the moles of Adrianus. (From the fifth and last chapter of Hydriotaphia)

Ossuaries, receptacles for the bones of dead men, the prophecy of Elias, a Talmudical tradition of the house of Elijah that the world should last but six thousand years, the mortal right lined circle is the Greek letter Θ , instead of thanatos, 'death, and used on Roman gravestones as the symbol of death, the Inscriptiones Antiques (1602) of the Antwerp scholar Janus Gruter was long the standard collection, a list of a number of Hippocrates' patients has been preserved, the Aristotelian entelechia here means 'perfection or 'ideal centre, angles of contingence are the infinitesimally small angles between the circle and its tangent, exolution is a shortened form of exsolution the special virtue of the earth in the churchyard of the Holy Innocents Church in Paris is referred to by Bishop Corbet above at page 457, Adrian's Mole or Hadrian's Mausoleum, now the Castle of St Angelo, is the vast pile built by the Emperor Hadrian for the imperial tombs

' Light the Shadow of God.

Light, that makes things seen, makes some things invisible. Were it not for darkness and the shadow of the earth, the noblest part of the creation had remained unseen and the stars in heaven as invisible as on the fourth day, when they were created above the horizon with the sun, and there was not an eye to behold them. The greatest mystery of religion is expressed by adum bration, and in the noblest part of Jewish types we find the cherubims shadowing the mercy seat. Life itself is but the shadow of death, and souls departed but the shadows of the living. All things fall under this name. The sun itself is but the dark simulacrum, and light but the shadow of God.

The Study of God's Works

The world was made to be inhabited by beasts, but studied and contemplated by man, it is the debt of our reason we owe unto God, and the homage we pay for not being beasts. Without this, the world is still as though it had not been, or as it was before the sixth day, when as yet there was not a creature that could conceive or say there was a world. The wisdom of God receives small honour from those vulgar heads that rudely stare about, and with a gross rusticity admire his works, those highly magnify him whose judicious inquiry into his acts, and deliberate research into his creatures, return the duty of a devout and learned admiration

Ghosts

I cannot believe the wisdom of Pythagoras did ever positively and in a literal sense affirm his metempsychosis or impossible transmigration of the souls of men into beasts. Of all metamorphoses or transmigrations I believe only one, that of Lot's wife, for that of Nebuchodonosor proceeded not so far, in all others I conceive there is no further verity than is contained in their implicite sense and morality. I believe that the whole frame of a beast doth perish, and is left in the same state after death as before it was materialled into life, that the souls of men know neither contrary nor corruption, that they subsist beyond the body, and outlive death by the priviledge of their proper natures, and without a miracle, that the souls of the faithful, as they leave earth, take possession of heaven, that those apparitions and ghosts of departed persons are not the wandring souls of men, but the unquiet walks of devils, prompting and suggesting us unto mischief, blood, and villany, instilling and stealing into our hearts, that the blessed spirits are not at rest in their graves, but wander sollicitous of the affairs of the world But that those phantasms appear often, and do frequent cemeteries, charnel houses, and churches, it is because those are the dormitories of the dead, where the Devil, like an insolent champion, beholds with pride the spoils and trophics of his victory over Adam (From Religio Medici.)

Browne on Himself

Now for my life, it is a miracle of thirty years, which to relate were not a history, but a piece of poetry, and would sound to common ears like a fable. For the world, I count it not an inn but an hospital, and a place not to live but to die in The world that I regard is my self, it is the microcosm of my own frame that I can cast mine eye on, for the other, I use it but like my globe, and turn it round sometimes for my recreation. Men that look upon my outside, perusing only my con dition and my fortunes, do err in my altitude, for I am above Atlas his shoulders The earth is a point not only in respect of the heavens above us, but of that heavenly and celestial part within us That mass of flesh that circumscribes me, limits not my mind. That surface that tells the heavens it hath an end, cannot persuade me I have any Whilst I study to find how I am a microcosm, or little world, I find myself something more than the great. There is surely a piece of divinity in us-something that was before the heavens, and owes no homage unto the sun. Nature tells me I am the image of God, as well as Scripture understands not thus much, hath not his introduction or first lesson, and hath yet to begin the alphabet of man

(From Religio Medici)

Oharity

But to return from philosophy to charity I hold not so narrow a conceit of this virtue as to conceive that to give alms is onely to be charitable, or think a piece of liberality can comprehend the total of charity \(^1\) Divinity hath wisely divided the acts thereof into many branches, and bath taught us in this narrow way many paths unto goodness as many ways as we may do good, so many ways we may be charitable, there are infirmities not onely of body, but of soul and fortunes, which do require the merciful hand of our abilities I cannot contemn a man for ignorance, but behold him with as much pity as I do Lazarus. It is no greater charity to cloath his body, than apparel the nakedness of his soul. an honourable object to see the reasons of other men wear our liveries, and their borrowed understandings do homage to the bounty of ours it is the cheapest way of beneficence, and, like the natural charity of the sun, illuminates another without obscuring itself. To be reserved and caitiff in this part of goodness is the sordidest piece of covetousness, and more contemptible than pecu-To this, as calling myself a scholar, I niary avarice. am obliged by the duty of my condition I make not, therefore, my head a grave, but a treasure, of knowledge, I intend no monopoly, but a community in learning, I study not for my own sake only, but for theirs that study not for themselves I envy no man that knows more than myself, but pity them that know less I instruct no man as an exercise of my knowledge, or with an intent rather to nourish and keep it alive in mine own head, than beget and propagate it in his, and in the midst of all my endeavours, there is but one thought that dejects me, that my acquired parts must perish with myself, nor can be legacied among my honoured friends. I cannot fall out, or contemn a man for an error, or conceive why a difference in opinion should divide an affection, for controversies, disputes, and argumentations, both in philosophy and in divinity, if they meet with discreet and peaceable natures, do not infringe the laws of charity In all disputes so much as there is of passion, so much there is of nothing to the purpose, for then reason, like a bad hound, spends upon a false scent, and forsakes the question first started. And this is one reason why controversies are never determined, for though they be amply proposed, they are scarce at all handled, they do so swell with unnecessary digressions, and the parenthesis on the party is often as large as the main discourse on the subject. The foundations of religion are already established, and the principles of salvation subscribed unto by all, there remains not many controversies worth a passion, and yet never any disputed without, not only in divinity but inferior arts (From Religio Medici)

Browne's 'Evening Hymn' evidently suggested some of the thoughts in Bishop Ken's

The night is come, like to the day, Depart not Thou, great God, away Let not my sins, black as the night, Eclipse the lustre of Thy light Keep still in my horizon, for to me The sun makes not the day, but Thee Thou, whose nature cannot sleep, On my temples sentry keep, Guard me 'gainst those watchful foes Whose eyes are open while mine close Let no dreams my head infest But such as Jacob's temples blest While I do rest, my soul advance, Make my sleep a holy trance That I may, my rest being wrought, Awake into some holy thought,

And with as active vigour run My course as doth the nimble sun Sleep is a death,—O make me try, By sleeping, what it is to die! And as gently lay my head On my grave as now my bed Howe'er I rest, great God, let me Awake again at last with 1 hee, And thus assured, behold I he Securely, or to wake or die These are my drowsy days, in vain I do now wake to sleep again O come that hour when I shall never Sleep again, but wake for ever was the son of the rector of Aldwinkle St Peter's in Northamptonshire (as Dryden was son of the rector of Aldwinkle All Saints) He was born in Quick intelligence made him a scholar in boyhood, and at Queen's College, Cambridge, he attained the highest honours Eminently popular as a preacher in Cambridge, he passed through a rapid succession of promotions to the lectureship of the Savoy in London His first work was a tedious poem (1631) - David's Hainous Sinne, Heartie Repentance, Heavie Punishment In 1640 he published his History of the Holy Warre, on the Crusades, and in 1642 his Holy and Prophane During the Civil War he attached himself to the king's party at Oxford, and accompanied the army for some years as chaplain to Sir Ralph For his men, apparently, he wrote and published Good Thoughts in Bad Times (1645), Better Thoughts in Worse Times (1647) was followed by The Cause and Cure of a Wounded Conscience (1647), and in 1660 by Mixt Contemplations ın Better Times A Pisgah-View of Palestine appeared in 1650. His company was much courted both for his learning and for his irrepressible humour He would sit patiently for hours listening to the prattle of old women, in order to obtain snatches of local history, traditionary anecdote, and proverbial wisdom, and these he wrought up in The Worthies of England, which is a strange melange of topography, biography, and popular antiquities In 1647 he returned to London. His Church History of Britain was given to the world in 1656 (1 vol folio), and Heylyn denounced it as a rhapsody with three hundred and fifty errors, and full of 'impertinencies and scraps of trencherjests interlaced in all parts of the book' Fuller next devoted himself to the preparation of his Worthies, which was not completed till 1660, nor published till after his death in 1661 passed through various situations in the Church, the last of which was that of chaplain to Charles II By Charles II he was restored to his preferments, and it was thought he would have been made a bishop had he not been prematurely cut off by fever the year after the Restoration He was twice As proofs of his wonderful memory, it was fabled that he could repeat five hundred unconnected words after twice hearing them, and recite the whole of the signs in the principal thoroughfare of London after once passing through it and back again. His chief work, the Worthies, is rather a collection of brief memoranda than While a modern reader a regular composition marvels at the vast quantity of gossip which it contains, he realises that it has preserved much curious information which would have otherwise been lost. It may be described as a magnificent miscellany about the counties of England and their illustrious natives, lightened up by unrivalled wit and felicity of illustration, and aglow with The style, as in his other works, shows a nervous brevity and point almost new to English, and a homely directness strangely shrewd and never vulgar The eminent men whose lives he records are arranged by Fuller according to their native counties, of which he mentions also the natural productions, manufactures, medicinal waters, herbs, wonders, buildings, local proverbs, sheriffs, and modern battles Fuller's Holy and Prophane State contains admirably drawn characters, which are held forth as examples to be respectively imitated and avoidedsuch as the Good Father, the Good Soldier, the Good Master, and so on In this and the other productions of Fuller there is a vast fund of sagneity and good sense, his conceits, as Charles Lamb says, are oftentimes 'deeply steeped in human feeling and passion' Thus he says 'The Pyramids themselves, doting with age, have forgotten the names of their founders,' and negroes he characterises as 'the image of God cut in ebony' And as smelling 'a turf of fresh earth is wholesome for the body, no less are thoughts of mortality cordial to the soul? The first six extracts are from the Holy State, the next five from the Worthies

The Good Schoolmaster

There is scarce any profession in the commonwealth more necessary which is so slightly performed. The reasons whereof I conceive to be these. First, young scholars make this calling their refuge, yea perchance before they have taken any degree in the university, commence schoolmasters in the country, as if nothing clse were required to set up this profession but only a rod and a ferula. Secondly, others who are able use it only as a passage to better preferment, to patch the rents in their present fortune, till they can provide a new one and betake themselves to some more grunful calling Thirdly, they are disheartened from doing their best with the miscrible reward which in some places they receive, being masters to their children and slaves to their parents. I ourthly, being grown rich they grow negligent, and scorn to touch the school but by the proxy of an usher But see how well our schoolmaster behaves himself

His genius inclines him with delight to his profession Some men had as heve be schoolboys as schoolmasters, to be tied to the school as Cooper's Dictionary and Scapula's Lexicon are chained to the desk therein, and though great scholars and skilful in other arts, are But God of his goodness hath fitted bunglers in this several men for several callings, that the necessity of church and state in all conditions may be provided for So that he who beholds the fabric thereof may say, God hewed out the stone, and appointed it to lie in this very place, for it would fit none other so well, and here it doth most excellent And thus God mouldeth some for a schoolmaster's life, undertaking it with desire and delight, and discharging it with desterity and happy

After an Engraving

He studieth his scholars' natures as carefully as they their books, and ranks their dispositions into several forms. And though it may seem difficult for him in a great school to descend to all particulars, yet experienced schoolmasters may quickly make a grammar of boys' natures, and reduce them all, saving some few exceptions, to these general rules.

- I Those that are ingenious and industrious. The conjunction of two such planets in a youth presage much good unto him. To such a lad a frown may be a whipping, and a whipping a death, yea, where their master whips them once, shame whips them all the week after Such natures he useth with all gentleness.
- 2 Those that are ingenious and idle. These think with the hare in the fable, that running with smalls (so they count the rest of their schoolfellows) they shall come soon enough to the post, though sleeping a good while before their starting. O' a good rod would finely take them napping!
- 3 Those that are dull and diligent. Wines, the stronger they be, the more lees they have when they are new. Many boys are muddy headed till they be clarified with age, and such afterwards prove the best. Bristol diamonds are both bright, and squared, and pointed by nature, and yet are soft and worthless, whereas orient ones in India are rough and rugged naturally. Hard, rugged, and dull natures of youth acquit themselves afterwards the jewels of the country, and therefore their dulness at first is to be borne with, if they be diligent. That schoolmaster deserves to be beaten himself who beats nature in a boy for a fault. And I question whether all the whipping in the world can make their parts which are naturally sluggish rise one minute before the hour nature light appointed.

4. Those that are invincibly dull, and negligent also Correction may reform the latter, not amend the former All the whetting in the world can never set a razor's edge on that which hath no steel in it. Such boys he consigneth over to other professions. Shipwrights and boat makers will choose those crooked pieces of timber which other carpenters refuse. Those may make excellent merchants and mechanics who will not serve for scholars.

He is able, diligent, and methodical in his teaching, not leading them rather in a circle than forwards. He minces his precepts for children to swallow, hanging clogs on the nimbleness of his own soul, that his scholars may go along with him

He is and will be known to be an absolute monarch in his school. If cockering mothers proffer him money to purchase their sons an exemption from his rod (to live as it were in a peculiar, out of their master's jurisdiction), with disdain he refuseth it, and scorns the late custom in some places of commuting whipping into money, and ransoming boys from the rod at a set price. If he hath a stubborn youth, correction-proof, he debaseth not his authority by contesting with him, but fairly, if he can, puts him away before his obstinacy hath infected others

5 He is moderate in inflicting deserved correction Many a schoolmaster better answereth the name saidstriphs; than saidstriphs, rather tearing his scholars' flesh with whipping than giving them good education. No wonder if his scholars hate the Muses, being presented unto them in the shapes of fiends and furies. Junius complains de insolenti carmficina of his schoolmaster, by whom conscindebatur flagris septies aut octies in dies singulos. Yea hear the lamentable verses of poor Tusser in his own Life

'From Paul's I went, to Eton sent,
To learn straightways the Latin phrase,
Where fifty three stripes given to me
At once I had

'For fault but small or none at all
It came to pass that beat I was,
See, Udal, see the mercy of thee
To me, poor lad'

Such an Orbilius mars more scholars than he makes. Their tyranny hath caused many tongues to stammer which spake plain by nature, and whose stuttering at first was nothing else but fears quavering on their speech at their master's presence, and whose mauling them about their heads hath dulled those who in quickness exceeded their master

6 He makes his school free to him who sues to him in formâ pauperis. And surely learning is the greatest alms that can be given. But he is a beast who, because the poor scholar cannot pay him his wages, pays the scholar in his whipping, rather are diligent lads to be encouraged with all excitements to learning. This minds me of what I have heard concerning Mr Bust, that worthy late schoolmaster of Eton, who would never suffer any wandering begging scholar, such as justly the statute hath ranked in the fore-front of rogues, to come into his school, but would thrust him out with earnest ness (however privately charitable unto him) lest his schoolboys should be disheartened from their books, by seeing some scholars, after their studying in the university, preferred to beggary

'7 He spoils not a good school to make thereof a bad college, therein to teach his scholars logic. For, besides that logic may have an action of trespass against grammar for encroaching on her liberties, syllogisms are solecisms taught in the school, and oftentimes they are forced afterwards in the university to unlearn the fumbling skill they had before

8 Out of his school he is no way pedantical in carriage or discourse, contenting himself to be rich in Latin, though he doth not jingle with it in every company wherein he comes.

To conclude, let this, amongst other motives, make schoolmasters careful in their place—that the eminencies of their scholars have commended the memories of their schoolmasters to posterity, who, otherwise in obscurity, had altogether been forgotten. Who had ever heard of R Bond, in Lancashire, but for the breeding of learned Ascham, his scholar? or of Hartgrave, in Burnley School, in the same county, but because he was the first did teach worthy Dr Whitaker? Nor do I honour the memory of Mulcaster for anything so much as his scholar, that gulf of learning, Bishop Andrews. This made the Athenians, the day before the great feast of Theseus, their founder, to sacrifice a ram to the memory of Conidas, his schoolmaster, that first instructed him

Bristol diamonds are transparent rock-crystals found thereabouts. Patdotribes, in paragraph 5, is 'boy thrasher, paidagogos, liter ally 'boy leader Junius is Francis Junius or De Jon (see page 30) For Udall, see page 155, and for Lancelot Andrewes, page 388

The Good Yeoman.

The good yeoman is a gentleman in ore, whom the next age may see refined, and is the wax capable of a genteel [gentle] impression, when the prince shall stamp Wise Solon, who accounted Tellus the Athenian the most happy man for living privately on his own lands, would surely have pronounced the English yeomanry 'a fortunate condition,' living in the temperate zone between greatness and want, an estate of people almost peculiar to England France and Italy are like a die which hath no points between cinque and ace, nobility and peasantry Their walls, though high, must needs be hollow, wanting filling stones. Iudecd, Germany hath her boors, like our yeomen, but by a tyrannical appropriation of nobility to some few ancient families, their yeomen are excluded from ever rising higher to clarify their bloods. In England, the temple of honour is bolted against none who have passed through the temple of virtue, nor is a capacity to be genteel denied to our yeoman who thus behaves him He wears russet clothes, but makes golden payment, having tin in his buttons and silver in his pocket If he chance to appear in clothes above his rank, it is to grace some great man with his service, and then he blusheth at his own bravery Otherwise, he is the surest landmark whence foreigners may take aim of the ancient English customs, the gentry more floating after foreign fashions. In his house he is bountiful both to strangers and poor people Some hold, when hospitality died in England, she gave her last groan And still at our yeo amongst the yeomen of Kent man's table you shall have as many joints as dishes, no meat disguised with strange sauces, no straggling joint of a sheep in the midst of a pasture of grass, beset with salads on every side, but solid, substantial No servitors (more nimble with their hands than the guests with their teeth) take away meat before stomachs are taken away Here you have that which in itself is good, made better by the store of it, and best by the welcome to it. He improveth his land to a double value by his good husbandry Some grounds that wept with water, or frowned with thorns, by draining the one and clearing the other, he makes both to laugh and sing with corn By marl and limestones burned he bettereth his ground, and his industry worketh miracles, by turning stones into bread

Recreations

Recreations is a second creation, when weariness liath almost annihilated one's spirits. It is the breathing of the soul, which otherwise would be stifled with continual business. We may trespass in them, if using such as are forbidden by the lawyer, as against the statutes, physician, as against health, divine, as against conscience

- I Be well satisfied in thy conscience of the lawfulness of the recreation thou usest. Some fight against cock fighting, and baitbull and bearbaiting, because man is not to be a common barretour [raiser of strife] to set the creatures at discord, and seeing antipathy betwixt creatures was kindled by man's sin, what pleasure can be take to see it burn? Others are of the contrary opinion, and that Christianity gives us a placard to use these sports, and that man's charter of dominion over the creatures enables him to employ them as well for pleasure as necessity. In these as in all other doubtful recreations, be well assured first of the legality of them. He that sins against his conscience sins with a witness.
- 2 Spill not the morning (the quintessence of the day) in recreations. For sleep itself is a recreation, add not therefore sauce to sauce, and he cannot properly have any title to be refreshed who was not first faint. Pastime, like wine, is poison in the morning. It is then good husbandry to sow the head, which hath lain fallow all night, with some serious work. Chiefly entrench not on the Lord's day to use unlawful sports, this were to spare thine own flock, and to shear God's lamb
- 3 Let thy recreations be ingenious [ingenious], and bear proportion with thine age If thou sayest with Paul, When I was a child, I did as a child, say also with him, but when I was a man, I put away childish things Wear also the child's coat, if thou usest his sports.
- 4. Take heed of boisterous and over violent exercises. Ringing offtimes hath made good music on the bells, and put men's bodies out of tune, so that by overheating themselves they have rung their own passing-bell.
- 5 Yet the ruder sort of people scarce count any thing a sport which is not loud and violent. The Muscovite women esteem none loving husbands except they heat their wives. It is no pastime with country clowns that cracks not pates, breaks not shins, bruises not limbs, tumbles and tosses not all the body. They think them selves not warm in their geerst [gearings] till they are all on fire, and count it but dry sport till they swim in their own sweat. Yet I conceive the physician's rule in exercises, Ad ruborem, but non ad sudorem, is too scant measure.

6 Refresh that part of thyself which is most wenned If thy life be sedentary, exercise thy body, if stirring and active, recreate thy mind. But take heed of cozening thy mind, in setting it to do a double task under pretence of giving it a playday, as in the labyrinth of chess, and other tedious and studious games

Books

It is a vanity to persuade the world one hath much learning by getting a great library. As soon shall I believe every one is valiant that hath a well furnished armoury. I guess good housekeeping by the smoking, not the number of the tunnels [chimney cans], as knowing that many of them, built merely for uniformity, are without chimneys, and more without fires.

Some books are only cursorily to be tasted of namely, first, voluminous books, the task of a man's life to read them over, secondly, auxiliary books, only to be repaired to on occasions, thirdly, such as are mere pieces of formality, so that if you look on them you look through them, and he that peeps through the casement of the index sees as much as if he were in the house. But the laziness of those cannot be excused who perfunctorily pass over authors of consequence, and only trade in their tables and contents. These, like city cheaters, having gotten the names of all country gentlemen, make silly people believe they have long lived in those places where they never were, and flourish with skill in those authors they never seriously studied

Education confined too much to Language

Our common education is not intended to render us good and wise, but learned it hath not taught us to follow and embrace virtue and prudence, but hath im printed in us their derivation and etymology, it hath chosen out for us not such books as contain the soundest and truest opinions, but those that speak the best Greek and Latin, and, by these rules, has instilled into our fancy the vainest humours of antiquity But a good 'Tis a silly education alters the judgment and manners conceit that men without languages are also without It's apparent in all ages, that some such have been even prodigies for ability, for it's not to be believed that Wisdom speaks to her disciples only in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew

Marriage

Deceive not thyself by over expecting happiness in the married state. Look not therein for contentment greater than God will give, or a creature in this world can receive, namely, to be free from all inconveniences Marriage is not like the hill Olympus, "he law fig.," without clouds, yea, expect both wind and storms sometimes, which when blown over, the air is the clearer and wholesomer for it. Make account of certain cares and troubles which will attend thee Remember the nightingales, which sing only some months in the spring, but commonly are silent when they have hatched their eggs, as if their mirth were turned into care for their young ones

Decline of Great Families
